With that brief background, let me discuss in very broad terms East Asia and the Pacific's share of the requests before you.

AN INTEGRATED ASSISTANCE PACKAGE

I know members of this committee are particularly interested in the mix of security and development assistance. We have attempted to structure our overall assistance package in a balanced manner to reflect the security and economic needs of our friends and allies in the region and to take into account the efforts of other aid donors. We believe it important that the U.S. sustain a significant involvement in the economic development programs of those countries needing our help. Security and economic development are closely intertwined. Stable and secure governments are best able to sustain economic growth.

I would note that, because of the success of past development programs, we have bilateral, economic development programs in only four countries, Thailand, the Philippines, Indonesia and Burma as well as a small regional program for the Pacific Island nations. We have military assistance programs in nine countries. The issue of balance does not rise for such countries as the Republic of Korea, Malaysia and Singapore, where the per capita income levels disqualify them for U.S. development assistance. ESF programs in Thailand and the Philippines, while correctly labeled as security assistance, contribute directly to economic development in both countries. In Thailand, ESF is important in rectifying severe dislocations on the Kampuchean border, made all the worse by this month's Vietnamese attacks on refugee camps.

I would also emphasize that through our contributions to the Multilateral Development Banks we are making a significant investment in Asia. We contribute about 20% of the funds flowing through these institutions. In 1981 that amounted to $650 million in U.S. aid to East Asian and Pacific countries, in addition to our $220 million bilateral economic assistance.

A final point, while we are the principal and sometimes the only source of security assistance for our friends and allies in Asia, other nations offer substantial amounts of bilateral development assistance. That amounted to $1.6 billion in 1981.

Considering all these factors, we believe we have struck an appropriate balance between security and economic assistance in East Asia.

CONCLUSION

We believe that these programs, devised as they have been with an eye to severe resource constraints, and the increasing Soviet, North Korean and Vietnamese threat, represent the minimum resources needed to protect our frontline allies and preserve our base agreements. The needed restoration of FMS and MAP funds initially requested for this year, and the small real dollar increase sought for next, will serve as an important investment in the region's future, and in our own.

. . . . . .

Pacific Islands

World War II demonstrated the importance of the Pacific Islands, which lie across the lines of communication between the U.S. West Coast and Australia, New Zealand and Southeast Asia, to our security. The importance of these lines of communication has increased greatly over the past 40 years.

Since the war, island states have undergone great changes, and in the past twenty years have, in the main, transformed themselves from dependent to independent states. Our relations with them are friendly; we share a belief in democratic government and a devotion to individual liberties. It is in the U.S. interest to assist island governments in their efforts to promote economic growth.

For the third straight year, we have requested $5.1 million in Development Assistance to support an innovative, region-wide program to improve agricultural and fishing techniques, and to promote regional cooperation in this area of small populations and small markets. Our military assistance programs are even more modest in size.

Fiji

The $80,000 IMET program requested for FY 84 would be a $25,000 increase over FY 83's initial funding level. The additional money will assist the Royal Fiji Military Forces in acquiring needed professional and technical skills to better operate a small, but modern defense force, which permits them to continue their participation in Middle East peacekeeping forces.

The Fiji Government is pro-Western and broadly supportive of U.S. policy goals in international fora. Fiji's participation, at our request, in the Sinai MFO was critical to international acceptance of the organization. Fiji has also provided since 1978 one of the best trained battalions to the UN forces in Lebanon. Fiji stations more troops in the Middle East to try to keep peace there than it garrisons at home.

Papua New Guinea

The United States has enjoyed friendly relations with Papua New Guinea before and since its independence from Australia in 1975. The country's size, strategic location and resources make it a major actor in the South Pacific.

Papua New Guinea maintains the largest defense force in the Pacific Island region, and it has recently increased its military's cooperation with the U.S. Army's Western Command (WESTCOM). The proposed FY 84 IMET program of $30,000 is an increase of $10,000 over last year's request level, enough to permit adding one, or perhaps two, additional training programs. Papua New Guinea is expected to use its IMET grant to provide staff or technical training for two or three officers, and equipment repair and maintenance courses for the same number of enlisted men.

Tonga

The U.S. has a long history of missionary and merchant contacts with the Kingdom of Tonga. This small, pro-Western and staunchly anti-Communist nation has publicly welcomed U.S. Navy ships, and has done so when other island governments, concerned over an upsurge in public sensitivity to nuclear energy uses, have been reluctant to do so. Tonga's defense budget is very small, and the nation is still recovering from the effects of a disastrous hurricane which swept through Tonga in early 1982.

This is the first IMET program that we have proposed for Tonga. The requested $30,000 will be used to train Tonga Defense Force officers and men in a mix of professional and technical courses, from mid-level command training to patrol boat maintenance and disaster relief techniques.

Statement Issued by the Department of State, June 28, 1983 [6]

Micronesian Approval of Free Association With the United States

Unofficial results of the June 21, 1983 plebiscite in the Federated States of Micronesia (FSM) represent a significant victory for the Compact of Free Association. In the yes-or-no vote, the citizens of the FSM approved the Compact by more than 75 percent. The Compact was approved by three of the FSM's four states as required under the FSM Constitution.

Under the Compact and its subsidiary agreements, negotiated over a 14-year period, the FSM will be fully responsible for internal and foreign affairs while the United States will provide economic assistance and will assume the obligation and authority to defend the island nation.

The voters of the FSM were asked other questions on the plebiscite ballot, including the political status they would prefer if free association were not approved. The voters were asked to choose either a relationship with the United States closer than free association, or independence. Early returns indicate a preference for independence over a closer relationship with the United States; however, this will be moot given the overwhelming vote for free association.

The Government of the FSM mounted an intensive and thorough public education program in advance of the plebiscite. That program, which started more than 5 months before the vote, included translation of all the pertinent documents, radio and television programs and debates, town hall meetings, and village discussions. Official observers from the U.N. Trusteeship Council traveled to the FSM to observe the final days of the education program, the voting, and the tabulation of ballots.

The FSM is one of the three states of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands to conduct plebiscites on the Compact. Palau approved the Compact by a 62 percent majority in a February 10, 1983, plebiscite, [7] and the United States and the Marshall Islands have recently announced September 7 as the date of the last plebiscite in the Trust Territory. [8]

The Northern Mariana Islands, a fourth political jurisdiction in the Trust Territory, voted in 1975 to become a commonwealth of the United States. Under this arrangement, the people of the Northern Mariana Islands will become U.S. citizens when the Trusteeship ends. All four political jurisdictions of the Trust Territory have locally elected constitutional governments.

The Compact defines the relationship between the United States and the new Micronesian states, as well as their international political status after the trusteeship is terminated. Now that the people of the FSM have approved the Compact, it must be approved according to their constitutional processes and receive majority approval in both Houses of the U.S. Congress.

The United States has administered the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands (TTPI) since 1947 under a Trusteeship Agreement with the United Nations. The FSM consists of the island states of Yap, Truk, Ponape and Kosrae. The FSM and the other island groups of the Trust Territory were administered by Japan under a League of Nations mandate after World War I. The United States liberated the islands from Japanese occupation during the last years of World War II. Today the island states of the FSM, marked by their spectacular beauty and their unusually rich and diverse marine ecology, are preparing themselves for future economic development. Fishing, agriculture and tourism are expected to contribute to this growth. The Compact of Free Association contains incentives for investment, trade and business development and also guarantees economic development assistance from the United States.

Letter From the Acting Permanent Representative at the United Nations (Lichenstein) to the President of the U.N. Security Council (La Barre de Nanteuil), August 30, 1983 [9]

U.S. Response To Soviet Accusations Regarding Micronesia

On 16 August the United Nations Secretary-General distributed, at the request of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, a 12 August statement of the Government Information Agency of the Soviet Union (TASS) attacking United States administration of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands (S/15927). [10] The Soviet description of the United Nations administration of the Trust Territory bears so little relationship to reality, so totally ignores the democratically expressed will of the peoples of Micronesia and is so misleading as to require the following response.

[9] Source: U.N. document S/15940.

[10] The TASS statement alleged that the United States was practicing "an openly expansionist policy" towards Micronesia, in violation of the U.N. Charter, international agreements, international law, and morality. It charged that since the beginning of the trusteeship period the United States had nurtured a colonial status for Micronesia rather than promoting a program of increased self-sufficiency and, ultimately, true self-determination. TASS further alleged that the United States was expanding its military presence in Micronesia and increasing nuclear testing in the West Pacific, thereby exploiting Micronesia for military and strategic purposes and posing a serious threat to the well-being of the Micronesian people.

The United States has administered the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands (TTPI) since 1947 under a Trusteeship Agreement with the Security Council. Final responsibility for TTPI, which is the only strategic trust established under the United Nations Trusteeship System, was assigned under United Nations Charter Article 83 to the Security Council. The Security Council assigned responsibility for assisting it in overseeing United States administration of TTPI to the Trusteeship Council.

The actions and policies of the United States as Administering Authority of the trusteeship have been subjected to close scrutiny by the United Nations Trusteeship Council during the last three decades. The record of the United States administration in Micronesia is contained in the comprehensive annual reports which the Administering Authority has submitted to the Trusteeship Council, in the reports of numerous visiting missions which the Council has sent to the Trust Territory over the years and in the transcript of proceedings before the Council at its annual regular sessions. The Trusteeship Council has provided a forum in which petitioners and Council members—including the Soviet Union—have had every opportunity to question and comment upon the administration of the Trust Territory. It is to this record and the very tangible progress made since 1947 which the Security Council and the international community should address themselves.

Article 76 of the United Nations Charter states that one of the objectives of the trusteeship is:

"To promote the political, economic, social and educational advancement of the inhabitants of the Trust Territories, and their progressive development towards self-government or independence as may be appropriate to the particular circumstances of each Territory and its peoples and the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned . . . "

In accordance with the Charter and the 1947 Trusteeship Agreement, the United States has established modern health care, communications, transportation and educational systems in the Trust Territory and has worked in close consultation with the Micronesian people and their leaders to put in place the infrastructure which will enable these islands to achieve their goals of economic development and self-sufficiency. Though Micronesia faces many of the same problems in seeking economic development which other island peoples throughout the world have encountered, the United States believes the Micronesian people are on the threshold of increased economic well-being, and the future political status arrangements which have been negotiated include economic assistance which will enhance these opportunities.

During the trusteeship the United States has worked to improve the quality of life in Micronesia in a manner compatible with the traditions and cultures of the islands and has provided the people with the tools to develop their own resources for their own benefit. During the last decade, priorities for the allocation of resources and implementation of development strategies have increasingly been established by the Micronesians themselves, who today have primary authority and responsibility for the administration of governmental affairs, social services and economic development policies. These activities take place in accordance with constitutions approved by the people in plebiscites observed by the United Nations Trusteeship Council. The United States has relinquished virtually all executive, legislative and judicial functions of government from the Administering Authority to the constitutional Governments of Palau, the Marshall Islands and the Federated States of Micronesia, reserving to itself only such authority as is required to fulfill its responsibilities under the Trusteeship Agreement. These constitutional Governments have authority and responsibility for their internal affairs and, with the support of the United States, are conducting significant foreign affairs activities in preparation for the termination of the trusteeship.

In 1969, the United States began negotiations with the freely elected representatives of the peoples of the Trust Territory regarding the future political status arrangements which would provide a basis for termination of the trusteeship. Those negotiations have produced agreements with the four Governments of the Trust Territory which have emerged as self-government has been instituted—the Republic of Palau, the Republic of the Marshall Islands, the Federated States of Micronesia and the Northern Mariana Islands. In 1975 the people of the Northern Mariana Islands elected by an overwhelming 78 per cent majority to become a commonwealth of the United States.

After 14 years of careful negotiations, the Governments of three jurisdictions in the last two years have signed the compact of free association, under which the freely associated States will be sovereign and have the capacity to conduct their internal and external affairs, while the United States will have authority and responsibility for security and defence matters. The new nations will also receive significant economic assistance in order to ensure continued economic stability and development under free association. The compact is terminable by either mutual consent or unilateral action of any signatory Government. Earlier this year, the peoples of Palau and the Federated States of Micronesia approved the compact in free and impartial plebiscites internationally observed by missions of the Trusteeship Council (by majority votes of 62 per cent and 79 per cent, respectively). The third plebiscite will be held in the Marshalls on 7 September. [11] The compact will also be submitted for approval, in accordance with the constitutional processes of all four signatory Governments.

The blatantly false and deliberately misleading TASS statement accuses the United States of the illegal "dismemberment and annexation" of the Pacific Islands. Nothing could be further from the truth. The record of the United States administration and its political status negotiations with the popularly elected representatives of the peoples of the Trust Territory demonstrates that the United States was fully prepared to enter into a future political relationship with one Government representing all the peoples of Micronesia, but did not and would not attempt to force upon the Micronesian people an artificial and unwanted territorial configuration as the Soviet Union proposes. Indeed, the crucial element in any legitimate act of self-determination is that it be conducted freely and fairly so that its results reflect the freely expressed wishes of the people concerned: a concept which in itself is apparently alien to Soviet thought and experience. In establishing their constitutions and in voting on their status, the Micronesian people have chosen to become separate political entities within the Trust Territory according to their own cultural, economic and political preferences resulting in the creation of four separate Governments—a decision the United States respects. The form of self-government chosen was solely a decision of the people concerned, not of the United States. Any attempt by the Administering Authority to impose an arbitrary notion as to how the people of Micronesia should organize themselves for the purpose of instituting self-government would constitute callous insensitivity towards the cultural identity, social values and political aspirations of the peoples of the Trust Territory and would have clearly derogated from their right of self-determination.

The irresponsible charge that the United States influenced internal politics in Micronesia to bring about fragmentation—when, in fact, the separate constitutional Governments were established through open debate and the freely expressed choices of the inhabitants of the Trust Territory—is both condescending and an affront to the dignity and right of self-determination of the Micronesian people. The United States followed the only path appropriate for a truly democratic nation serving as Administering Authority.

The United States has always sought to preserve the stability which has been established in Micronesia and the Pacific Basin during its administration of the strategic trusteeship. The mutual agreements providing for continued security of Micronesia under free association were signed by the Governments of Micronesia only after extensive discussion and debate within Micronesia about United States security and defence responsibilities. The political and legal processes required in each Micronesian jurisdiction for final approval of those arrangements are still going forward. That this arrangement is—and in order to endure must continue to be—the product of mutual agreement rather than coercion is clearly evident from the fact that the compact will allow the freely associated States unilaterally to terminate free association in favour of independence, without the loss of either economic assistance or United States security and defence protection, an arrangement few other nations would so generously offer.

The Soviet Union has made several reckless charges about the United States intentions to impose agreements upon Micronesia under which the United States would be able to "expand its missile test range, in the islands, its naval bases, the airfields for its strategic airforce and other military facilities", thereby "flouting the basic objective of the Trusteeship System". However, under article 5 of the Trusteeship Agreement between the United States and the Security Council, the United States is explicitly authorized to establish military facilities and station armed forces in the Trust Territory. Despite this plenary authority, United States military activity in Micronesia is limited to just one missile systems testing facility at Kwajalein, in the Marshall Islands, which is operated by a civilian contractor force. Far from expanding its military facilities, the United States has neither naval bases nor any airfields for its strategic airforce in Micronesia. United States military operational authority under the compact of free association will be subject to express conditions, negotiated between the United States and the Micronesians.

In addition to substantial grants for social services and economic development, the United States has offered, under the compact, to establish a permanent fund to pay all claims of persons affected by the nuclear-testing programme at Enewetak and Bikini. Upon approval by the peoples concerned, this arrangement will resolve in a comprehensive and compassionate way a legacy of the post-war era.

The process of negotiation and approval of the compact of free association in free and democratically held plebiscites and in accordance with constitutional procedures in Micronesia and the United States has been and will continue to be open for the world community to observe. Once political status matters are determined in Palau, the Marshall Islands and the Federated States of Micronesia, as has already been accomplished in the Northern Mariana Islands, the United States will be prepared to seek termination of the trusteeship. At that time, it will be the voices of the Micronesian peoples themselves which will be heard above the groundless allegations and misinformation of those who would substitute their will for the will of those island peoples. The Micronesians have learned the lessons of democracy too well to have their future dictated to them by any other nation, and that fact, along with the many other accomplishments which the people of the Trust Territory and the Administering Authority have achieved together, constitute a legacy of which the Micronesians, the United States and the United Nations can be proud.

Instead of recognizing these achievements, the Soviet Union has made baseless charges in an attempt to distract the attention of the world community from its own aggressive designs—which now appear to extend to the Pacific area. It is the Soviet misrepresentation of the situation in Micronesia, not the actions of the United States, which represents a clear effort to thwart Micronesian aspirations for self-government as manifested in their recent acts of self-determination.

Statement Issued by the Department of State, September 15, 1983 [12]

Marshall Islands Approval of Compact of Free Association With the United States

On September 7, the electorate of the Marshall Islands voted in significant numbers to approve the Compact of Free Association. Final unofficial results from the United Nations-observed plebiscite show an approximate 60 percent approval margin for the Compact. The vote was preceded by a public education program administered by the Marshall Islands Government.

Under the Compact and its subsidiary agreements, which were negotiated over a 14-year period, the Marshall Islands will be fully self-governing and will conduct its own foreign and domestic affairs. The United States will provide economic assistance to the island nation of 32,000 people and will guarantee its freedom and territorial integrity through the defense and security authority granted it by the Compact.

The Compact will come into effect after it has been approved by the U.S. Congress and the present trusteeship arrangement has been terminated. President Reagan, in a televised address, has committed his support to the Compact and the administration plans an early submission to Congress. The Marshallese people have long sought the termination of the Trusteeship. Their vote in the plebiscite, which is recognized as a sovereign act of self-determination, will provide the basis for termination of the trusteeship status.

The plebiscite in the Marshall Islands was preceded by an intense political campaign which highlighted several of the issues in the Compact. Chief among these are the provisions of the negotiated settlement which address the legacy of the nuclear weapons testing program conducted by the United States in the Marshall Islands between 1946 and 1958. Most of the traditional and elected political leadership of the Marshall Islands urged approval of the Compact and in the end their advice was followed by a majority of the Marshallese people.

The Marshall Islands is one of the three states of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands to conduct plebiscites on the Compact of Free Association. Palau, on the western end of the Trust Territory, conducted its plebiscite on February 10, 1983, and the Compact was approved by a 62 percent majority, however, conflicts between the constitution and the Compact must be resolved. In the Federated States of Micronesia, 79 percent of the people voted to approve the Compact on June 21. The Federated States has also completed its governmental approval process.

The Compact defines the relationship between the United States and the new Micronesian states, as well as their international political status after the Trusteeship is terminated. Now that the people of the Marshall Islands have approved the Compact, it is ready for submission to the U.S. Congress where it requires majority approval by both Houses. After such approval, the United States will take up the question of Trusteeship termination in the United Nations.

The Northern Mariana Islands, a fourth political jurisdiction in the Trust Territory, voted in 1975 to approve a negotiated commonwealth arrangement with the United States. Under this arrangement, the people of the Northern Mariana Islands will become U.S. citizens and United States sovereignty will extend to the islands when the Trusteeship is terminated. All four political jurisdictions of the Trust Territory now have locally elected constitutional governments.

The United States has administered the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands (TTPI) since 1947 under the Trusteeship Agreement with the United Nations. The islands comprising the TTPI were administered by Japan under a League of Nations mandate between World War I and World War II and were liberated from Japanese control by United States forces during the last years of World War II. Today, economic activity in the islands is centered in agriculture, fishing and tourism. The Compact contains incentives for investment, trade and business development which will assist the islands in developing a stronger private sector. The Compact also guarantees economic development assistance from the United States.

Secretary Shultz's Trip to the Far East

MODERATOR. Good morning. As we previously announced, this briefing is on the Secretary's upcoming trip to East Asia. [2]

FIRST DEPARTMENT OFFICIAL. The key point in the Secretary's visit to Asia is going to be his attendance at the post-ministerial meetings in Bangkok with the ASEAN Foreign Ministers. Before that, he is going to have a short stop in the Philippines for meetings with President Marcos and Prime Minister Virata, and he will have bilateral discussions with the Thai Government in Bangkok before leaving Bangkok next Wednesday. [3]

The post-ministerial session is a tradition that began in 1979 growing out of the dialog that the ASEAN countries had established with major industrialized countries—the United States, Japan, Canada, New Zealand, [Australia,] and the EC. It consists of meetings, the first of which is a meeting between the five Foreign Ministers of the ASEAN countries and the six Foreign Ministers representing the dialog partners. Then, it is followed by individual dialog between the five Foreign Ministers and each of the dialog partners separately.

During the course of the 2 days of meetings, the Secretary will be having bilaterals with each of the ASEAN Foreign Ministers and, in fact, also with each of his dialog partners, so it will be a busy session of meetings.

The post-ministerial will focus on Kampuchea with the ASEANs trying out and perhaps discussing with us the ways in which we can continue to pursue the strategy that they have very successfully put together for trying to achieve a political settlement in Kampuchea.

The United States fully supports the position of ASEAN on Kampuchea. [4] We believe that ASEAN's approach to the problem, based on the International Conference on Kampuchea has the best chance of attaining a settlement that meets the legitimate interests of all parties concerned, including Vietnam. [5] The creation of a truly neutral independent Kampuchea holds the future to peace and stability in Indochina. We will be emphasizing in Bangkok our strong supporting role, and we will be listening carefully to what the ASEANs have to tell us.

We are, likewise, concerned with the security of Thailand, a longtime friend and ally of the United States. This concern is shared by Thailand's ASEAN partners. The Secretary's presence in Bangkok will affirm further our longstanding interest in Thailand's security and prosperity as well as that of its ASEAN partners.

Another issue that will be on the agenda will be the question of refugees. It will figure, I think, both in the formal sessions and the bilateral meetings with the ASEAN governments. With the cooperation of countries-of-first-asylum and countries of ultimate resettlement, the community of concerned nations has thus far dealt effectively and in an humane manner with the enormous problem posed by the movement of Indochinese refugees. The United States itself has taken more than half a million refugees for resettlement. The ASEAN countries have accepted an enormous burden as countries-of-first-asylum, and one of our purposes will be to assure them that, in fact, ultimate resettlement in other countries is assured.

We share with the ASEAN countries a fundamental interest in a stable and open international political system, and there will be a good deal of discussion about global political issues. I think there will be a great deal of interest in hearing from the Secretary on the U.S. approach to East–West relations and on arms control negotiations and our hopes for the success of those negotiations.

On July 17, the Conference issued a declaration in support of a swift political solution to the Kampuchea problem. For text, see American Foreign Policy: Current Documents, 1981, pp. 1023–1025. On October 21, 1981, the U.N. General Assembly adopted Resolution 36/5, by a vote of 100 (United States)–25–19, to further encourage a comprehensive political solution to the Kampuchea conflict and to establish a zone of peace, freedom, and neutrality in Southeast Asia. For text, see ibid., pp. 1030–1031. Also see U.N. General Assembly Resolution 37/6 adopted on October 28, 1982 by a vote of 105 (United States)–23–20, printed ibid., 1982, pp. 1099–1100.

They are also very interested in our security presence in the Pacific, which they and we see as providing an essential underpinning for regional stability and security.

The growing role of the ASEAN nations internationally has led to a heightened interest and involvement on their part in the state of the world economy, and that will be a subject of considerable discussion in Bangkok. The ASEAN nations represent an impressive success story of development and of substantial sustained rates of growth over very long periods of time, though those growth rates have fallen from the previous high levels of the 1970's due to the current world economic problems. We expect there will be keen interest in United States views on the prospects of recovery and in hearing from the Secretary and from Under Secretary Wallis on the results of the recent economic summit at Williamsburg, and particularly about its implications for the developing countries.

We will be discussing in economic areas some specific points such as the renewal of the GSP, which is a subject that those countries have great interest in, and in general issues of market access in the United States for ASEAN manufacturers. We share with them a concern about the specter of growing protectionism, and we will be discussing that in Bangkok.

We will also cover United States policies toward aid in the international financial institutions, and the Secretary and the President are firmly committed to assisting the developing countries to meet their economic goals, and we will be reaffirming this in our dialog with the ASEAN countries.

In sum, what we expect is a friendly, informal atmosphere with an open and productive dialog on a very broad range of major political and economic issues. The ASEAN countries individually and ASEAN as an organization are really both impressive success stories, particularly compared to what one might have expected to have happened in the region 10 years ago in the wake of U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam. What has happened, in fact, is cause for considerable hope and satisfaction. The countries are dealing with their own problems in their own ways very effectively. They have formed an effective partnership in addressing difficult international issues, particularly the problem of Kampuchea; and they have shown themselves as a group able to conduct mature and productive dialogs with the advanced industrial countries, including ourselves.

This has personally been an outstanding tradition and one that Secretary Shultz very much looks forward to continuing. This will be his first time there as United States Secretary of State.

My colleague will continue.

SECOND DEPARTMENT OFFICIAL. The visit by Secretary Shultz to India and Pakistan should be seen as the fulfillment of the long-delayed plans of the Secretary of State of the United States to visit this very important area and to have on-the-ground discussions with the leadership of these two countries. Some of you were in Brussels in December of 1981 when we had a lot of snow and the Polish crisis, and the plane did not go to South Asia. I mention that because it is important to understand that this is not something that is coming up 2½ years into the administration. It was on our plate early on. Everyone understands why the visit didn't take place at that time.

Now it comes against the backdrop of the administration's success in its attempts to strengthen a relationship with Pakistan to improve relations with India, and as we see the last few years, also against a backdrop of improved relations between India and Pakistan, and good movement throughout South Asia with respect to the countries relating to each other and trying to solve their problems.

We have received here a variety of South Asian leaders. Obviously, the most important have been the Prime Minister of India in mid-July 1982, [6] I believe it was, and the President of Pakistan in December. [7] We have just had meetings between the Secretary of State and Foreign Minister Doha of Bangladesh, and we have had visits and high-level contacts through the 2½ years with other senior leaders of other countries, Sri Lanka, Nepal.

You have seen the schedule. The Secretary will be spending roughly 2 days in [6] Prime Minister Indira Gandhi visited the United States, July 28–August 4, 1982.

[7] President Zia Ul-Haq of Pakistan visited the United States from December 6 to 14, 1982. He met with President Reagan and other U.S. officials in Washington, December 6–9.

each country. In India we see this as a natural follow-on to the successful visit of Mrs. Gandhi. The Secretary will be meeting with a wide range of Indians. He will also be chairing the Joint Commission with his colleague, Foreign Minister Rao. Of course, we are interested in improving our bilateral relations and also in taking the opportunity for wideranging discussions on regional and other issues. Mrs. Gandhi is the president of the Non-Aligned Movement—this is important. We will be discussing issues as diverse and as important as peace in the Middle East and economic recovery.

The Pakistan visit as well will be a continuation of the important dialogs we have had with senior leaders of the Government of Pakistan. I've already mentioned the very successful visit of President Zia here in December of '82. We have also had high-level discussions most recently in May—the visit of Foreign Minister Yaqub Kahn, when he came to discuss Afghanistan in the context of the Geneva talks. We will be discussing bilateral issues in Pakistan as well as regional issues of mutual concern. The Secretary will also chair the inaugural session of the U.S.–Pakistan Joint Commission with his colleague, Foreign Minister Yaqib.

Q. It was stated that before the Secretary visits India, the percent of Tarapur spare parts will be settled. Could you bring us up to date on this?

SECOND OFFICIAL. We're well aware of the issue of the Tarapur spare parts, and I can assure you we're working on this subject.

Q. In Bangkok, in the post-ministerial, are you expecting this notion of the Australian Foreign Minister acting in some sort of liaison role with the Vietnamese, which I gather was discussed with Prime Minister Hawke when he was here, to get much airing?

FIRST OFFICIAL. Foreign Minister Hayden is scheduled to go from Bangkok to Hanoi. So I would imagine there would be a great deal of interest in what kinds of views he might convey when he's in Hanoi.

I think it's one of the points that we have emphasized repeatedly in our discussions with the Australians—and I think both the Foreign Minister and Prime Minister Hawke, when he was here, have indicated agreement with [8]—that it's very important that what we do, the United States and Australia, should be in support of the ASEAN countries and with their concurrence.

The key to success in this whole effort is to recognize that it is the ASEAN countries that have the most direct stake in it. It is by supporting those countries that we have the best chance of achieving a political settlement.

I think, for that reason, I would assume that both from the Australian side and from the ASEAN side there'll be a great deal of interest in making sure that there is a very clear understanding by the Australians of the ASEAN position and what they would hope to achieve.

Q. Following up on that question, when Mr. Hawke was here he spoke of Australia's offer to mediate. What is the U.S. position on Australia serving as a mediator between ASEAN and Hanoi on the Kampuchea issue?

A. I hope he didn't use the word "mediate." I don't like the word "mediate" because that implies a role for Australia in between ASEAN and Vietnam, whereas I think the role that we see as one that could be useful is as a country that clearly supports ASEAN, clearly supports ASEAN's objectives, which Hawke made very clear they see as their role.

From that position, which is not that of a middleman, but rather of one of the countries strongly supporting ASEAN, being able to possibly play a useful role as a channel of communication.

[8] Australian Prime Minister Robert Hawke made an official working visit to Washington, June 11–15, 1983 at the invitation of the President. During his stay he met with the President, the Vice President, and also Secretaries Shultz, Weinberger, and Regan. He also met with Chairman Volcker of the Federal Reserve Board, and with Chairman Feldstein of the Council of Economic Advisers. See document 462.

Q. Can you tell us something about why the Secretary is going to Peshawar and the Afghanistan connection?

SECOND OFFICIAL. The Secretary is going to be in Pakistan, and it would be unusual if he, of all the visitors to hit Pakistan, didn't visit the site where there are 3 million refugees from Afghanistan. As you know, we have made significant contributions to the area of these refugees over the last 3 years—about $94 million. Obviously, he would wish to go there and visit this area, to see it on the ground, to see it himself. It's a very important component of the Afghan equation.

You have roughly 4½ million refugees, most of them in Pakistan, the rest in Iran. That's one-third of the population of that country. When you think of a future settlement in Afghanistan, you also must think very much about the future of these people. There is a current humanitarian issue.

Q. Can you give us an update on where the negotiations stand at the moment? How close is an agreement?

SECOND OFFICIAL. I think this is the third Geneva negotiating session. It started in June of '82, the second in early '83, and the third one is now, and this is in Geneva.[9]

I mentioned earlier that the Foreign Minister of Pakistan had come to talk to us about these negotiations. He also had visited before coming here, China, France, the United Kingdom, and he visited the Soviet Union before going to Geneva. So the Pakistani Foreign Minister consulted with the five permanent members of the Security Council.

These negotiations are being carried out under the auspices of the United Nations—Under Secretary Cordovez—who is holding so-called indirect talks in Geneva; indirect because the Pakistanis will not recognize the Soviet puppet regime, and although the Soviets are not officially represented, they've always got someone sitting out in the hall who seems to make most of the decisions for the Babrak Karmal types that are around there.

As far as where they are going, no one is sure. We support the concept of a negotiated settlement. We support the U.N. effort. We hope it succeeds. As we understand the position of the Pakistanis—and they have made this clear not only to us but to all of those who support the U.N. resolution and the Islamic Conference resolutions—the Pakistani position is based on the four key elements of those resolutions: Withdrawal of Soviet forces; return of the refugees with dignity, honor, and security; the right of the Afghans to choose their own form of government—who's going to represent them in Kabul—and the recreation—I emphasize recreation—of an independent, nonaligned Afghanistan.

The Soviets, of course, focus on the issue of so-called external interference. You know the theology and mythology. The Soviets were called in, according to the Soviets, because there was this great uprising, and the government said, "Please come and save us," so they did with 105,000 troops, helicopter gunships, napalm, all those wonderful things you used to see on American television, but you don't see it there.

The Pakistanis have engaged on the other side of the equation the issues that have been discussed so far, and that has been on the need for a time certain for a Soviet withdrawal. Those are the issues that have been discussed to date. There are these other two issues that are very important, which are of primordial importance, that I mentioned. They'll also be introduced into this, certainly by the Pakistanis, at an appropriate time.

. . . . . .

So that's where it stands. We don't know what the prospects for success will be. We hope they show progress.

Q. These four elements you talk about—those are the four what? Ideal goals—

[9] Reference is to the U.N.-mediated talks between Pakistan, Afghanistan, and the Soviet Union beginning, June 16–25, 1982, in Geneva. The talks were conducted by Diego Cordóvez, U.N. Under Secretary-General for Special Political Affairs, who met with each of the involved parties in an effort to establish a basis for more direct and substantial talks. A second round of talks took place in Geneva, April 11–22 and a third round, June 16–24, 1983, after which Cordóvez stated that "some progress" had been made but that "certain things must still happen" before an agreement could be reached.

SECOND OFFICIAL. Those are the four elements in the U.N. resolution [10] and in the resolutions that have been repeatedly supported by the Islamic countries.

Q. But the discussion now—

SECOND OFFICIAL. Which represents the Islamic world.

Q. But isn't it correct that the real negotiations now, the discussions now, fall somewhat short of those ideal goals?

SECOND OFFICIAL. Yes. I mentioned that.

Q. Yes. And I was wondering—

SECOND OFFICIAL. There were two they were focusing on.

Q. Right. Would the United States support a settlement that doesn't reach the level of those goals, but at least I suppose your main concern is getting the Soviet troops out. But I mean, will the—in other words, I'm asking you, in a direct way, how far the United States will go to help the Afghan refugees come back to their country and choose their own form of government? Or will it be enough that you get somewhat close to that goal and get the Soviet troops out, leaving a pro-Soviet government?

SECOND OFFICIAL. We have our own policy on this, and a very important element of our policy is the association of the Afghan people with their form of government, and an independent, nonaligned government. I think that answers your question. I really can't speculate.

Statement by the Secretary of State (Shultz), Bangkok, June 28, 1983 [11]

"The United States and the ASEAN States Share the Ideal of Unity in Diversity"

A few months ago, when I had occasion to talk about Asia and the Pacific to an American audience, I suggested that events in this part of the world have a large part in shaping our common future. [12] I had ASEAN very much in mind. I would single out three of your accomplishments in particular, which are a model for the rest of the world:

First, you have turned diversity from potential weakness into a significant strength by identifying and building upon common interests.

Second, you have attracted worldwide respect and support by resolutely resisting aggression while demonstrating a willingness to negotiate.

Finally, you have attained remarkable economic progress by taking the high road of reliance on market mechanisms and disciplined economic management to release the impressive energies and talents of your own people.

There is great importance for all of us in each of these achievements.

The United States and the ASEAN states share the ideal of unity in diversity—and for two of us it is the national motto. When I think of the monuments left by the great civilizations of Southeast Asia—Jogjakarta, Ayutthaya, and elsewhere—I am reminded of the different histories of the countries of the region, but also of a common cultural heritage.

Today when I see the different skylines of the ASEAN capitals—each of which has changed even since my last visit—I am reminded that you are building a common prosperity.

Not only ASEAN but all the nations of the world are today being drawn closer to each other every day by technological innovation and economic expansion. This very process, however, sometimes makes nations and peoples anxious about preserving their individual identities. We all recognize that diversity is not a "problem", but an expression of the freedom, independence, and moral values that we nurture and safeguard. While our unity provides greater strength and efficiency, our diversity brings creativity, adaptability, and meaning to our relationships.

No greater challenge faces our peoples or the leaders of our countries than the challenge of preserving peace. President Reagan believes that we best do that by combining strength with a willingness to solve problems through negotiations.

By rebuilding our own military strength we not only hope to deter aggression but also to persuade the Soviet Union to negotiate seriously for arms control.

At the START talks and INF talks in Geneva, at the Mutual and Balanced Force Talks in Vienna and at the U.N. Committee on Disarmament, we are seeking substantial, verifiable reductions or limitations on nuclear, chemical, and conventional forces.

Our efforts to solve problems through negotiations extend beyond arms control to efforts at resolving the regional disputes that so often are the cause of wars. We are, as you know, working with patience and determination to bring about a peaceful resolution of the problems that beset the Middle East. Our policies toward Namibia and Afghanistan incorporate the same principles.

In the effort to achieve a political settlement for one of the most important of these problems, that of Kampuchea, it is the ASEAN countries that have pointed the way for the United States and for the entire world. My government strongly supports both ASEAN's refusal to acquiesce in the consequences of aggression and ASEAN's readiness to negotiate a comprehensive political solution. [13]

The U.S. support for ASEAN's policy toward Kampuchea signifies our full commitment to support our common goals in Southeast Asia. We follow your lead. We know that the chances of persuading Vietnam to change its course are greater if the message comes from its neighbors. Regional security, like economic progress, is more solidly constructed if rooted in local initiative. But you will find us working steadfastly by your side.

Withdrawal of foreign troops, self-determination, and the establishment of a neutral and independent Kampuchean Government, in accordance with the principles established by the International Conference on Kampuchea, would protect the interests not only of the Kampuchean people, but of every state in the region, including Vietnam. We are painfully aware of Kampuchea's recent tragic history. The non-Communist resistance leadership of Prince Sihanouk and Prime Minister Son Sann has our moral, political, and diplomatic backing. However, we will have no dealings with the Khmer Rouge.

Like you, we recognize that Thailand, as a frontline state, deserves full support. We have a bilateral security relationship with Thailand. Our airlift of Howitzers and ammunition and the expedited delivery of other material to Thailand during the last Vietnamese dry season offensive was concrete testimony to our resolve in this regard.

The growing Soviet presence at Cam Ranh Bay introduces a further disturbing element of tension into the region. A matter of particular concern is the clear evidence that toxin weapons have been used against innocent people in isolated areas of Kampuchea and Laos. It is imperative that we join together in calling for an end to use of chemical and toxin weapons on innocent people. In doing so, we may help to bring about a halt to this inhumane activity.

The United States is aware that one of the more deplorable consequences of Vietnam's policies—the flood of refugees into neighboring states—is a problem that imposes continuing responsibilities on us all. Although the majority of these refugees have been resettled and the flow into ASEAN countries has greatly diminished, neither first asylum nor resettlement countries should lose sight of those that remain. The United States is taking steps to simplify its processing procedures and will propose a program to Congress for the next fiscal year which, together with the continued efforts of other resettlement countries, should reduce the refugee population significantly. We remain committed to doing our part in helping ease the refugee burden on ASEAN members. We are confident that other resettlement countries will also continue to do theirs.

On one particularly painful matter, we ask your help. Accounting for the Americans missing in Indochina is a matter of highest national priority for President Reagan and the American people. We urge both Hanoi and Vietnam to cooperate in resolving this humanitarian issue. The United States greatly values any assistance the ASEAN countries can provide us in seeking the fullest possible accounting of our missing men. As for Laos, the United States has shown readiness to improve relations based on concrete steps by both sides. We remain committed to this process.

The whole world is now painfully aware of something that the ASEAN states have known for a long time—we are all in the same boat economically. When one country's growth falters, all countries lose markets. When one country erects barriers to trade, people in all countries are denied opportunities for mutual benefit.

The economic growth of the developing countries—including most definitely the ASEAN countries—is important to the United States, not only because it is good for you, but also because it is good for us. One out of every twenty workers in our factories and one out of every five acres of our farmland now produce for Third World markets. Forty percent of total U.S. trade is with developing countries. Deterioration in our international accounts, particularly our exports to developing countries, accounted for about half of the decline in our GNP last year.

The reality of mutual interest between North and South creates a relationship of mutual responsibility. Our common task is to make this link a spur to growth in both developing and developed countries. Right now the name of the game is economic growth.

To meet that challenge, President Reagan has set three broad tasks for his administration.

First is to lead the way to long-term global economic recovery. That is the single most important thing the United States can do to restore growth in the developing world. I am happy to be able to say that the progress we have made to date is encouraging. Interest rates and inflation are down. Employment and labor productivity are up. U.S. real GNP rose at an annual rate of 2.6 percent in the first quarter and according to the preliminary estimate, at an annual rate of more than 6 percent in the second quarter. The challenge now, which we and other industrialized states took up in Williamsburg, is to turn this revival into sustained, noninflationary growth.

We don't pretend that our recovery is by itself the key to restoring growth in the developing world. To the contrary, the most important engine of growth for developing countries is the investment financed by domestic savings. On average, the developing countries devote about one quarter of their GNP to investment, with 80 percent of that investment financed by domestic savings. In this respect, as in so many others, the ASEAN countries are doing better. More than 90 percent of your gross investment comes from domestic savings. The ASEAN countries must be congratulated for having given their citizens the incentives to produce, save and invest while relying on market prices to allocate scarce capital efficiently. They have thus moved out onto the road of sustained growth.

However, the U.S. also does its part through official and private investment flows. Worldwide, the United States is the largest provider of official development aid, and we have increased the amount during each year of the Reagan administration. Of more than $8 billion that we provided last year, nearly $1 billion went to ASEAN countries either as bilateral assistance or as the U.S. share of World Bank and Asian Development Bank loans.

But an even larger contribution, in the ASEAN countries at least, is made by direct U.S. private investment, which we estimate to have reached a level of about $10 billion by 1982. That is an increase of more than 100 percent in just 2 years. American businessmen certainly have confidence in ASEAN. And well they should.

The second large contribution that we can make to your development is to provide markets for your products. For the developing countries in general, the income derived from exports in 1980 was 17 times that from foreign aid. The ASEAN countries earned roughly $65 billion from exports last year, almost 30 times the amount of foreign assistance from all sources. About 17 percent or $11 billion of these exports went to the United States and ASEAN had a trade surplus with the United States of $1.3 billion.

That is why our burgeoning recovery is so important to everyone. An increase of just two percentage points in the growth rates of the industrial nations would add roughly $20–25 billion to the annual export earnings of developing countries by 1985 if exports grew at the same rate. And that is why the second task President Reagan assigned his administration is so important—to work with our trading partners to resolve problems of market access and in particular to find a way, as the President said, "to integrate developing countries in the liberal trading order." The ASEAN countries are already leading the way in that effort.

We greatly appreciate the constructive efforts by your governments to strengthen trade liberalization measures in GATT. The United States is pleased that the Williamsburg conference endorsed this goal, referring in particular to the possibility of a new negotiating round with special emphasis on "expanding trade with and among developing countries." We are also well aware of the importance of our GSP program to ASEAN countries. The Reagan administration is committed to the renewal of that program and our chance of success will be greater the less are your barriers to imports from us.

The last task outlined by President Reagan is to lead in assisting international financial and trade institutions to strengthen world growth. At Williamsburg, other free market industrialized nations joined in this effort. And they share in particular our concern over the debt burden borne by developing countries.

A strategy for restoring growth will require determined efforts by many of the developing countries themselves, including difficult readjustment and discipline in domestic policies. The ASEAN countries have shown that they have the foresight and discipline to make such adjustments when necessary. But austerity alone is not a sufficient solution to the debt burden that the developing countries face. If everyone practices austerity and cuts imports, that only chokes world trade and spreads the hardships further. The objective must be to preserve the creditworthiness of countries and their ability to import new private capital in future years. There is no point in more austerity than is necessary for this objective. Until domestic adjustments and expanding world trade reduce the relative burden of debt service, there will be a continuing role for official financing and emergency assistance.

In each of the ways I have described, your countries are ushering in a new period of peace and prosperity to Southeast Asia. The efforts of this accomplishment reach far beyond your region. In an environment of global interdependence, your regional initiatives are felt throughout the world. All of your dialog partners have a major stake in your success.

It should not be surprising, therefore, that ASEAN is the central focus of our policy in Southeast Asia. You may continue to rely on the United States for full support for your policy toward Kampuchea. You can also rely on us as a responsive dialog partner of other matters affecting your security and economic development. We stand committed to the security of Thailand as the frontline state and to playing a constructive role in the region as a whole. Through our development assistance programs, our support for the international financial institutions, our private sector investment and our participation in the ASEAN–U.S. dialogue, we are engaged in your development efforts, both bilaterally and multilaterally. We remain committed to fulfilling with you our continuing humanitarian duty to shelter and resettle Indochinese refugees.

As the 1980's face us with common problems and common challenges, the United States will do its part in the common effort.

Thank you.

Transcript of a Joint Press Conference by the Foreign Ministers of the Association of South East Asian Nations Postministerial Meeting, Bangkok, June 28, 1983 [14]

"The Views of the United States Are That We Support the Approach of the ASEAN Countries to the Problem of Dealing With the Kampuchean Issue and All Related Matters"

The ASEAN dialog partners have just concluded their meetings this afternoon. Their Excellencies, the Ministers of ASEAN and the dialog partners, are very happy to give a press conference here. Please state your name and organization when you pose a question.

Q. Could I ask both Mr. Shultz, the U.S. Secretary of State, and Mr. Hayden, the Australian Minister for Foreign Affairs, of their hopes for the outcome of the visit of the Australian Minister to Hanoi? [15]

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The views of the United States are that we support the approach of the ASEAN countries to the problem of dealing with the Kampuchean issue and all the related matters. So, when it comes to any approach to Hanoi, we believe that it ought to be coordinated and be seen as useful by the ASEAN countries. And it is our understanding that they feel Mr. Hayden's visit could be useful, but I think it is up to them to say. That is the approach of the United States.

MR. HAYDEN. As I understood the response yesterday afternoon from the ASEAN Foreign Ministers, they, as Mr. George Shultz pointed out, saw that the visit could be useful and they supported it and Mr. George Shultz made it clear later that if they supported it then the United States was prepared to endorse it.

Q. I have a question for Secretary Shultz. Mr. Secretary, what evidence does the United States have, and how firm is it, that the Vietnamese are withholding the remains of Americans killed in Indochina, or missing in Indochina? Why would the Vietnamese be doing it and why are you making a point of it at this meeting?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. We make a point of our concern to know what has happened to the missing in action and to have returned to us the remains of those killed in action because we care so much about the men in our armed forces who have fallen and about their families. So, I took the occasion here to ask for help from the countries in this region and they all were considerate enough to say that they would give it to the extent they possibly could. According to our information, we still have missing, I think, 2,494 and we have intelligence that suggests that the remains of quite a sizable number are in hand but have not been turned over to us. So we wish as a matter of deep concern to the families involved and out of respect for the deceased that those remains be returned to us. We have sought help and it has been offered.

Q. And the third point was what would the motivation of the Vietnamese be for what I understand you called cruel behavior?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I have no reason to speculate about their motives. I don't have anything to add on that.

Q. I would like to address this question to Professor Mochtar as a spokesman of ASEAN on Mr. Hayden's visit. What is ASEAN's view on Mr. Hayden's visit to Hanoi?

PROFESSOR MOCHTAR. As long as Mr. Hayden's visit is in a framework of seeking a solution along the lines of how ASEAN sees the Kampuchean problem should be solved, we think it might be useful and he is welcome to tell us what he has learned in Hanoi. In fact, we welcome this from anybody who has relations with Hanoi.

Q. I would like to ask a similar question to Mr. Maceachen of Canada. In view of the fact that Canada has been praised for not doing the same thing—

[14] Source: Department of State Press Release 240, June 28, 1983; also printed in Department of State Bulletin, September 1983, pp. 26–31.

[15] On June 30, 1983, Australian Foreign Minister William Hayden met with Vietnamese Premier Pham Van Dong in Hanoi to discuss proposals for bringing peace to Kampuchea, which was occupied by Vietnamese troops, and the possibility of resuming Australian aid to Vietnam.

MR. MACEACHEN. Well, I want to continue to be praised. And I find Professor Mochtar's answer very acceptable for Canada. If the Australian Minister can play an effective and useful role, certainly we would welcome that.

Q. I propose my question to Minister Abe. Could you please elaborate about the implementation of Prime Minister Nakasone's proposal regarding the ASEAN and Japanese meeting of the Ministers for Science and Technology, and second, about the act of the Japanese Government regarding the discriminatory tariffs against ASEAN products?

MINISTER ABE. I'd like to answer your questions. First, when Prime Minister Nakasone made his visit to the ASEAN countries, he proposed to the leaders that they hold a Ministerial Conference on Science and Technology. As a followup to this proposal of Prime Minister Nakasone, I have suggested in this morning's session with the ASEAN Ministers that we will be dispatching, this coming August, a survey team which will discuss the issue further with the peoples concerned in the ASEAN countries. And, if possible, by the end of this year we wish to hold a ministerial conference on Science and Technology. If no particular ASEAN nation would like to host this conference, we will be happy to hold it in Japan. But, in any case, the issue would be up for further consideration among the peoples concerned. Second, on the issue of customs, I wish first of all to point out that Japan will expand by 50 percent, the import ceilings of the generalized systems of preferences concerning industrial and mining products and that, in December of this year when the tariff council will be held, the items of interest to ASEAN will be considered there and I would hope that favorable results could be achieved in the council through deliberations on the ASEAN items.

Q. I would like to address my question to Secretary Shultz. Since the United States did not sign the Treaty of the Law of the Sea, could you tell us what is the motive of that, and are you willing to participate in the future in signing the Treaty of the Law of the Sea?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The reason we have not signed the Law of the Sea Treaty is that we believe the provisions for a mining convention are seriously flawed and will not lead to the development of the seabed resources but quite the reverse. The reason, basically, why they are flawed is that they say to private enterprise, which might want to develop the technology and ability to do that, that this enterprise must, in effect turn over its expertise to an international authority and then, with whatever it is able to earn in the use of its technology, finance that international technology to compete with it. It doesn't seem to us that that is likely to strike any enterprise as a very good deal and therefore it is not likely to result in what can be a very useful exploitation of the seabed resources. And so we felt that it is a seriously flawed element of the treaty and therefore we have not signed. Other elements of the treaty which have been worked on a long time, I know, are broadly satisfactory to the United States and we intend to live by them.

Q. I would like to address my question to Secretary Shultz. In your statement, you mentioned your support, moral, political and diplomatic support, for Prince Sihanouk and for Son Sann and then you also added that you will not have any dealings with the Khmer Rouge. I don't hold any brief for the Khmer Rouge. In fact, I am against them, but is there any purpose in your emphasis on this question at this time, and I would like to know whether ASEAN Ministers explained to you why ASEAN supports the Khmer Rouge as part of Democratic Kampuchean Coalition?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The reason why we don't support the Khmer Rouge is because of their very cruel behavior when they were in charge. We support the Sihanouk and Son Sann approach to government because we think they represent the prospect of a return to a sovereign and democratic Kampuchea and are joined in an effort to bring about the removal of the forces of Vietnam from Kampuchea according to the principles and programs set by the ASEAN countries.

MINISTER DHANABALAN. Excuse me, can I make a correction? There was an assumption in your question that ASEAN supports the Khmer Rouge. I must make a correction. We do not support the Khmer Rouge. We recognize the Government of Democratic Kampuchea. We support the Son Sann and Sihanouk factions and we are supporting the coalition government in order to enable the KPNLF and Prince Sihanouk's groups to grow. So the assumption in your question is quite wrong.

Q. I would like to address my question to the Japanese Foreign Minister. This is regarding the Japanese plan to repatriate Kampuchean refugees from Thailand back to Cambodia. I believe no one present on the panel here today recognizes the Phnom Penh regime or has had contact with it. But I would like to find out what kind of message should be directed at the Phonm Penh government in order to bring this repatriation about. And can the Minister explain what means are being considered at the moment—the physical mechanisms—to get these refugees back?

MINISTER ABE. In Thailand alone, there are currently approximately 160,000 refugees who are still here. The issue was discussed at the dialog that we held with the ASEAN partners and this is rooted in the proposal that we presented last year. In last year's meeting, we presented a proposal to establish a voluntary return center for the refugees in the western part of Cambodia and we said that we will provide enough funds to implement such a center. Of course, I must point out that all the management and implementing measures will be taken by an appropriate international agency. Ever since last year, this idea has not progressed. But, in view of the fact that there are many refugees who wish to return on a voluntary basis under the condition that the implementation will be undertaken by an international agency, we proposed that we will be ready to provide enough funds and assistance in order to implement such an idea.

Q. My question is for the U.S. Secretary of State. Sir, I would like to ask you to expand on your remarks concerning a growing Soviet threat to the region specifically focused on Cam Ranh Bay and Da Nang. Ever since I have been out here, U.S. policymakers have spoken of a growing Soviet threat to the region based on Soviet activities there. But we get very few specifics, so if you could expand on what the Soviets are doing.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I think we have to start with their support for the Vietnamese invasion of Kampuchea. That is point one. Point two is the use of those bases. And point three, so far as we can see, is the gradual shift to using the bases as home ports or basing areas, particularly for submarines so that they are able to project their sea power into this region. Those are examples of the growth of Soviet influence.

Q. But U.S. policymakers said almost precisely the same thing 3 years ago. Is there any indication now that the Soviets are setting up permanent facilities in Vietnam as opposed to temporary facilities, or only using Vietnamese facilities?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, those bases are there, and ports are there, and they regard them as places to station themselves—I don't know whether the word permanent is the right word. I hope it isn't. But certainly it is an effort to use those facilities for the purpose of projecting Soviet power into this area. That is the statement that was made.

Q. I have two questions. The first one I would like to address to Secretary of State Shultz. It is in followup to my friend's question on the MIA question. Recently, a few months ago, some of the American team used Thai soil to rescue American MIA's in Laos. But they were not very successful—to mention, Mr. James Bo Gritz's team. Such action has surely soured neighborly relations between Thailand and Laos. Has Washington introduced any measures to prevent such teams from using Thai soil for such action? If not, what is the American policy with regard to the MIA's in Laos when the civilian operations would rescue them? My second question I would like to address to Mr. Hayden about Cambodia. There is so much speculation, and I hope that your trip to Hanoi tomorrow would not be a failure, but in order to pursue the solution for the Cambodian question, I think I am on the side of Australia in bridging the gap between the two countries. My question is: Do you have any other options in mind—let's say, for example, an Australian proposal for a comprehensive political settlement by bridging the so-called modalities and substance between the two groupings, or, for example, in a large international conference, to accommodate the two parties for a peaceful settlement? Thank you.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. As to your first question, I am not sure that I understood it clearly, but to the extent that I did, it involves how to approach this issue. And, of course, any means that can be effective we are for. And there have been private efforts organized. There is a joint center that works on it, but principally we believe that work through official channels is probably the most effective method in the long run. It is a problem sometimes that people wanting to be helpful, may push into something and raise hopes and they are dashed, and so on. But, clearly, we are anxious to have any method used that will help return the remains of the deceased and provide information for us and for the families involved, on those who are missing.

MR. HAYDEN. If I could answer the second question—we have certain principles we have declared. They are fairly common with those declared by other interested parties; withdrawal of Vietnamese forces from Kampuchea and self-determination within Kampuchea; the neutralization, independence, and nonalignment of Kampuchea; normalization of relationships within the region; and, respect and preservation of the territorial sovereignty of countries of the region. They seem to be fairly common principles and, as we understand it, recently have been expressed by a Vietnamese spokesperson. I guess the task I see ahead of me is trying to sort out to what extent there is some sort of common understanding as to the interpretation of those declarations. In spite of the commonality of interests, there hasn't been much success in getting people together. Having said all that, we approach the task before us with a great deal of caution and respect for its daunting quality. As I've said many times before, on the balance of probabilities, we shouldn't expect to achieve much success. For all that, we are prepared to go ahead and enter into some sort of discussion. The task we embark upon is nothing more than that.

Q. This is for Mr. Shultz. Your last answer just raised my question into a two-parter. You say that any means that would be effective we are for. Are you saying, then, that if you were convinced that a private mission to look for MIA's would be effective, you would not be against it or you would not try to stop it? And the second part of my question has to do with the Kampuchean coalition, and if I understand U.S. policy correctly, the United States is willing to give political and moral support to the coalition but not military aid. Could you be specific as to why military aid to the coalition would not be productive, or rather, why it would be counterproductive?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. On the first question, I think the key word is "if it has a good chance of being effective." On the second question, we feel that we can support them, of course, as we do through our security relationship with the Thais. But, insofar as other support is concerned, we think that nonmilitary support is the kind of thing that we should do in support of the ASEAN effort here.

Q. My question is directed to Mr. Mochtar. Discussions have taken place on the future of the New Zealand force in Singapore and Australian Air Force units in Malaysia. Do the Five see the maintenance of these forces in place as a significant factor in the maintenance of a united stand against Hanoi on the question of Vietnam's occupation of Kampuchea?

FOREIGN MINISTER MOCHTAR. I think in ASEAN, there is a healthy principle which we keep. We make a distinction between bilateral relations of the individual countries on which we don't comment because that is their own business and ASEAN matters. I don't see the relation between the forces you mention and the ASEAN position on Kampuchea.

Q. My question is addressed to the Thai Foreign Minister in his role as chairman. I would like to know whether the ASEAN Ministers have any reservations about Mr. Hayden's forthcoming visit to Vietnam, and whether the ASEAN Ministers see Mr. Hayden as performing any role on their behalf. If I may, I'd also like to ask Mr. Shultz whether he has raised the question of the American MIA's with Mr. Hayden with a view to perhaps Mr. Hayden raising it with the authorities in Hanoi?

MR. SIDDHI. Well, I think that Mr. Hayden had a dialog with us, among ASEAN. Yesterday, we explained our position very clearly. I think that Mr. Hayden understands very well. So, as this is an international problem, we have no reservations concerning Mr. Hayden's trip to Hanoi. We also told Mr. Hayden the progress that we have made thus far. If he can probe further and get more information for us, it would be very useful to our search for peace and a political solution for Kampuchea. I would say that Mr. Hayden has a role to play and we have no reservations about his trip at all.

Q. For Secretary of State Shultz and Mr. Genscher. Secretary Shultz, could you summarize the negotiations with the Soviet Union on intermediate-range nuclear missiles targeted on Western Europe and Asia? Do you see any movement in those negotiations? Have you received a responsible answer from the Soviet Union? I have a followup for Mr. Genscher.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The United States has made proposals in Geneva for reductions in the deployment of the SS–20's and offered first that those weapons should just be eliminated—both the weapons that are planned to be deployed by the United States and the comparable Soviet weapons. Just eliminate them from the face of the earth—that was not acceptable to the Soviet Union. So we have now proposed that they agree to a global limit, that there be some number of warheads that each side would accept as a limit, and we have not specified a number because we felt that there was more room for give-and-take if we said just some equal, verifiable level. So we have proposals on the bargaining table that are reasonable, that have been worked out with our allies, including with Mr. Genscher and his government, and that are global. At this point, I can't tell you, I am sorry to say, that there has been any reasonable response, but we are there at the negotiating table and so is the Soviet Union and if there can be a negotiated outcome, we obviously would regard that as constructive.

MR. GENSCHER. We have always felt that the Soviet Union will be ready for serious negotiations only if it is firmly convinced that the intended deployment in Western Europe will take place if no results have been achieved at the negotiating table. This will be one of the important points to be discussed during the forthcoming visit to Moscow which will take place next week. We should leave no doubt about the fact that, unless concrete negotiating results are achieved, deployment of U.S. intermediate range nuclear missiles in Western Europe will take place. Western Europe means the Federal Republic, Italy, and the United Kingdom as this was decided by NATO in December 1979.

Q. May I address a question to the ASEAN Foreign Ministers? ASEAN is very successful in staging one conference after another. You had the meeting with the EEC in April and now you have the post-ministerial conference with the dialog countries, but my impression is that more and more time is dedicated to the Kampuchean conflict and I wonder whether you have chosen the right dialog countries. Therefore, I would like to ask you what was the criteria to choose dialog countries? And, secondly, wouldn't it have been better to choose other dialog countries, for instance, Vietnam or China or Moscow?

MINISTER DHANABALAN. Can I answer the question? It is quite wrong to say that we have spent all our time talking about Kampuchea. We had two sessions with the dialog countries. One was what we call the five plus six; that is all of us together. We spent the whole of yesterday morning and then we met with each of the dialog partners. In the meeting of the five plus six, I would say we probably spent about 25–30 percent of the time talking about Kampuchea. In the five plus one, almost the entire time was devoted to economic and other issues and not Kampuchea. So your question is not even based on the right reading of what went on here.

Q. What impact, in fact, are the discussions on the common issues going to have on the current UNCTAD meeting? Is there going to be a softening of the stand? Because of the discussions, are these a part of the negotiating tactics which they normally (inaudible)? At first, they start with the (inaudible) and then later on (inaudible) they modify their postures. Would the United States, for instance, ratify the Common Fund as a result of the discussion?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. From the standpoint of the United States, we consider the development of the developing world to be of critical importance to us—our trading relationship, our strategic relationships with Third World countries are of great significance, and therefore, we have devoted a great deal of thought and attention to this issue. We have expressed ourselves in a constructive spirit and we have gone to the UNCTAD meeting in that same manner. We feel that the general tenor of the discussions at UNCTAD, and at other places, is becoming more and more realistic and concerned with the operational aspects of development. There are a vast number of points on which people now agree, in particular, the importance of trade and investment, as well as aid, to the development process. The industrial countries must be willing to take the products of the developing world if they are to get anywhere. Just to give a number, I believe that the earnings which flow to the ASEAN countries from trade exceed those from aid, including from multilateral lending institutions, by a factor of thirty, so you can see the relative importance of trade.

As far as the Common Fund is concerned, our view is that the problem of very volatile commodity prices has classically been a genuine problem for both the producing and consuming countries. But we do not feel that the way to get at that problem is to try to have a broad scheme of price controls. Although there is a buffer in there in terms of working through the mechanism of commodity agreements, the Common Fund involves raising money in order to implement what would be purchasing policies by commodity agreements to maintain certain price levels. We think that, in the end, it wouldn't work. It would bankrupt the Fund. We believe that a better approach to this problem is to look at it from the standpoint of the income flows to countries that are especially affected by the commodity price issue, and in that regard, the IMF compensatory financing approach appeals to us more. So, we haven't found the Common Fund approach one that we think is workable. It is not a question of ideology. It is a question of workability, and, of course, we are ready to look with people at the practical aspects of the Common Fund and other means, but at this point we are not convinced that it will really serve the purpose for which it was intended.

Q. I would like to direct a question to the Indonesian Foreign Minister. Foreign Minister Abe has been saying that Japan intends to increase aid to Laos, and in your speech in today's Japan-ASEAN meeting, ASEAN accepts the continuation of Japanese aid to Laos but you said that ASEAN does not feel that such aid should be increased. Does this statement represent the views of all ASEAN nations, and if so—this question might be directed to Mr. Abe—if so, what is Japan going to do? Is Japan going to keep on with its original plan?

MR. MOCHTAR. I think our position has been made clear in the statement this morning. I think the thrust of the statement is that any aid to Laos should not end up giving assistance to the occupation of Kampuchea. That is the gist of it. And, as for the other part of the question, maybe Mr. Abe can answer.

MINISTER ABE. Concerning this Kampuchean question, Japan strongly supports ASEAN's position and, until the Vietnamese forces are withdrawn from Kampuchea, Japan will continue to freeze aid to Vietnam. Laos, however, is not Vietnam, and Laos has not invaded Kampuchea. Of course, Laos may be influenced by the Vietnamese, but Laos is an LDC, a less-developed country. We have been providing Laos with humanitarian aid even though that aid has been scaled down since the occurrence of the Kampuchean problem. But, in view of this interdependent relationship we have with Laos and from the standpoint of providing humanitarian assistance to Laos, this aid to Laos will continue. But I wish to make one thing clear—that this aid will not in any way serve to strengthen the Vietnamese at all. This will be strictly used for the improvement of the people's welfare in Laos. Even if the aid to Laos were to be increased, I do not believe that it will contradict in any way ASEAN's position. Of course, we do not envisage any drastic increase of our humanitarian aid to Laos, but when necessity arises, it may be increased by some small scale.

MODERATOR. Since Their Excellencies will have to attend a function in a very short period of time and there are still three more questions waiting to be posed, could you please be short and concise?

Q. Mr. Genscher, what is your assessment of the political impact of this dialog which has taken place here on the general East-West relationship?

MR. GENSCHER. It has always been the policy of the countries of the European Community not to transfer the West-East conflict to other regions of the world. And so I think it is clear that this political dialog which has taken place between the member countries of ASEAN and the member countries of the European Community—the United States, Canada, New Zealand, Japan, and Australia—may make an essential contribution toward the policy of greater stability, both politically and economically, in the world. And, seen against this background, this present dialog could very well have a stabilizing effect on East-West relations. For this purpose, however, it would be necessary for both sides—not only the Western countries but the Soviet Union and its allies, as well—to pursue a policy characterized by moderation all over the world.

In other words, by noninterference in the affairs of other countries and by the consistent application of the principle of the non-use of force. In practical terms, this means the withdrawal of Soviet forces from Afghanistan and the withdrawal of Vietnamese forces from Kampuchea.

Q. Mr. Shultz, according to reports in today's newspapers, you inferred at yesterday's meeting that Australia's initiatives on Kampuchea were stupid. Did you use that word, and, if so, in what context?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I used the word but not in any respect with regard to Australia. I used the word in characterizing a process. We were discussing negotiations and I said it seems to me that sometimes we get involved in a process where we say that we want to be reasonable and we do want to be reasonable and we make a proposal and the other side says no. And so people say, "Be reasonable. Make another proposal." So we make another proposal. And the other side says no. So we move, and so they say, "Well, you've got to be reasonable. Make another proposal." And I say, in that process, we are being reasonable. We are being stupid. And the point is that when we are engaged in the process of bargaining, we should be bargaining with our opposite number at the bargaining table and not with ourselves. That was the origin of the remark "stupid" and it wasn't applied to anybody. I don't know how the press possibly cooked up that characterization.

Q. My first question is directed to Mr. Hayden. What will Australia's position be at the United Nations with regard to Democratic Kampuchea? My second question is toward the Japanese Minister who just said that Japan will make sure that its humanitarian aid to Laos will strictly be used for humanitarian purposes. Has Japan worked out some sort of mechanism to make sure that this aid will only be for humanitarian purposes?

MR. HAYDEN. For Australia's part, we will make a determination on our attitude about that matter at the United Nations when it is closer to being discussed at the United Nations. At this point we recognize no government in Kampuchea and we recognize one of the elements of the so-called democratic coalition government as it presents itself.

MINISTER ABE. Under the Japanese economic cooperation scheme, we only provide economic cooperation after thorough and intensive consultation with the recipient government as to the usage of the cooperation which will be extended. This will be done in a very close, detailed manner. Japan has diplomatic relations with Laos and our aid to Laos had been only that humanitarian aid that I mentioned. We will continue to make sure that under this Japanese system of making closely, detailed studies of how the aid will be used, we will continue to implement the aid directly linked to those humanitarian needs.

MODERATOR. The press conference is adjourned.

Q. I have one last question. The question is to Secretary Shultz. You said earlier that the U.S. Government might be prepared to help private groups try to recover the remains of American servicemen in Vietnam if those efforts appear to have a reasonable chance of success. Can you tell us (1) how that determination will be made; (2) whether we are currently providing aid to any such group; and (3) if Bo Gritz came up with a plan that seemed reasonable, would we support it?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I appreciate your giving me an opportunity to clarify my answer and I think I can concisely do so by saying in response to your third question that the answer is very unlikely, but these things would have to be looked upon case by case.

Q. Thank you very much.

5. The Question of Chemical Warfare

Statement Read by the Department of State Acting Spokesman (Romberg), June 1, 1983 [1]

U.S. Rejection of Hypothesis That Yellow Rain Might Be a Natural Phenomenon

We've seen the press reports on the hypothesis advanced at the American Association for the Advancement of Science, AAAS, in Detroit that the source of yellow rain may be bee excrement.

The hypothesis that yellow rain, trichothecene mycotoxin, may be a natural phenomenon has in fact been exhaustively studied and subsequently rejected by responsible and qualified scientists in and out of government.

Samples of trichothecene mycotoxin taken from actual attack sites comprise only a portion of the total body of evidence that toxins are being used as weapons. The full range of evidence includes eyewitness accounts of attacks by victims, and further testimony by medical and relief workers, journalists, defectors, private U.S. and foreign citizens, and government officials.

Data from other samples, human blood and urine and tissues analyzed following the autopsy of victims have confirmed the presence of trichothecene mycotoxins. Direct interviews with attack victims by medical personnel, information from sensitive intelligence sources, and analysis of toxin residues actually found in the area of attack corroborate our conclusions.

Taken as a whole, this evidence contradicts the natural phenomenon hypothesis. It is incorrect to speculate and draw conclusions on the basis of a narrow analysis, admittedly incomplete, of one limited aspect of a portion of the evidence in isolation from the full range of available data.

Specifically, the notion that trichothecene mycotoxins originate in bee droppings is proven false by the following: One sample residue, droplet, in which toxin was present was removed from a rock at an attack site and weighed 300 milligrams, certainly more than a bee could drop.

The toxic effects of falling yellow rain have been reported to be immediate. The level of toxin causing immediate debilitating and often fatal effects in humans is certainly sufficient to kill a bee. Trichothecene mycotoxin affects all living systems. In short, a bee could not survive to excrete the toxin.

The bee speculation ignores the fact that pollen was not found to be present in all samples analyzed, including three that were found to contain the toxins.

Yellow rain attacks have been limited in both geographical location and to groups resisting the regimes in Laos, Kampuchea, and Afghanistan. If the occurrence of trichothecene mycotoxin were of natural origin, such as from bee droppings, toxic effects would surely be more widespread in the region, afflicting other areas and groups of people. Nothing of the kind has been reported in any of the three countries, nor has such a phenomenon been observed in neighboring countries.

Our evidence continues to mount that trichothecene mycotoxins are being used. We believe that in drawing independent conclusions, people should focus on the entire body of evidence. In the face of this persuasive and incriminating data drawn from multiple sources, speculation which serves to divert attention from the continuing human tragedy in Asia does little to contribute to a solution of the problem.

Note Verbale From the Acting Representative at the United Nations to the U.N. Secretary-General (Peréz de Cuéllar), August 4, 1983 [2]

Further Evidence on the Use of Chemical and Toxin Weapons

The Acting Permanent Representative of the United States of America has the honour to submit a further report on the use of chemical and toxin weapons which contains new evidence available to the United States. It is based on the scientific analysis of a series of blood samples, drawn from victims of earlier toxic attacks in Laos, that were frozen for future analysis, as well as blood samples drawn from victims of a toxic attack in Kampuchea in March of this year.

The United States of America, over the past three years, has submitted a series of reports presenting the evidence in detail and continues to be deeply concerned over the use of chemical and toxin weapons in flagrant violation of international conventions and international law. In view of the concerns of Members of the United Nations as expressed in General Assembly resolutions 35/144 C, 36/96 C and 37/98 D and E,[3] and in view of the study being conducted under your direction on means of dealing with allegations of use of chemical, biological and toxin weapons, it is requested that the enclosed report be circulated at an early date as an official document of the General Assembly under item 61 of the provisional agenda.

ANNEX

FURTHER REPORT ON USE OF CHEMICAL AND TOXIN WEAPONS—NEW EVIDENCE AVAILABLE TO THE UNITED STATES

The United States continues to receive and analyze disturbing evidence and reports of use of chemical and toxin warfare agents in Laos, Kampuchea and Afghanistan. The use of these weapons is a flagrant contravention of two major international agreements and customary international law.

In an ongoing effort to call world attention to the problem, and to secure a halt to the use of these weapons, the United States has periodically released its evidence. Over the past two years, biomedical samples (blood, urine, or tissue) from victims have been analyzed in American laboratories for the presence of T2 and HT2 trichothecene toxins. To date, biomedical samples from 20 victims of eight separate toxin weapon attacks in Laos and three separate attacks in Kampuchea have been shown to contain trichothecene toxins. Control samples, taken from similar individuals who had not been subjected to toxin agent attack, were negative. Additional samples from victims and controls have been collected over the past year and are currently under analysis employing newly developed, more sophisticated, increasingly sensitive, state-of-the-art techniques. The complexity of trichothecene analysis in biomedical samples has necessitated development of new techniques and analytical procedures, a lengthy and tedious process. The levels of trichothecenes detected cannot be attributed to any known natural phenomena. Previously reported analysis results of biomedical and other data may be found in earlier United States submissions.

The following is an account of the results of the analysis of four additional sets of blood samples.

On November 6, 1981, a Lao resistance fighter was injured by a toxic agent grenade in northern Vientiane Province of Laos. Following the blast he experienced severe eye irritation and tearing and was blinded for approximately 30 minutes. Within a few hours, and continuing over a period of several days, he experienced the development of hundreds of small (2 to 5 mm) fluid filled blisters on the exposed areas of his upper torso and edema of the head and neck.

He was assisted to the Nong Khai Hospital in Thailand where the camp physician and a U.S. physician examined him on November 11 (5 days after the attack) and noted the blisters and mild conjunctivitis in both eyes. Blood samples were drawn at that time, chilled and maintained on ice during transit to the United States, and frozen for future analysis.[4] Two blood samples, analyzed at the U.S. Army Chemical Systems Laboratory for the presence of traditional chemical agents, were negative for such agents. Three blood samples were submitted to a private U.S. laboratory for analysis by gas chromatograph-mass spectrometer (GC–MS) technique for the presence of trichothecenes. Detectable levels of T2 and HT2, a metabolite of T2, were found in all three samples of the victim's blood as follows:

Sample No.	T2	HT2
1	9 ppb	6 ppb
2	10 ppb	6 ppb
3	9 ppb	5 ppb

(ppb = parts per billion)

On 24–26 March 1982, at the Nong Khai refugee camp in Thailand blood samples were drawn by U.S. and camp medical personnel from H'Mong refugees who reported symptoms as a result of exposure to aircraft-delivered toxic agent warfare attacks in Laos on the 3d, 11th and 16th of January 1982.

Symptoms reported by the victims included: headache, nausea, vomiting with blood, diarrhea with blood, weakness, vertigo, drunklike sensations, and visual disturbances. As a result of the attacks, of 154 people involved, 44 died within 2 to 5 days of exposure. Analysis of a blood sample from one of the surviving victims, a 10-year-old boy, for T2 and HT2 trichothecene toxins revealed the presence of 32 ppb HT2. This victim also was suffering from malaria and showed a depressed white cell count of 4,200. The blood samples were handled in the same manner as above, and analysis was performed at the same private U.S. laboratory using identical GC–MS techniques.

Also on 24–26 March 1982 at the Nong Khai camp, blood samples were drawn from four H'Mong who had been exposed to attacks on 15 February 1982 in Laos. The survivors reported that two attacks were directed against several villages with a collective death count estimated to be between 85–100 people. Most of the villagers' chickens and half of their pigs also died. Rice, tapioca, and other crops were affected as well. Symptoms reported by the victims included: fever, headache, nausea, vomiting, diarrhea, double vision, coughing, chest pain, eye irritation and tearing, hearing difficulty, fatigue, and jaundice.

Blood samples from these victims were handled and analyzed as with the others, for the presence of T2 and HT2 trichothecene toxins. The blood of one of the victims showed the presence of 28 ppb T2 and 16 ppb HT2 toxin. This individual, a 35-year-old male, had also been exposed to a previous toxic agent attack in mid-December 1981.

Blood was drawn at the same time from three control individuals in the camp who had not been subjected to a toxic agent attack. These control samples were analyzed for T2 and HT2 trichothecene toxins with negative results.

On March 20, 1983, at Khao Din refugee camp in Thailand, near the Kampuchean border, three young Kampuchean women aged 18, 19, and 25, complaining of effects of a toxic agent, were examined by physicians. The three victims complained of symptoms typical of past trichothecene toxin exposure victims. They had become ill on March 9 after passing through an area in Kampuchea reported to have been subjected to a toxic agent attack on March 4 and 5. Blood samples were drawn from each victim and from two control individuals who were living in the same area under the same conditions as the victims, but who had not been exposed to any toxic agent.

The blood samples were analyzed by a private United States laboratory for the presence of T2 and HT2 toxins. One of the victims still had detectable levels of both T2 and HT2 (19 ppb T2 and 32 ppb HT2, respectively) in her blood. Blood samples from both control individuals were negative for both toxins.

[4] Due to the volume of samples received and the limited capacity of the laboratories conducting the analyses, it has been necessary to freeze some biomedical samples while higher priority samples were analyzed. Since only one victim was sampled in this attack, it initially received a low priority. [Footnote in the source text.]

All samples were submitted on a blind, coded basis to a private United States laboratory. Blood samples were precipitated with acetone and filtered. The filtrate was evaporated to dryness, dissolved in methanol: water (1:19, v/v) and passed through a XAD-2 column. The 90 percent methanol eluate was collected and dried on a steam bath. The samples were analyzed on a HP-5985B gas chromatograph-mass spectrometer data system.

Statement by the Representative in the First Committee of the U.N. General Assembly (Solarz), November 4, 1983 [5]

"Based on U.S. Government Reports . . . We Believe That the Soviet Union and Its Allies Have Violated the 1925 Geneva Protocol on Chemical Weapons and the 1972 Convention on Biological and Toxin Weapons"

Mr. Chairman, since August of 1980, the Government of the United States has reported periodically to this Committee, to the Secretary-General, and to Member States on its findings regarding chemical warfare in Afghanistan and Southeast Asia. I refer you in particular to the reports "Chemical Warfare in Southeast Asia and Afghanistan," released on March 22, 1982 and circulated as U.N. document A/37/157, and "Chemical Warfare in Southeast Asia and Afghanistan: An Update," released in November 1982 and circulated as U.N. document A/C.1/31/10. [6] Our most recent report was submitted to the Secretary-General in August of this year. [7]

The United Nations is a singularly appropriate institution to address this question, because the use of illegal chemical weapons poses a threat to every member-state of the United Nations, but most of all to those developing countries least able to protect themselves against such attacks. It is, indeed, only in the developing nations that such weapons have been used since World War I. Only if we speak out and take appropriate action here will the terror end over there.

Based on U.S. Government reports, as well as international reports on this issue, we believe that the Soviet Union and its allies have violated the 1925 Geneva Protocol on Chemical Weapons and the 1972 Convention on Biological and Toxin Weapons. [8] It is a long way from the walls of the Kremlin to the rugged mountains of Afghanistan, the serene hills of Laos, and the lush jungles of Kampuchea. But, by some evil logic, and in callous disregard for human life, the Government of the Soviet Union has decided to use chemical weapons to further its expansionist foreign policy aims, or, at least, to test these weapons on Asian peoples.

My government realizes full well that these are serious charges, as do the other governments that have made them. Yet there are still countries who question these charges. Similarly while many experts, who are technically qualified to make judgments on the matter, have concluded that chemical warfare has taken place, there are others who challenge the validity or relevance of this conclusion.

Most governments genuinely share the abhorrence with which the United States regards chemical warfare, and share our commitment to end it once and for all. Allow me now to review briefly my Government's evidence and to tell you why, in spite of conflicting claims, that we believe, beyond a shadow of a doubt, that illegal chemical weapons have been used in Southeast Asia and Afghanistan.

First, as of late last year, several thousand refugees had reported from over 200 chemical warfare attacks in Laos, over 100 in Kampuchea, and around 60 in Afghanistan. The earliest attacks took place in Laos in the mid-1970's, and the most recent in Southeast Asia this past summer. The refugees described substances of various colors having been released from airplanes or helicopters onto villages or resistance forces. In many cases, according to the reports, the symptoms associated with trichothecene poisoning appeared, in both humans and animals, soon after the attacks.

Second, scientific analysis by highly sophisticated methods of scrapings of agent residue taken from rocks and vegetation in reported attack areas in Laos, Kampuchea, and Afghanistan have revealed concentrations and combinations of mycotoxin trichothecenes never before observed anywhere in nature. Mycotoxins are not present in control samples taken from areas surrounding the point of attack. The testing of these samples was conducted by both U.S. Government and independent university scientists. The samples have been shared with other governments.

Third, scientific analysis by highly sophisticated methods of twenty samples of blood, urine, and tissue from reported victims of chemical warfare attacks have shown unprecedented concentrations and combinations of trichothecenes. The toxins are not found in control samples taken from individuals with a similar life history to the victims and who did not report being attacked.

Fourth, doctors who have worked as part of the international and private relief effort along the borders to which the victims of chemical warfare have fled almost uniformly report finding signs and symptoms which are not consistent with any known disease, but which do conform to symptoms associated with trichothecene poisoning. These doctors are citizens of France, India, the Philippines, Canada, and the United States.

Fifth, testimony from defectors who served in the Lao, Vietnamese, and Afghan armed forces, some of whom were involved in actual attacks, describes in minute detail the procedures employed in chemical warfare attacks and documents supervision by Soviet personnel.

If chemical warfare is occurring, as my government is convinced it is, then the Soviet Union is surely responsible. It is doubtful that Vietnam, Laos and Afghanistan have the scientific or technical capacity to manufacture these illegal substances. The Soviet Union does have that capacity. Can anyone doubt who has provided chemical weapons to these countries?

A number of people and nations have attempted to deny or explain away the accumulating evidence. Given the scientific complexity of the issue and the difficulties of collecting data, fair-minded governments and individuals can be excused for being somewhat uncertain. On close examination, however, none of the alternative hypotheses that have been put forward stand up to critical examination.

Most easily dismissed is the Soviet Union's own defense, which is hardly a defense at all. Moscow's undocumented charges of slander, distortion, and fabrication by the United States are not worth a reply. The United Nations own group of experts examined the Soviet critiques and gave them no credence whatsoever.

Some observers have taken issue with the testimony of refugees, which they suppose to be the principal foundation of the United States Government's case. These accounts are unreliable, it is said, because they are offered by individuals who have a political or personal axe to grind, or because they are in the grip of some sort of cultural hysteria.

Even if my Government were relying solely on refugee testimony, which it certainly is not, the stories of the victims are not to be dismissed. They come from a wide variety of Khmer, Hmong, and Afghan refugees, several thousand in number, ranging from little children to the elderly, who came from a variety of locations over a period of several years. The fact that many refugees do not report chemical attacks belies the theory of mass hysteria, thus lending greater credence to the accounts of the victims.

Regrettably, many people continue to regard refugee reports as inherently unreliable. History should teach us to open our ears. Refugees have a record of being excellent sources of information on inaccessible societies and situations.

The first, early reports of the holocaust occurring in Nazi-occupied Europe were brought by people fleeing the terror. Despite the tendency of those who received these reports to dismiss them as implausible and inconceivable, they turned out to be true. Tragically, millions died before the horror ended.

I could cite other, more recent cases where the stories of refugees in Asia, Africa, and Latin America have been initially dismissed, but were subsequently confirmed. It strains credulity to believe that the refugees escaping "Yellow Rain" in Asia, alone among all the victims of repression, are uniquely engaged in a monumental hoax.

Finally, there are claims that mycotoxins are naturally present in Southeast Asia, as a result of fungi growing on vegetation, and on pollen excreted by bees. This would explain, it is argued, why trichothecenes have been found in the scrapings and medical samples.

I refer you, however, to the conclusion of a Canadian toxicologist who prepared a report for the Department of External Affairs of the Government of Canada: "Potential producers of trichothecenes exist in Southeast Asia, but neither naturally occurring diseases due to these toxins occur, nor are there any detectable levels of mycotoxins in the natural environment." [9]

The concentrations found in the "Yellow Rain" samples are orders of magnitude higher than those found by sophisticated techniques to have occurred naturally. The combination of trichothecenes in the Yellow Rain samples are unique. And, it should be remembered, trichothecenes are known to exist in nature only in temperate climates.

The truth is that no matter how hard those who prefer to see and hear and speak no evil may try, the evidence simply cannot be explained away. I must confess that I too was originally skeptical of the validity of the Yellow Rain case. But on the basis of a review of the evidence, congressional hearings, and conversations with doctors, scientists, and victims, my doubts have vanished.

Other countries have also conducted their own investigations. We would hope that more will do so. I have already made reference to studies conducted for the Government of Canada, the principal conclusions of which are as follows:

1. The events that are reported to take place at the time of alleged chemical warfare attacks cannot be explained on the basis of naturally occurring diseases.

2. Judging on the basis of eyewitness reports it appears that three different types of agents have been employed as warfare agents, one of them being "Yellow Rain." The others are green and white.

3. Most of the features described with "Yellow Rain" attacks are consistent with trichothecene mycotoxicosis.

4. Although certain types of mycotoxins occur in Thailand and probably also in surrounding countries, there is no history of evidence that they result in diseases with the symptomatology of trichothecene poisoning.

The governments of other countries have come to conclusions similar to those of the Government of the United States. Member countries of the United Nations have expressed their concern about the use of these weapons in General Assembly Resolutions 35/144C, 36/96C, 37/89D [37/98D], and 37/98E. Predictably, to no one's surprise, the Soviet Union and its allies voted against all these resolutions.

The United Nations own group of experts has played an important investigatory role. Formed in December 1980 in accordance with the U.N. General Assembly Resolution A/35/144C under the auspices of the Secretary-General, the group submitted its interim report a year later. Through Resolution A/36/96 C, the General Assembly extended its mandate for another year.

This group of experts, consisting of impartial experts from non-aligned countries, submitted its final report to the General Assembly on December 1, 1982. This report regarded as "unlikely to be valid" the Soviet interpretation that the presence of trichothecenes in samples tested was somehow connected with United States use of Agent Orange in Vietnam. The group did conclude, however, that, on the basis of interviews with doctors and victims, and of examination of physical samples, "it could not disregard the circumstantial evidence suggestive of the possible use of some sort of toxic chemical substance in some instances."

[9] Reference is to the Canadian report entitled "A Study of the Possible Use of Chemical Warfare Agents in Southeast Asia; A Report to the Department of External Affairs" (1982), by Dr. H.B. Shiefer, University of Saskatchewan.

The group of experts did not reach a more definitive judgment because it was not permitted to make an on-site investigation in Laos, Kampuchea, and Afghanistan. The inability of the group of experts to arrive at a more definitive conclusion should not be laid at the door of the group. It was due to the rejection by the authorities controlling those countries of the group's request to undertake such investigations.

If the allies of the Soviet Union are really innocent of the charges, why did they not permit an independent inquiry to clear their name? If United Nations agricultural experts are welcomed in Laos, why not chemical weapons experts? The areas involved do not contain vital military installations, knowledge of which would jeopardize the security of those countries. What do they have to hide?

The Government of the United States believes it important that impartial and objective investigators have access to the affected areas. The rulers in Moscow, Hanoi, Vientiane, and Phnom Penh do not appear to share that belief. It seems clear that they know full well that such an investigation would not be exculpatory.

My government hopes that appropriate arrangements will soon be in place to allow the continued investigation of any further report of chemical weapons use. Meanwhile, the only responsible course for those governments who believe that such weapons have been used is to speak out and to act in accordance with the preponderance of evidence.

Mr. Chairman, we must not minimize the implications of this affront to the international conscience, of this retreat into inhuman barbarism.

The first implication concerns warfare itself. For over 5 decades, chemical and toxin weapons had been successfully eliminated from the battlefields of the world. In World War II, fear of retaliation was an effective deterrent to the use of chemical warfare among the developed countries, and remains so today. Developing countries, however, do not possess the means to retaliate. Condemnation of the governments responsible for using chemical weapons is the only recourse they have.

The second implication bears on international law. The prohibition on the use of chemical weapons has, by reason of the practice and affirmations of states, become a part of the rules of customary international law which are binding on all states. Toxins—biologically-produced chemical substances—fall within the prohibitions of both the 1925 Geneva Protocol and the 1972 Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention. Unless those who cynically violate these agreements are called to account, the continued viability of those agreements will be brought into question.

Third, violation of the world's oldest arms control agreement, the 1925 Geneva Protocol, puts other arms control and disarmament agreements in potential—I repeat, potential—jeopardy. Some have argued that Soviet defiance of international norms through the use of chemical and toxin weapons proves that arms control cannot work. If the Soviets blatantly violate two important international treaties, they contend, what will keep them from violating other arms control agreements as well?

By this logic, one would soon adopt a defeatist attitude regarding any arms control agreement. My Government cannot and will not accept such a gloomy scenario. It believes that arms control agreements with effective verification and compliance mechanisms are both possible and necessary.

The position of the Government of the United States is clear. Let me repeat: We are committed to the development of a convention that would prohibit the development, production, stockpiling, acquisition, retention, and transfer of chemical weapons. The convention should mandate the declaration and destruction of all existing stockpiles of chemical weapons, and of facilities for their production and filling. And it should include effective verification provisions to provide confidence that all parties are complying with all provisions of the convention. My Government regrets that the Government of the Soviet Union has been unwilling to negotiate seriously on verification procedures, specifically on-site inspection, on which such an agreement depends.

Until such a convention is concluded, the Government of the United States will continue to work with other members of the international community in an effort to stop the outrage of chemical warfare in Southeast Asia, Afghanistan and anywhere else. Moreover, we support efforts to strengthen the 1972 Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention and to enforce the existing legal constraints against the use of these weapons.

In December 1982, the UN General Assembly recommended by an overwhelming vote to call on the states that are parties to the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention to hold a special conference to establish effective procedures for compliance with its provisions. [10] In addition, the General Assembly also requested the Secretary-General to establish procedures to investigate promptly possible violations of the 1925 Geneva Protocol. [11] We believe it is important that both resolutions be implemented promptly, and we will continue to participate in follow-on actions.

Having said that, I cannot stress too strongly that the use of chemical weapons in Afghanistan and Southeast Asia, in violation of international law and any moral standard, should stir all nations of the world. This is not a propaganda match between East and West. It is a conflict between right and wrong, between morality and immorality, and between humanity and inhumanity. One would hope that the United Nations would make clear on which side it stands.

As a representative of the United States Government and a member of the United States Congress, I wish to convey the deep concern that my colleagues in Congress and the American people as a whole feel about this issue. It is in that spirit that I would like to conclude with the timeless words of the English poet, John Donne:

> "No man is an island, entire of itself; every man is a piece on the continent, a part of the main. If a clod be washed away by the sea, Europe is the less, as well as if a promontory were: Any man's death diminishes me, because I am involved in mankind. And therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls; it tolls for thee."

I cannot resist the obvious paraphrase: Ask not on whom the Yellow Rain falls—it falls on thee.

[10] U.N. General Assembly Resolution 37/98 A, Prohibition of Chemical and Bacteriological Weapons, passed 95–1, with 46 abstentions, on December 13, 1982. The United States voted against the resolution.

6. The Question of Narcotics

Document 460

Prepared Statement by the Assistant Secretary of State for International Narcotics Matters (DiCarlo) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, March 18, 1983 (Extract) [1]

Narcotics Production and Trafficking in Southeast Asia

Mr. Chairman: Our testimony addresses narcotics production and trafficking from the Golden Triangle of Southeast Asia and the Golden Crescent of Southwest Asia, with particular focus on heroin imports into the United States from opium produced in those regions.

As requested by the Subcommittee, we are providing information on the U.S. strategy, Administration priorities, and cooperative efforts by major Federal organizations; data on shifts and trends in narcotics production and trafficking; descriptions of U.S. and other programs to assist the actions of governments in the region; perspectives on our relationships with those governments; and our assessments of results being achieved.

For complete text, see ibid., pp. 500–510. Omitted here are two appendices to DiCarlo's prepared statement.

OVERVIEW

Narcotics production

Heroin is our primary concern in both Southeast and Southwest Asia. Production estimates for opium production in Burma, Thailand, Pakistan and other countries are provided in the appendix to this testimony.

Heroin imports have fallen since the peak year of 1975, when 7.5 tons were imported. Since then, there has been a reduction in the number of users, and reduced production in Mexico resulting from the successful Mexican opium poppy eradication program. In 1979 and 1980, drought caused reduced production in Southeast Asia but bumper crops have been reported from that region in the past two years. These supply factors altered the profile of U.S. imports. In 1979, Southwest Asia passed Southeast Asia as the prime opium source for U.S. heroin, and subsequently has dominated the U.S. market. While drought, low prices and a government ban on cultivation sharply reduced Pakistani production in 1980, 1981, and 1982, there is still a considerable stockpile from prior harvests and subsequent Pakistani and Afghan production.

Southeast Asian traffickers are attempting to recapture markets in the United States and Europe, while expanding their markets in Southeast Asia, Australia, New Zealand and Canada.

The principal route for narcotics from the Golden Triangle crosses the Thai/Burma frontier; this border area remains the primary site of the region's heroin refineries. Once, trafficking in opium involved huge caravans of mules; although smaller caravans continue, trafficking today is often accomplished by truck or river boat, and human portage of morphine base. While most Golden Triangle narcotics are transported out of Burma's Shan State and across Thailand to reach the outside world, new routes have also been developed along the Burmese Tenassirim coast to Malaysia, or south through central Burma to the Andaman Sea, and then to Malaysia and Singapore. Other new routes cross into India. Hong Kong, Penang, Kuala Lumpur and Singapore, as well as Bangkok, provide way stations for international narcotics traffic and banking facilities for "laundering" the enormous amounts of money generated by the narcotics trade. Major international airports remain the preferred departure areas for traffickers. In an effort to avoid detection, couriers are taking circuitous routes which include the People's Republic of China.

Since 1978 increasing amounts of Southwest Asian opium have moved through Turkey to the European and U.S. markets. Pakistan, Turkey, and Italy have become important refining centers for converting Southwest Asian opium into heroin. Karachi has become an important international sea and air transshipment point; seizures of heroin have also increased significantly from flights originating in Islamabad and Lahore. Large shipments of heroin have also been seized while moving by road toward Iran. Pakistan's 1982 heroin seizure total was over 1600 kilograms, more than triple the amount of heroin seized in the country during 1981. Increasing amounts are consumed by Pakistan's growing heroin addict population.

The accuracy of intelligence estimates varies by country and region. For example, estimates for opium production in Thailand are based on aerial surveys while estimates for Burma and other countries are based on less exact field observations. Our Bureau is working with other units of government to improve the collection and analysis of narcotics intelligence.

Factors influencing narcotics control

There are factors which we believe are improving the opportunities for narcotics control. The abuse of heroin, cocaine, marijuana and other dangerous drugs is causing social, psychological, economic and health problems, not only in the United States and other industrialized, consumer countries, but in nations where these drugs are produced and transshipped.

Western Europe has 220,000 to 330,000 heroin addicts, compared to 387,000 to 453,000 in the United States—and both currently have intolerable levels of youthful abuse of cocaine, marijuana and other dangerous drugs. Estimates of the number of heroin addicts in Malaysia range from 100,000 to 300,000 out of a population of nearly 15 million; and there are 300,000 to 500,000 heroin addicts out of a population of 50 million in Thailand. There is a similar pattern of heroin abuse emerging in Southwest Asia, where opium use has also been traditional. There are an estimated 50,000 heroin addicts in Pakistan, and an estimated 50,000 heroin addicts (and one million opium addicts) in Iran. These are considerably higher ratios for heroin addiction than in the United States.

Moreover, trafficking profits are supporting warlord groups such as the Shan United Army and insurgent groups like the Burmese Communist Party, both operating on the Thai-Burmese border and fighting for control of the opium/heroin trade in the Golden Triangle. There are also reports of linkages between drug traffickers and insurgents in South America, where drug trade dollars, the diversion of labor, and associated criminal activities are destabilizing social, political and economic infrastructures. Narcotics trafficking is a criminal transaction which undermines legitimate business through narco-dollar investments, drives up real estate prices, diverts labor away from traditional commercial enterprise, and corrupts law enforcement and other officials at many levels of government. Increasingly, narcotics trafficking is a violent enterprise, here and abroad.

The incentives to act are not just the diplomatic urgings and economic assistance offered by the United States, other governments and international agencies; today, there is also the stimulus of self-interest. These factors determine our opportunities for action, and thus shape our strategies.

Opportunities for action

As noted in more detail below, the Administration's international narcotics control program emphasizes crop control, supported by interdiction and other enforcement programs operating as close to the source as possible.

To a great extent, our ability to control international narcotics production and trafficking is dependent upon the effectiveness of the control programs undertaken by other governments.

Illicit opium for the international heroin market is produced in Afghanistan, Iran, Pakistan, Laos, Burma, Thailand and Mexico. The situations in the six Asian countries are different from those encountered in Turkey and Mexico, where effective opium control programs have been implemented. Turkey and Mexico were successful in controlling opium production because both had governments with the political will and capability to enforce their laws in the growing areas. No truly similar situations presently exist among other producer nations. For reasons unrelated to narcotics control, we have not executed agreements on narcotics control with Laos, Afghanistan, and Iran. The central governments in Burma and Pakistan do not yet have necessary control in all growing areas. We are dealing with less developed countries with generally fragile economic subsystems. Political instability is a factor. We are negotiating with the fourth Bolivian Government in 18 months.

At this time, it is not possible to engage all producer governments in eradication programs to the degree desired by the United States. At this time, it is not possible to obtain commitments from all producer governments covering all growing areas. We are making progress; we are receiving cooperation from governments on both crop control and interdiction; but, we have not obtained all of the agreements needed; some agreements have not been implemented to the degree desired; and we do not yet have control.

Legislation

We do not believe new legislation is needed in the international area. But, our foreign program would be enhanced by effective domestic efforts to reduce demand, interdict trafficking, and seize trafficker assets. In part, the responsiveness of other governments to our persuasion is tempered by their assessments of our domestic efforts. We believe these domestic efforts, which this Administration has sought to intensify, would be enhanced by Congressional passage of the Administration's anticrime proposals.

Goals and objectives

Our goals and objectives in Southeast and Southwest Asia are based on the Administration's international narcotics control policy which was declared in the Federal Strategy that President Reagan endorsed October 5. [2]

[2] Reference is to the Federal Strategy for Prevention of Drug Abuse and Drug Trafficking 1982 (Washington, 1982), which was prepared for the President pursuant to the Drug Abuse Office and Treatment Act of 1972 by the Drug Abuse Policy Office, Office of Policy Development in the White House. This 76-page pamphlet was released by the White House on October 3, 1982.

The worldwide supply of marijuana, cocaine, heroin and other drugs is so great and trafficking channels to the United States so diverse that major interdictions and even crop eradications, when achieved in only limited producing areas, have caused only temporary declines in availability.

The Department's program strategy is therefore predicated on the ultimate objective of controlling production simultaneously in all key sectors of illicit drugs exported to the United States, so that significant and lasting reductions in availability are achieved. We believe that preventing cultivation and destroying illicit narcotics at their source will prove to be the most effective means of reducing availability. In keeping with that ultimate objective, INM's first priority, in negotiating bilateral agreements and in discussions on multilateral projects with international organizations which we fund, is on crop control—government bans on cultivation and production, enforced by manual or chemical crop eradication. Our second priority is on interdiction as close to the production source as possible and supported by other enforcement activities, and then on interdiction of drugs moving from producing areas and through transit countries to the United States.

The major drug producing and trafficking countries are parties to conventions which obligate them to control the production and distribution of illicit drugs. Our international strategy is based on encouraging and, where necessary, assisting these countries in meeting their responsibilities for reducing the cultivation, production, and trafficking in illicit drugs within their borders.

An important factor in our total effort is the diplomatic initiative which is giving international narcotics control a long-needed high priority. President Reagan has communicated Administration positions on crop control and eradication through the strategy, through messages to international bodies, through other public statements, and importantly, by direct communications with leaders of other nations. Secretary Shultz advised our Ambassadors and foreign ministries within weeks of taking office that he is committed to integrating the narcotics issue into our foreign policy agenda. Narcotics issues have become talking points in the discussions with many visiting foreign officials. The Secretary has emphasized that the response to narcotics must involve the international community. This high-level emphasis by the President, Vice President, Secretary of State, Attorney General and other officials is reflected in the cooperation the Administration has achieved in narcotics control, which is described in the Appendix.

Our Bureau responsibilities and programs include: policy development; diplomatic initiatives; bilateral and multilateral assistance for crop control, interdiction and related enforcement activities in producer and transit nations; development assistance; technical assistance for demand reduction; and, training for foreign personnel in narcotics enforcement and related procedures.

Our programs are tailored to both countries and regions. Because this Subcommittee will make recommendations to the full Committee on Foreign Affairs, our authorizing committee, we have noted in our testimony the amounts we are requesting for our programs in Southwest and Southeast Asia.

SOUTHWEST ASIAN NARCOTICS CONTROL STRATEGY

Southwest Asian summary.—Afghanistan, Iran and Pakistan are the principal sources of the opium from which over half of the heroin entering the United States is processed. For reasons not related to narcotics, we have not executed agreements with Iran or Afghanistan. Our regional strategy therefore centers on Pakistan as an opium producer, a heroin refiner, and a transshipment point for other SWA opium. Our Southwest Asian strategy also focuses on Turkey as a principal conduit of opiates moving from Southwest Asia to Western Europe and the United States.

Background.—Although opium poppies have been grown in the rugged Northwest Frontier Province (NWFP) for centuries, Pakistan has only recently become a major world producer and exporter of raw opium. In the past few years, Pakistan has also become a major processor and exporter of refined heroin and a significant factor in the world heroin market. A bumper crop of 800 metric tons of opium in 1979 made Pakistan that year the largest producer of illicit opium. Pakistan is also a transit center for other Southwest Asian opium.

In 1979, the Government of Pakistan banned the opium poppy. This ban is enforced in the "settled" areas, a term which describes those areas effectively under central government control. Government authority is being extended in the "merged" areas of the Northwest Frontier Province (NWFP); the central government's authority is only partially operative in such areas at present. The merged areas account for about 80 percent of Pakistani opium production. However, in "tribal" areas of the NWFP, where about 20 percent of the opium is cultivated, government authority has been exercised through agreements which allow tribal leaders much local autonomy. The presence of over two million Afghan refugees adds to enforcement difficulties in Pakistan.

Enforcement efforts to date.—In 1982, the Pakistani Government eradicated the opium poppy in the Buner area of the NWFP where a United Nations development project is operating—the first eradication effort in a merged area. In early 1982 the GOP seized a heroin laboratory in the tribal territory of the NWFP—for the first time since 1978—overcoming armed tribal resistance. In November and December, tribal leaders directed the closing of another two dozen heroin laboratories in the Khyber Agency, after meetings with government officials.

Pakistan has agreed to enforce its ban on opium cultivation in areas where it receives development assistance. Our rural development project in the Malakand Agency, begun in 1982, is the first project under this agreement on enforcement and is designed to encourage farmers to grow other crops and seek other income sources, and provide infrastructure support.

The $3.55 million INM has requested for Pakistan in FY 1984 provides greater support for the reduction of poppy cultivation and for enforcement against heroin processing and trafficking. The rural development project in the Malakand Agency has been funded for its third and final year in FY 1984. It is expected that by FY 1984 USAID will be collaborating on a similar narcotics-related development project in another NWFP poppy growing area, probably in the Gadoon, which will enhance efforts to enforce the poppy ban; the poppy control objectives of the AID project will be supported with INM enforcement assistance. The Malakand area produces about 10 percent of Pakistani opium; the Gadoon produces about 25 percent. Pakistan has also accepted restrictive "poppy clauses" which commit the government to keep USAID economic assistance project areas free of the opium poppy. These clauses are assurances that opium cultivation and/or heroin processing will not be enhanced by U.S. economic assistance.

The Bureau continues commodity and training assistance to Pakistani narcotics enforcement agencies to upgrade their capabilities. Over 1600 kilos of heroin were seized by Pakistani authorities in 1982.

The INM Malakand project and the prospective USAID projects are part of a program of continuing assistance to help Pakistan achieve control of narcotics. Since 1979, the following narcotics project agreements have been signed:

Narcotics control enforcement (POKER).—To support the development of a special drug enforcement unit in the Pakistani Customs Service at the port of Karachi by providing vehicles, communications equipment, other commodities, training and technical assistance.

Narcotics control enforcement.—To support training of officers from several law enforcement agencies both in Pakistan and in the U.S.; and provide funds for equipment for a Narcotics Training Center. The actual training has been provided by DEA and U.S. Customs. Additionally, communications equipment, vehicles and other investigative commodities have been procured for the PNCB joint task force units recently established in Karachi, Lahore, Peshawar and Quetta to enforce illegal narcotics trafficking.

Narcotics demand reduction studies.—To study drug abuse and related socio-economic factors in Gilgit. A smaller separate study is being concluded in Sialkot.

Forensic laboratory.—To provide equipment and training to permit the establishment of a badly needed forensic laboratory.

Agricultural outreach.—To develop an agricultural outreach program which will provide seed, fertilizer and small implements for alternative and improved crops.

Malakand agency development program.—To improve economic and social conditions through rural development projects in the Malakand Agency of the NWFP, in order to enhance the GOP's capability to enforce its ban on opium poppy cultivation.

Other programs.—U.N. Agencies (UNFDAC, WHO, FAO) have been active in Pakistan since 1976, primarily in small narcotics-related health programs and in a crop substitution program in the Swat District of the NWFP. UNFDAC completed a five-year development project in 1981 (renewed for an additional five years) in the Buner subdivision; primary emphasis has been placed on water resources development and crop substitution with a treatment and rehabilitation center for the local addict population. Funding for these activities will come from earmarked contributions from Sweden, the Federal Republic of Germany, and the United States. Germany is also contributing to narcotics control in Pakistan by funding a national study of in-country drug abuse.

Prospects for the future.—During separate visits to the United States, President Zia and NWFP Governor Haq restated Pakistan's commitment to its opium poppy ban. Our basic objective is to cooperate with the Government of Pakistan in its suppression of opium production, processing and trafficking in heroin to the fullest extent possible. However, traditional values and customs, market forces, bureaucratic disputes, provincial and tribal autonomy, and the time needed to implement development programs make it unlikely that poppy cultivation in the NWFP can be eliminated in the near future. Pakistan's relations with its neighbors, its political stability and its economic progress will also affect the narcotics control effort.

SOUTHEAST ASIAN REGIONAL STRATEGY

Southeast Asia summary.—Southeast Asian heroin accounted for about 10 percent of the heroin entering the United States in 1981, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration. The Golden Triangle produced about 600 tons of opium in each of the 1981 and 1982 crop years, after two years of drought. The Department will continue to emphasize its crop control objective. However, for many reasons, our program includes interdiction and suppression of heroin laboratories as well as crop control. For example, we cannot operate a crop control program in Laos, and most poppy growing areas of Burma are outside of government control. We will continue enforcement assistance to help consolidate recent government, military and police actions which have driven the major Golden Triangle heroin "warlords" from areas in Thailand along the Burma border and disrupted several heroin trafficking organizations. A sustained effort against the drug supported warlords coupled with strict controls by area governments on chemicals used in heroin refining would advance the goal of disrupting and ultimately suppressing heroin production.

COUNTRY PROGRAMS

Thailand

Summary.—The Royal Thai Government has mounted sizable military operations since January 1982 against the Shan United Army, the principal trafficking group on the Thai/Burmese border and are continuing the pressure against it and other illicit drug trafficking groups with narcotics-targeted military companies permanently deployed in the area. These actions have disrupted trafficking and refining activities. The government has also been effective in reducing the availability of precursor chemicals used in converting opium to heroin, which contributed to reduced production of heroin and morphine base; however, these chemicals are increasingly available from other sources in the region. We will encourage tighter controls on precursor chemicals throughout the region. We will continue to support crop control-related development assistance projects in Thailand when there is a concurrent Thai commitment to crop control. The $680,000 in our budget will be available for ongoing and anticipated projects of this nature as well as to support the Thai crop assessment program. While the RTG has not enforced its opium poppy ban in areas which have received crop substitution assistance, the Thai Government has stated that it will produce a crop control strategy in early 1983. We have budgeted $2,720,000 for support of our projects in Thailand in fiscal year 1984.

Background.—In the past, Thai officials were relaxed about narcotics grown, refined, transported through, or shipped from their country since there was little perceived narcotics problem among ethnic Thai. Opium smoking (primarily limited to the Chinese in the cities and hill tribes in the countryside) was banned in the early 1960's. The extensive sales of heroin to American military in Thailand did not arouse major official Thai concern. However, in the ten years since the withdrawal of U.S. forces, the serious local drug abuse problem has spread to other elements of Thai society and there is major concern about the growing heroin addiction problem.

Although internal security, refugees, relations with Cambodia, Laos, and Vietnam, and the economy are of more immediate concern to the Thai Government and public, the RTG does devote considerable amounts of funding and manpower to antinarcotics efforts.

Efforts at drug control to date.—The United States has provided both equipment and training to Thai law enforcement entities. Narcotics control assistance since fiscal year 1972 has amounted to some $23 million. Customs and DEA training in methods of narcotics interdiction, investigation techniques and teaching methodology is geared toward assisting the Thai enforcement agencies to become self-sufficient in narcotic law enforcement.

The Thai Government decided in early 1982 to establish on a continuous basis its efforts to suppress heroin trafficking groups based in Thailand and operating along the Thai/Burma border. We responded to a Royal Thai Army request for material and operational support which would permit sustained suppression of trafficking groups by Thai units. This force is deployed in the most contested area of the Thai/Burma border.

There has been a recent decline in the availability of precursor chemicals such as acetic anhydride used to refine opium into heroin, as a result of Thai enforcement of a "chemical free zone" in northern Thailand. The amount of acetic anhydride reaching the northwest border refineries by traditional routes has dropped significantly, while prices have increased, and some refining activities have apparently moved to both sides of the Thai/Malaysia border.

Crop substitution eradication.—Thai crop substitution efforts have been carried out for over 15 years, originating with the "King's Project," in Chiang Mai Province. Eight years ago, the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control (UNFDAC) became involved in the programs; we support the UNFDAC effort.

For many opium farmers in the hill tribes of northern Thailand, opium has been the primary cash crop. Rice production in many areas is insufficient to meet subsistence requirements. While there has been some limited success with such new crops as potatoes, beans and coffee, new crops have not "caught on" sufficiently either in interest or market value to be a disincentive to poppy cultivation. Although the programs have been successful in introducing new crops to limited numbers of farmers, they have, thus far, had very limited success in reducing the numbers of acres planted with opium poppies, since the Thai Government has yet to take effective action in enforcement of its opium growing ban. Without adequate enforcement, opium will continue to be grown by the hill tribes because it is a remunerative cash crop.

A recent development has been the voluntary surrender of opium stockpiles and a pledge by a few hill tribe villages to abandon cultivation in return for transitional assistance. We have undertaken to support Thai civil-military authorities in two such cases, and are seeking a firm commitment on a third.

Demand reduction.—Demand reduction programs in Thailand include prevention, treatment, and rehabilitation. The Thai Government actively supports demand reduction, as demonstrated by a relatively high level of cooperation and coordination between the Bangkok Metropolitan Health Department, the INCB and the Ministry of Health. The overall project goal is to reduce the demand for narcotics in Thailand, prevent further spread of drug abuse to rural areas, and stimulate increased cooperation with law enforcement agencies through increased public and official awareness of the social impact of addiction.

The U.S. program provides training, technical assistance, and a modest amount of equipment for treatment and prevention. This project, which emphasizes increasing Thai awareness of its drug abuse problems and preventive education by the schools and media, continues through fiscal year 1984.

Other government agencies.—The U.S. Department of Agriculture has been funding crop substitution, research and extension activities in Thailand since 1973. The objective is to identify viable alternative agricultural cropping systems to replace income from opium poppy production. The U.S. Information Agency supports U.S. narcotics control objectives through a modest information program on prevention, and by dissemination of policy and program information.

International organizations.—As noted, the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control (UNFDAC) has an active pilot crop substitution program which has received logistical and agricultural resource support from the USDA and State Department narcotics program in Thailand. The UN contribution is $2.4 million for five years matched by $1,235,800 in Thai funds. UNFDAC recently evaluated this project and extended it for two years. UNFDAC is implementing several programs for treatment, rehabilitation, prevention and research, projected at almost $2 million with $9 million matching Thai funding over a four-year period. This program would build upon U.S. programs in demand reduction. Efforts by other countries are noted in a later discussion of other bilateral and multilateral efforts.

Prospects for the future.—Recent military/police actions against the SUA represent a major breakthrough, demonstrating a Thai commitment to suppress the heroin trafficking organizations on the Thai/Burma border. We are assured of continued, expanded suppression efforts. While we applaud the Government's military actions against the SUA, and look forward to the opium control strategy promised for early 1983, we are disappointed that the Thais have thus far failed to control the opium poppy, even in areas which have benefitted from the United Nations crop substitution program.

Burma

Summary.—Burma is the primary opium growing area in Southeast Asia. Our program of assistance is important to the Burmese; the dangers both of domestic narcotics abuse and international narcotics traffic are well understood by the highest officials of the Socialist Republic of the Union of Burma.

Burma is committed to eliminating domestic drug abuse, reducing opium production and destroying organizations which grow and traffic in narcotics. The Burmese have developed programs involving military and para-military operations in narcotics source areas against narcotics caravans and refugees, as well as route interdiction, law enforcement, treatment, rehabilitation, crop substitution and destruction, education, and propaganda programs.

Background.—For the Burmese, illicit narcotics pose a combination of social, political and security problems—all interrelated.

The social problem of narcotics in Burma is both historical and modern. Opium usage and addiction in Burma are not recent phenomena. The hill tribe growers of the area historically have consumed the opium for medicinal purposes as well as for general addiction. In 1942, when the British evacuated Burma in the face of the advancing Japanese Army, there were 50,000 registered opium addicts.

The increasing world focus on Burma's role in international trafficking has led to concern by the government over its international image. In 1974 Burma passed a strict Narcotics and Dangerous Drug Law. Since then, anti-drug efforts have been given a high priority.

Burma's narcotics problem is intertwined with the insurgency problem. Since independence in 1948, the Rangoon Government has been plagued by rebellious groups seeking national power (such as the Burmese Communist Party) and by ethnic minorities seeking autonomy for their regions (the Shan, Kachin, and Lahu insurgency groups, to name a few). To these groups have been added several powerful armed bands of narcotic traffickers, usually ethnic Chinese, at least in leadership. As previously noted, these groups are heavily dependent upon the opium trade for their income, arms purchases and other activities.

A significant reduction in opium production and trading would affect some areas of Burma more than others. The economy in the Eastern Shan State appears to be heavily dependent upon opium revenues. For some hill tribes, opium has been an acceptable and valued cash crop. The recent prohibition against opium growing and the subsequent Burmese eradication programs have taken income from growers, but it was found that growers were rarely dependent upon opium for their survival.

Efforts at drug control to date.—The United States has provided some $47 million to support Burmese anti-narcotics efforts over the last ten years.

American-Burmese cooperation against illicit narcotics began with a June 1974 bilateral agreement,[3] effected by an exchange of notes between the American Ambassador and the head of the Burmese People's Police. Under the terms of this agreement, and subsequent amendments, and the current project agreement, the United States provides Burma with helicopters, fixed-wing aircraft, communications equipment and associated training and equipment-maintenance support. The bulk of our current budget is dedicated to aircraft maintenance contracts for previously supplied equipment. To assist the Burmese Government in developing replacement income for former opium growers, the United States has provided limited assistance in development of alternative agriculture and livestock projects.

Burmese programs.—Narcotics in Burma is a multifaceted problem and the country has developed an integrated strategy for dealing with it. The Burmese Central Committee for Drug Abuse Control (CCDAC), chaired by the Minister of Home and Religious Affairs, consists of eight deputy ministers from other concerned government ministeries. Responsibilities of the CCDAC are nationwide and include all aspects of the government effort, including enforcement, crop/income substitution, and treatment and rehabilitation:

(1) Enforcement—A basic part of the Burmese enforcement strategy focuses upon interdicting narcotics caravans and destroying refineries and base camps operated by trafficking groups. Burmese police and military personnel have been active both in major operations against the BCP narcotics activities and the poppy eradication programs.

(2) Crop Substitution/Eradication—The Burmese Government estimates that it eradicated more than 10,000 acres of opium poppy in the 1981–1982 season that could have produced as much as 40,000 to 45,000 kilograms of opium. While this represents about eight percent of the total acreage under poppy cultivation in Burma, it almost doubled the previous year's destruction.

A Burmese crop substitution program supported by UNFDAC is making progress in distributing coffee and tea plants, seeds for spices and medicinal herbs, and improved livestock to farmers in areas in which opium was formerly grown. CCDAC is establishing a multisectoral livestock, horticultural, and demonstration center at Pekhon in the Southern Shan State. The purpose of this center will be to provide training and to demonstrate viable crop substitution and livestock production. The INM program has provided equipment and training to support pilot programs for crop substitution. However, the full impact of these programs on opium production must await more hospitable conditions in poppy producing areas.

(3) Treatment, Rehabilitation, Training, and Information—The Burmese Ministries of Health and Social Welfare have responsibility for addict treatment and rehabilitation programs, respectively. Treatment centers have been established in each of the major urban centers with addict population problems. Larger hospitals have treatment wards; district and township hospitals have a basic capability for treating addiction. Rehabilitation centers have been established in Kengtung, Namla, Rangoon, Mandalay, and Lashio. Treatment and rehabilitation centers have been improved and expanded by UNFDAC.

The government conducts a continuous program of narcotics information through the government-controlled news media, in schools, posters, and public and party indoctrination sessions.

Other programs.—UNFDAC has several programs in Burma. Between 1976 and early 1981, UNFDAC assisted Burma by financing a large multisectional drug abuse control program involving activities in law enforcement, crop and income substitution, education, health, and vocational rehabilitation at a total cost of $5,571,000 over the five-year period. Phase II of this program was agreed upon in June 1981 for five years at a cost of $5,042,000. Development aid funds for this program have been provided by the Government of Norway.

Prospects for the future.—The United States has assisted and cooperated with the Burmese by providing some needed enforcement equipment (i.e., the purchase of and maintenance funding for telecommunications equipment, a small fleet of helicopters and fixed-wing aircraft) and support for Burmese pilot programs for crop substitution in opium growing areas. In addition, the United States has provided training for Burmese officials with responsibilities for customs and narcotics enforcement.

Our programs have helped sharpen the Burmese focus on their narcotics problems and our material assistance and training have given them the tools for the job. Politically, our narcotics cooperation has fostered a unique bilateral relationship (for neutralist/isolationist Burma) in which our assistance relates to a sensitive Burmese domestic issue. U.S. assistance supports the narcotics control objective which is consistent with Burma's objective of securing its territory. By any measure, the number of acres of opium crop destroyed and amount of opiates seized is significant. In addition, the continuing Burmese efforts in fields not directly supported by U.S. assistance are a measure of their commitment to the overall goals of narcotics control.

Nevertheless, the narcotics program in Burma must be viewed as an integral part of the Golden Triangle narcotics phenomena. As long as Burmese warlords/insurgents/bandits know that they can enjoy even temporary safe haven in Thailand and Burma, the Thai and Burmese police/military actions and threats will be limited in their effectiveness. Greater Burmese/Thai cooperation and coordination is an essential long-term goal. In the last analysis, however, real progress in Burma will depend on greater Burmese authority in the poppy growing areas.

We will continue support for the Burmese Air Force's capability to airlift ground forces engaged in poppy eradication and interdiction operations and thereby contribute to Burma's goal of ultimate self-sufficiency in aviation maintenance. Our budget increase also provides for expanded training and for improved telecommunications. The Burmese Government reports increased crop destruction including areas where the Burmese Communist Party is involved in trafficking. We have budgeted $5,795,000 for support of Burmese projects.

DONOR COUNTRY INITIATIVE

It is relevant to the scope of this hearing to understand the efforts by the Department to internationalize support for narcotics control projects. The United States narcotics control strategy includes diplomatic initiatives to achieve greater participation by and program coordination with other governments. In recent months, INM, with explicit support from Secretary Shultz, has been conducting discussions with Governments in Canada, Europe and Japan, to seek greater international narcotic control efforts from them, both bilaterally and through international organizations. Through the United Nations or bilaterally, the Federal Republic of Germany is participating in control programs in Thailand, Pakistan and Turkey, the Norwegian Government is active in crop control in Burma and Australia is active in Thailand. Italy and Sweden are interested in supporting development programs to achieve coca control.

The Federal Republic of Germany has initiated a crop substitution project in northern Thailand with the orientation phase cost of almost $90,000 to be matched by an RTG contribution of almost $73,000.

An $80 million World Bank rural development project in Northern Thailand will include several opium growing areas, but has not yet been implemented.

Canada has provided $200,000 for narcotic-related projects in health and crop substitution and training. The United Kingdom has provided some commodities, a coffee expert, and $50,000 each year to Thai law enforcement. New Zealand, France and Japan provide funds for educational grants and other crop substitution programs. In recent discussions, we have encouraged the Japanese to provide assistance to advance narcotics control.

OTHER PROGRAMS

While this hearing is focused on narcotics control activities in Southwest and Southeast Asia, the Department of State also engages in narcotics control programs in Latin America, including opium eradication in Mexico, coca control programs in Peru, Bolivia and Colombia, and interdiction programs in South and Central America and the Caribbean. Our 1983–84 goals include reaching agreement with Colombia on a major marijuana eradication program while expanding coca control efforts, and reaching agreement with Bolivia on a major coca control program. Our proposed fiscal year 1984 budget of $53,030,000 includes a $13 million increase which responds to the coca and marijuana threat from South America, while expanding our efforts to reduce the influx of heroin from Southwest and Southeast Asia.

SUMMARY

We are pursuing the Administration strategy of increasing crop control and interdiction in the source countries by continuing our efforts to reduce the flow of heroin from Mexico, Southeast Asia while expanding efforts to curb cocaine and marijuana imports from Latin America.

Australian Prime Minister Hawke's Upcoming Visit to the United States

. . . . . .

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I have a short, prepared statement and then I'll be glad to take questions.

Prime Minister Robert Hawke of Australia is making an official working visit to Washington, June 11–15, at the invitation of the President. During his stay here he will see the President, the Vice President, and also Secretaries Shultz, Weinberger, and Regan. He will also meet with Chairman Volcker of the Federal Reserve Board, and with Chairman Feldstein of the Council of Economic Advisers.

We are extremely pleased that Prime Minister Hawke has been able to make this trip. It provides an opportunity for us to meet him, and for the President and Prime Minister to establish a personal relationship.

Prime Minister Hawke has a longstanding relationship, a cordial one, with Secretary Shultz, and this visit gives them a chance to renew that relationship.

The relationship between our two countries is a solid one. It is based on a long tradition of friendship as well as many interests in common and a similar perception of world events. It also is based on alliance in peace and in war. And, I might note—it's not in my statement here—but, it's based, perhaps, most of all, on shared democratic values.

Australians and Americans fought side-by-side in the major conflicts of this century. It is, nevertheless, far too easy at times to take friends for granted. And that is an error that we do not intend to make. This visit thus provides another opportunity to affirm to the Australians that we value the role that they play in regional and international affairs, and that their counsel and support on major issues is important to us.

Fortunately there are no major bilateral problems between our two nations. We sometimes differ over approaches to common problems or objectives, but, as befits relations between close friends and longstanding allies, these questions are dealt with amicably and constructively.

During the Prime Minister's visit to Washington, we will be discussing a wide range of topics of common interest between Australian and U.S. officials. The talks will certainly touch on ANZUS, an alliance that is key to our security interests in Asia, in the Pacific, and in the Indian Ocean. Conversations will also cover the Middle East, East-West relations I'm sure will be discussed, as well as U.S. relations with China and Australian relations with China.

The subject of Indochina, and specifically the problem of Kampuchea, and the ASEAN approach to that problem will undoubtedly be a major subject of conversation. We also anticipate that arms control and the Williamsburg summit will be discussed.

There will, of course, also be extensive discussion of economic matters and, I think, as is inevitable particularly in the present difficult economic circumstances that the world, as a whole, is facing.

With that, I'd be glad to take questions.

Q. Excuse me if you've covered this. You know, there are various reports that this government in Australia would like a greater American involvement in the Pacific region and also greater Australian involvement or control or oversight over the American bases or posts, communications facilities in Australia. Do you have any comments on those two aspects?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. We haven't had any specific proposals. I don't know if there might be some mention during these discussions.

Q. Do you think that, are we likely as a result of this meeting and ANZUS to become more involved in the Pacific, send more ships—whatever—troops?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I think that the basic U.S. posture in that region is a strong one and a very good one, and I think that we have, we and Australia, have a common interest in maintaining that, just as I think the joint facilities in Australia very clearly serve our common interests. I think both governments share an interest in maintaining that.

Q. What are the economic problems between us?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Partly—they're not simply problems between us. It's, in considerable measure, problems that we face together—problems of protectionism. We're both badly hurt by some of the protectionist agricultural policies of other countries. I think we both stand to lose very badly if protectionist sentiments around the world, including in the United States, get out of control. We are both very much affected by the way that the present world recession has impacted on the growth prospects of developing countries. And in the case of countries in Southeast Asia, that can—if it ends up affecting their internal stability, that can directly affect Australia's interests as well as our own.

So, to a considerable measure, what we would be talking about is a common problem, that is, a world problem in talking about ways of working together to address that as we did, for example, at the GATT ministerial in December. [2]

There are problems between us, as well. I'm not trying to slide over that fact. I mean, I think the Australians will no doubt object to some of our own measures such as beef quotas and no doubt object to some of the ways that we have been trying to combat the agricultural protectionism of other countries by providing blended credits for our own agricultural exports. And that, in some cases, has hurt Australian markets.

Q. How big is Australia's balance of trade problem? Do they have a large balance of trade problem?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I'm sorry. I don't have the specific statistics. Do you have it?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. The balance is in our favor if you're referring to the United States.

Q. Yes.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. And I couldn't give you specific figures. It's in the order of several billion dollars though.

Q. But is there a balance of trade problem that the Australians have right now? I mean, worldwide is that one of their economic concerns?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. They have one at the moment because of a drought and the drop off in wheat sales and so on. Yes.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. And, obviously, they had a major devaluation recently, I guess in the first 2 weeks of the new government, and that was a response to the general imbalance in their trade.

Q. —what your position is on the suggestion from some sections of the Labor Party that to answer some of the queries about the U.S. bases and perhaps some concern that the Australian Government isn't totally aware of the information passing through the U.S. bases in Australia, that the Australian Government—station someone at the Pentagon so they can monitor the information going through these bases. What's your reaction to that?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I think we'd want to hear the specific proposals from the Australian Government before deciding our position or what we would say in public comment about it. I think that, as I said earlier, I think one of the things that has emerged clearly in discussions we've had with Australian Government officials since the new government has come in, when it's been possible, to brief them in great detail about how these facilities, and they're joint facilities, work. I think they have come to share our appreciation that the facilities are, indeed, joint ones and do indeed jointly serve our common interests.

I think within that framework any specific problems can almost surely be worked out.

Q. The Australian Government and the New Zealand Government are involved in a dispute with the French over nuclear testing in the South Pacific. The Australian Government, as I understand it, is proposing some sort of nuclear freeze zone in the South Pacific. What attitude would the U.S. Government take to that—

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. There has been some general talk about, by the Australian Government, about the outlines of what they might propose in the way of a nuclear freeze zone. But they haven't formally given us any specific details. And until we saw the specific details, it would be very hard for us to take a position.

Q. —likely to see that in this visit?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. It's a possibility.

Q. Have we ever supported it, except, in I guess Latin America?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. We are parties to the Treaty of Tlatelolco which is—provides a nuclear freeze zone in Latin America. We've made it clear on a number of occasions that there are certain conditions that would absolutely have to be satisfied for us to participate in any such scheme.

Q. That's where we do our testing, isn't it?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Pardon?

Q. We do a lot of our own testing there, don't we?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No, we do not. We do not do any testing or dumping of waste in the Pacific.

Q. You did.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. A long time ago. We stopped a long time ago. In fact, we're party to a treaty that prohibits atmospheric testing and our underground testing is done in U.S. territory. So, that's not a—specifically a problem for us. The things that—

. . . . . .

Q. On the conditions those would continue to include port visits, wouldn't they?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. That's one of the most important conditions on any such scheme, is that it not interfere with the free transit of naval vessels.

Q. Is the United States putting any pressure on France to stop these tests?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I won't discuss what we say to the French on this subject through diplomatic channels.

Q. I tried. (Laughter)

Q. Has there been any protest there on this nuclear freeze in Australia?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I think the focus in Australia has primarily been on the subject of the South Pacific and the issue such as French testing in nuclear freeze in Australia. I think there is a growing concern in Australia, as there seems to be around the world, about the problem of nuclear weapons. And I think there's a very strong interest in the whole question of East-West relations and specifically arms control. And I think—I'm quite certain that the subject of our approach to arms control negotiations would be something the President would want to explain in considerable detail to the Prime Minister, and I think the Australians, judging from talks I had when I was there, are very interested in how we're going about it and what we hope to gain from it.

THE PRESS. Thank you.

Statements by President Reagan and Australian Prime Minister Hawke, June 13, 1983 [3]

"Our Ties Are a Precious Tradition, Reflecting Our Many Concerns and Shared Values"

THE PRESIDENT. I'm delighted that Prime Minister Bob Hawke has been able to come to Washington so early in his administration.

We've had a productive session, reviewing bilateral issues as well as world developments. And, more importantly, we've had a chance to put our relationship on a personal basis. We find we have much in common; but that's no surprise between friends and allies.

The bonds between our two nations are of long standing. Our ties are a precious tradition, reflecting our many concerns and shared values.

Australia's a great nation that plays a vital role in regional and world affairs. It's a key ally upon whom we can count. Ours is an alliance of trust and friendship. I'm grateful for the good will expressed by Prime Minister Hawke today and I welcome his wise counsel. I've been looking forward to getting to know him. And it was our first meeting; but, certainly, not our last. We will be in frequent contact in the future. And I wish the Prime Minister and all Australians the best of luck. And, again, welcome.

PRIME MINISTER HAWKE. Thank you. Mr. President, I join with you in expressing the appreciation that I have for having placed the relationship between our two countries now in terms of a personal meeting between us.

I, like you, have been looking forward to this meeting. I have been able to convey to you, and through you to the people of the United States, the fundamental importance that we in the new Labor government attach to the relationship with the United States.

I was able to remind the President that it was a Labor government during the last war which fundamentally re-oriented the international relationship of Australia toward that alliance with the United States.

It was an alliance which served us well, the United States and Australia, during that war. And in the period since the war, that relationship, in general, and particularly in terms of the ANZUS Treaty relationship, has continued to serve both our countries well.

There is no country, I have suggested to the President, that this country will be able to rely on more as a constructive ally than Australia. It will be a relationship of deep friendship and, as is befitting between people and nations who are friends, it will be one, at times, where there may be differences of emphasis in our perceptions of particular issues. Those differences, if they exist, will be honestly and directly expressed, but will in no way diminish the fundamental depth of the relationship between our two countries.

I appreciate the opportunity that I have had to discuss with the President matters of immediate bilateral importance to us, matters of concern in the immediate region of Australia and issues of global consideration. And we have found, in all those areas, an identity of interest. And I have expressed to the President, as he has to me, our firm intention on both our parts to ensure that the relationship, which has been strong and productive in the past, will continue to be even more so in the future. And that will reflect the relations between our countries and what is now a firm, personal relationship between the President of the United States and myself as Prime Minister of Australia. Thank you, Mr. President.

Prepared Statement by the Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs (Wolfowitz) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, February 23, 1983 (Extract) [1]

U.S. Interests in Burma

While we do not expect a change in Burma's basic commitment to nonalignment, it is in our interest to encourage its continued, quiet opening to the West. Although it is currently one of the world's poorest countries in per capita income, it has significant mineral and agricultural resources which, if properly developed, could insure internal prosperity and contribute to economic prosperity in the region as a whole. A small investment now could therefore yield significant dividends later.

US AID and IMET programs resumed in FY 1980 after a 16 year hiatus and have grown rapidly although they remain relatively small. Together with our anti-narcotics assistance to Burma, these programs have promoted a warming of our bilateral relations at the same time that Burma has been spurning approaches by the Soviet Union. They have also supported our broader interests, including narcotics cooperation, and have responded to specific Burmese requests.

The $12.5 million in Development Assistance proposed for FY 84 represents a $1.3 million decrease from FY 83, which has been necessitated by current budgetary constraints. While this figure is sufficient to maintain existing agricultural development and public health projects, the planned expansion of our AID program will require slightly higher funding levels in subsequent years. The modest increases contemplated will maintain the momentum of our program, assist Burmese development efforts in a number of promising new areas, and demonstrate to the Burmese our continued concern and commitment.

The proposed 25 percent increase in IMET funding in FY 84 to $250,000, will enable about 45 Burmese officers to receive US military training, compared to 35 officers in FY 83. These officers will gain exposure to US concepts and systems by attending courses in the U.S. Army Command and General Staff College program, helicopter maintenance, field artillery, and other subjects. Given the key role of the military in Burma's political structure, IMET training will have a favorable long-term impact on Burmese attitudes toward the US far out of proportion to its modest cost.

We will continue to assist Burmese anti-narcotics efforts, primarily through maintenance support for aircraft which we have supplied for use in anti-narcotics operations. Both we and the Burmese attach high priority to curbing narcotics production and trafficking in Burma, and maintain an active dialogue regarding ways in which we might cooperate more closely to achieve this objective.

Renewal of U.S.–China Dialog

Foreign Minister Wu, distinguished guests, thank you for your kind remarks.

Continued

On behalf of all the members of my party, permit me to express my appreciation for the warm welcome and the gracious hospitality you have lavished upon us. After a long period of anticipation and preparation, it is a great pleasure to be your guests in this magnificent city and to feel we are among friends.

Our two great nations are both known around the world for the enormous wealth of human and material resources that lie within our borders, for what we have been able to do with our own resources and our own efforts, and for our strong belief in national independence. But it is also a fact that in this modern world even the strongest and most independent nations cannot live in isolation. I am struck by the statement of General Secretary Hu Yaobang in his recent report to your 12th Party Congress [2] that "China's future is closely bound up with that of the world as a whole." "Being internationalists," he said, "we are deeply aware that China's interests cannot be fully realized in separation from the overall interests of mankind."

Mr. Minister, President Reagan shares these views and so do I. Over and over again during the course of my duties as Secretary of State, I am daily reminded that the fates of all nations—rich and poor, large and small—are closely linked. The actions we take often have repercussions for others. And the behavior of others wherever on earth, wise or foolish, peaceful or aggressive, cannot but have consequences and implications for us all.

The United States and China are major actors in this complex and interrelated world. Together your government and ours, sharing many parallel interests, have great potential for influencing positively the course of world events. Indeed it is our mutual responsibility to do all that is in our power to promote peace and progress.

Over a decade ago, recognizing this interdependence to which I have referred, our governments set out to build a strong and lasting friendship between our peoples. I am proud to say that I was a member of the President's Cabinet at the time of this historic development. Since then, farsighted and courageous leaders in both our nations have steadily broadened and deepened the relationship. We continue to appreciate and to be guided by that spirit. Our discussions in the next several days will reflect past accomplishments, current realities and hopes for the future.

Before I left Washington, President Reagan asked me to reiterate his strong personal commitment to the advancement of U.S.–China relations, in the interest of both our peoples and for the benefit of all mankind. He believes there is a great need for renewal in the U.S.–China dialog—a need for discussion and enhanced mutual understanding on a host of international and bilateral matters. There is much to be done to advance the U.S.–China relationship and to promote peaceful progress everywhere.

Mr. Minister, as we assemble to contemplate the road ahead, we are acutely aware of the challenges to world peace and prosperity that lie outside our frontiers:

—The troubled international economy has thrown new obstacles in the way of the efforts of all countries to achieve a more hopeful future, but I am glad to report that the economy of the United States is now expanding once again, a development that will help the world economy to recover;

—The dangers of nuclear war and nuclear proliferation concern people everywhere and must be among the foremost concerns of their leaders;

—From Kampuchea and Afghanistan to Africa and the Middle East, there are major threats to peace and the just aspirations of mankind that cannot be ignored.

Mr. Minister, the dialog that we advance here in Beijing this week on these and other issues is testimony to the importance of a strong and lasting U.S.–China relationship in confronting the economic and strategic challenges that threaten the well being of all. But our dialogue is testimony to bright hopes, as well as challenges. In recent years, thousands of students from your country have studied and are studying at American universities. Our young people, tourists, academics, and businessmen are studying, traveling, and investing in China in ever-increasing numbers. We are pleased to have a role in the ambitious course of economic modernization on which you have embarked. The intelligence, skills and dynamism of both our peoples, which have already given so much to the world, offer us infinite possibilities to learn and benefit from each other.

The challenges and opportunities are great. The agenda is full. I look forward, Mr. Minister, to my talks with you and other Chinese leaders in the days ahead. As long as both sides approach these talks in the serious, constructive, responsible manner which the international situation merits and which our predecessors have always brought to the table, our discussions will succeed.

In this spirit, I should like to propose a toast:

—To your health, Mr. Minister;

—To the health of the Chinese leadership and all those present here tonight;

—And to the friendship and cooperation between the peoples and governments of our two countries;

—Gan bei.

Statement and Remarks by the Secretary of State (Shultz) to the American Business Community, Beijing, February 3, 1983 [3]

"We Must Expect a Certain Amount of Growing Pain"

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Thank you. I welcome and appreciate your introduction and may not necessarily associate myself with everything you said. I am pleased to have a chance to meet with the American business people here and I always felt as a businessman that my activities were a good representative of my country and wanted them to be conducted that way and I am sure you feel the same.

I am pleased to see my friend Mike Birely with whom I worked back in the good old days when I was a private businessman in this part of the world. And I'm also glad to meet some new friends here.

I understand that I am a pioneer in the sense of being the first Secretary of State to address this unofficial American community in Beijing since normalization. But as I was suggesting you're the true pioneers and it is so heartening for a traveling American to see in action this pioneering spirit for which we as a people are justly famous. Perhaps it is our passion for building, our eagerness to create that is good and useful. This is a saga of American development and it is also the spirit that finds you in this fascinating part of the world.

I might just say back in early 1970 I came first to Asia, to Japan, then to other parts of Asia at the instruction of then President Nixon and he told me before I started that trip that I should get out and understand Asia, that if you don't understand Asia, you will not understand the future and I do believe that a great deal of the future of the world is here.

At any rate, it is your work as much as anyone's that is planting the seeds and feeding the roots of a vital international relationship. It offers so much potential benefits to America, to China, to the region and to the world. You are here on the ground floor developing U.S.–China relations. You are also here at an exciting stage of China's own internal development, as China's present leaders chart a course of modernization trying to carry the Chinese people into a more advanced technologically oriented future. We have much experience to share with the Chinese, a great deal to contribute to their modernization efforts.

I want to tell you today that we fully understand, we fully unhesitatingly support the Chinese in their ambitious modernization goals. A stable, secure, economically healthy China, participating actively and constructively in the mainstream of the international economic system is in the best interests of the United States, the East Asian region and of world peace.

We have done much in this administration to give substance to our good intentions. President Reagan has issued a directive substantially increasing the level of technology to be routinely approved for sale to China, reflecting our intent to treat China as a friendly, nonallied state.[4] The President has suspended the prohibition on arms sales to China embodied in our arms control legislation, permitting consideration on a case-by-case basis.[5] A request to export munitions list articles to China is the procedure we follow with all friendly countries.

The President has launched a process with the Congress to amend those laws that treat China in the same manner as the Soviet Union and its satellites, to make clear that we do not consider China as an adversary and will remove legal impediments to this cooperation.

As with any young relationship we must expect a certain amount of growing pain. It is easy to pinpoint trouble spots. We referred to it here. Trade is among them. We have heard much in recent weeks of difficult textile negotiations, breakdowns in the negotiating process, of unilateral quota restrictions and retaliatory measures and so on.[6] Let me not dismiss their importance out of hand. But let us neither get so bogged down in bilateral arguments so as not to see and understand how far we have come in so brief a period of time.

China is now the 14th largest trading partner of the United States. Also the fourth largest market for American agricultural products. The very success of the economic and trade relationship brings with it difficult issues and problems, but we welcome these problems because they attest to the growing complexity of our relations and interactions. We will resolve them, fairly and equitably for both sides. We have already set in place institutions to deal with these increasingly complex economic relations. In December, Finance Minister Wang Bingqian led a Chinese delegation to the third annual U.S.–China Joint Economic Committee, which was set up at the time of Chairman Deng Xiaoping's visit to the United States in 1979, to discuss economic issues of mutual interest to China and the United States. Secretary Regan led the U.S. delegation in a series of meetings that were positive, constructive and frank. I might say beyond that that the Chinese Finance Minister (inaudible) around town very well and made a very strong and positive impression on everyone.

Working groups were devoted to such areas as investment, and finance, trade and tax issues. We raised with the Chinese such problems of import to you as the need to identify potential projects with (inaudible) to complete the legislative framework needed to protect investor rights and promote investor confidence, the need for a patent law, the need for better working conditions for U.S. businesses in China, and mechanisms for dispute resolutions, and the need to streamline the approval process for investment in China. All bureaucracies need to be streamlined. It's a constant of life worldwide, let me tell you. We will continue to give high priority to these issues of the American business community.

Secretary of Commerce Baldrige will be leading the American delegation to the first session of the Joint Commission on Commerce and Trade to be held here in Beijing in May. We expect to be able to announce other official delegations moving in both directions during the course of the present year. I need not tell you that we have steered through some rough stretches during the past year in U.S.–China relations. I think both sides have navigated successfully and are out in the clear again.

My presence here in Beijing today is a good indication that both sides recognize the potential benefits of good relations and are committed to advancing them. I am very pleased with the manner in which our talks with the Chinese are proceeding this week. They are serious, constructive and wide-ranging. With goodwill, coopera-

[6] Negotiations for the renewal of the already-expired U.S.-Chinese textile agreement, held in Beijing, January 6–13, concluded without agreement. On January 13, the Office of the Special Trade Representative announced that restrictions on imports of Chinese textiles would be implemented on January 15, retroactive to January 1. On January 19, Xinhua (the New China News Agency) carried an announcement that China would reduce its planned imports of U.S. agricultural products in 1983. tion, and sense of purpose that both sides bring to the cause of advancing the relationship, there is much we can and will accomplish. You are fortunate to be here in the early stages, and at least in my judgment, the future does well for the U.S.–China relationship.

I will be glad to respond to your questions, although as I said to some of you before lunch, I don't intend to conduct my negotiations with the Chinese through you. There is a tendency on everyone's part to ask me questions that I think are more appropriately dealt with directly. So if I am not totally responsive always, you'll understand.

Q. What is the potential for resolution of the Taiwan issue?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The communiqué [7] was signed with knowledge and good intent and it is the intention and the responsibility and the obligation of the U.S. Government to meet the commitments undertaken in that communiqué.

Q. What steps can be taken on behalf of the U.S. business community in China to persuade the Chinese to make equal opportunity for living and working space available to U.S. businessmen?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, this is a problem, one that we address. It is true that arrangements for living in the United States and China are unidentical, so that we have to struggle. I might say that's a fact of life we have to struggle with. I might say on the question of trade, and mutual benefit, it is my understanding that trade never takes place unless there is mutual benefit. Why should it? Nobody will make a trade unless they are going to benefit by it. And the reason why trade is so munificent in its benefits to the world at large, is because it's not a zero sum game, it's always a plus sum game. Everybody benefits from trade by definition. I assume that you are here as representatives of American businesses because you think you will benefit from this trade. And if you didn't think so, you wouldn't be here.

Q. Can we expect a more liberal export control system to be introduced to alleviate this particular barrier?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. This is a difficult subject—as between the United States and all of her trading partners because we do have export controls and in the administration of them here are sometimes difficult issues of interpretation and that tends to prolong consideration of certain given items. On the other hand, my review of this subject shows me that the number of applications for export licenses have grown at a very rapid rate over the last 4 years and that the number of pending applications in a given year, have in the last 2 years been falling somewhat.

So, I recognize that the process of getting an application approved is always one that the people making the application find difficulty with but nevertheless the record is one of an increasing number of applications with a large number of approvals and of a falling rate of pending cases. That doesn't mean that there aren't problems. Sometimes the problems are created by you. That is, if it is known that here is a given piece of technology that can receive approval but that there are aspects of it that are unlikely to receive approval, we find occasionally that businesses will go ahead and (inaudible) now it falls outside the guidelines, even make a financial commitment and then come in and argue, "Gosh, we made this financial commitment, now you've got to approve it." Buddy that's your problem when you do that. Don't complain to the government. On the other hand, we do seek a fair, proper, and efficient system, within the constraints of what any properly operating bureaucratic arrangement can produce. Obviously, to consider a given application, there are many points of view and they have to have their chance to speak their piece. It isn't necessarily instantaneous. Whether or not work can be done in the field of advanced consultation, I don't know. It remains to be seen. It is always a somewhat touchy area for government, but that is a possible way that might space around some of the difficult areas. Although it may be better to leave things as they are so that basically you make an application and we act on the application after we've got it. That I think, in many ways, is a safer proposition and it may be helpful to be able to get some informal advice.

[7] Reference is to the joint communiqué issued by the U.S. and Chinese Governments on August 17, 1982; for text, see American Foreign Policy: Current Documents, 1982, p. 1038.

Q. Why is it that we cannot get a license out of the U.S. Government when the Japanese and West European competition can get an equivalent license in a relatively short time?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Maybe they are just better. Why don't you move to Japan or Western Europe?

Q. What kinds of steps are being taken to ameliorate the Chinese reduction of U.S. grain and other agricultural commodities?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Of course we stand ready to resume the textile negotiations but basically we have to represent the U.S. interests and the Chinese have to represent their interests as they see them. And we can discuss problems as we are doing, and those are the sorts of things that are being done.

Q. What can we expect in terms of negotiations or policy change to permit American companies to compete in the nuclear power generation field?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The question carries the implication, as most of your questions do, that there is something wrong with the United States. Our regulations are based on a deep concern about the problems of proliferation of nuclear weapons technology. That is a legitimate problem. So we seek to convince others to also worry about the problem of nonproliferation. It may be that you will be able to work out some appropriate arrangement with the Chinese in this regard. After all, they are very knowledgeable about nuclear technology to begin with. So I would just leave it at that, at the same time noting to you that the problem of proliferation is a distinct problem and I think the question suggests in a rather cavalier fashion that you brush it off. I don't brush it off.

Q. Can we expect the U.S. Government to actively support exports of U.S. industrial products, and urge China to import a larger percentage of their capital goods from the United States to create a better balance?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The attitude of your government toward subsidies for exports is unenthusiastic. Now having said that, I recognize that subsidies to exports is a characteristic of much trade and to a certain extent we have to say that if all the world is mad, 'tis folly to be sane. But nevertheless I say to your (inaudible) restraint on subsidizing exports. It is nothing more than a form of protection. You are protecting your export industries as distinct from what you normally think of as protection of an import industry. It is two sides of the same coin.

I believe that one of the most important and difficult problems we have in the world trading system is the tendency for the forces of protection to rise and become ascendant, and the demand for export subsidies that we see around the world and from American business and agricultural interests is part of that process. I understand that we have to compete and it is up to the Government of the United States to look realistically at what is taking place and to try to keep the situation such that the U.S. firms and businesses can be competitive on their merit. But I think that [if?] what happens is a kind of emergence of a gigantic export subsidy world, we all will be the losers.

That is the basis of my statement, that while we recognize the reality and, I think, we will see a greater amount of funding for the Export/Import Bank you will see in the President's budget (inaudible) and so that's there. The attitude is reluctant, frankly it is. For good and sufficient and general reasons that I believe in the long run are in the best interests of those businesses that are in the direct trading business, when you are in international trade. I suppose it must be so as well that our consumers, while they may get a short-term benefit from subsidized exports from elsewhere, in the long run will be the losers too if what we see is more and more protection, which means less and less trade. Because as I said earlier, trade has bountiful benefits because by definition it's mutual and advantageous.

Secretary Shultz's Discussions in Beijing

Q. How are things going to go or how do you feel things will go now with China? Have we sorted out all the problems of the past few months? What is your own personal feeling about how the talks went and what the future holds?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. We have identified a lot of problems but also a lot of progress and accomplishment. There are a certain number of meetings that have been identified and potential further developments. And my own opinion is that if we can maintain the sort of spirit of the dialog of the last 4 days, then we will gradually make headway in resolving the individual issues. As I commented yesterday at the press conference, if you can get issues into the context of a generally good atmosphere, then you find ways to solve them. You take the same issue and put it into a less happy atmosphere, and it becomes very difficult to solve. So, I think the general tone of things can have some impact.

Q. (Inaudible) Are you telling the Chinese the United States has a commitment to live up to the spirit of, or in terms of, the joint communiqué, but also other commitments in the world such as the enduring commitment to Taiwan, and it remains a commitment and the United States keeps its commitments. Is that the general tone?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I think it's very important that our country keep commitments that are made. In referring to the various communiqués that have dealt with the subject of Taiwan, I believe I'm correct in saying that every communiqué, every formal statement involving China (the People's Republic of China) and the United States have had a reference to Taiwan in one way or another. We do understand these commitments, we intend to live by these commitments. That was the statement that I made.

Q. What can you tell us about your meetings with the Chinese? You have had a lot of negotiations and meetings with people over the years. What was it like? Did you find any surprises there? Could we have your general impressions of the meetings?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. First of all, the people are a serious people. Meetings were conducted in a very pleasant way but there was a minimum of the sort of pleasantries that go along with a meeting; and as soon as the photo opportunities were ended, they plunged right into substantive discussions, which I welcomed. I think the people were basically well prepared; they came to talk in a substantive manner. I did feel that on some issues their perception of what the facts are, differed sometimes rather substantially from what my sense of what the facts are on a given case. For example, on the proportion of our market occupied by Chinese textiles. (Inaudible) But I found them to be strong, tough, well-informed people. I want to call to your attention that not everything that we talked about was, so to speak, a negotiation. There was a big sort of informational content to their statements about their views on different parts of the world and situations of different countries, and also in our descriptions of what was taking place. So to some extent, it was information-sharing and analysis-sharing. It was interesting to me in talking with different Foreign Ministers and the people from different countries to get a sense of the degree to which the country has a world view of things as distinct from a preoccupation with what's going on in their own country and immediately around their own country. Certainly it is true that the Chinese have a world view, just as we do. They see things in places that are far removed from China as having an impact that is of some significance to them. They like to talk about Africa, the Middle East and so on, in that context, so that makes it interesting.

Q. Did you get the feeling that they were less concerned about the Soviet threat to themselves than they have been in the past years? Is that a reason why they're now willing to talk more normalization with the Russians?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Again, I think that is the sort of question that you have to ask them about, how much concerned they are. They have made a number of comments, some publicly, during the course of the visit and I just refer you to them. It seems to me, as is true in every country in some way, some more than others, they want to see their country develop and great tensions all around their border are not helpful to them. So they seek to reduce those tensions and I think that's an objective that is understandable.

Q. Mr. Secretary, there has been considerable concern among some quarters in the United States regarding their shift in attitudes about the Russians and their place in the Third World. Could you tell us anything that would indicate how you came out of these talks and your own view of the significance for the United States of what the Chinese have done within the last year?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I felt that their view of the Russians is very realistic. It remains to be seen precisely what the content of the Third World orientation will turn out to be. But the United States, say over the post-World War II decades, has been a champion of economic development of that world. So that has been our stance. Differences of view arise about what the right way to bring about economic development is, they are or may be important issues and they were probably aired more directly at Cancun. But I do think there is an increasing perception around the world that if you want development you need to rely on the enterprise of individual units, you need to give people some stake in what they are doing, that markets do help whether they are organized within a socialistic type of framework or a pure market economy. The market idea is very important. Certainly they use it in China as far as I can see. Also any country, fundamentally, has to rely on itself to provide the real motive power for development. Now that, of course, doesn't mean there isn't a role for aid from outside in technical terms and in straight, foreign investment terms, and in terms of concessional aid of various kinds, there is such a role. But getting the right perspective on these things can be a point of real discussion.

I found one of the most attractive aspects of discussing economic development with the Chinese to be their recognition of these facts and their determination to develop themselves and it was said to me a number of times with the size of China and with the number of people in China, it's quite clear that the basic thrust of the development of China has to come from within.

Q. (Inaudible)

SECRETARY SHULTZ. There have been, for example, some developments in the way agriculture is organized in China, as I understand it, that give family units a capacity to work to a degree for themselves and to benefit from a strong performance themselves, so that what you do is related to what you get out of it. So I think that is an example of the sort of look at the enterprise notion, and the ability to sell into a market is related to that. I don't want to be misunderstood. I'm not saying that the Chinese have promoted a market economy, but they use the market idea and I think if you look around in Socialist economics nowadays you find that there is a considerable amount of experimentation, and always has been for that matter, with the question of how you use the idea of a market, and can you within the framework of state ownership of main resources.

Q. I guess what I was trying to get at was that after hearing them explain their own ideas about their foreign policy especially, is their foreign policy now something the United States tolerates? Is it something we could live with quite comfortably? How is the United States going to relate to a China which has really taken a kind of new direction within this last year or so?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The discussions that I had about their foreign policy lead me to believe that there are many areas of great importance where their interests and the way they see the problems are quite parallel to ours. Therefore it's quite worthwhile to be talking with them and I think that can be fruitful. So I came away with a rather good feeling about that. We also discussed a variety of areas where they may have different views and they are critical of the United States sometimes for what we do, sometimes for us not doing enough, or paying enough attention to something. But I found that discussions with them to be informed discussions and substantive discussions and serious discussions, not a sort of debating point type discussion at all. So I found it to be quite worthwhile in relating that to the broader sense of the interaction of their foreign policy and ours to be basically encouraging.

Q. What are your impressions on how they feel about arms control?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. It did not play a prominent place in our discussions. They did not ask a lot of questions about it and, on the other hand, when we did discuss it, in a sense the outcome of that discussion was that we offered to have Admiral Howe give a briefing on what we were doing. They seemed to be glad to have that briefing and it was a lengthy and solid discussion and, as Admiral Howe pointed out, they seemed to be very well informed about what is going on, so they follow it.

Q. There were a couple of people from the North American desk at dinner last night between a few of us. On the subject of the SS-20's, one of them said there are a hundred or more there now and a few more don't make any difference to us. Is that a view that you picked up at a higher level (inaudible)?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. No, that kind of comment was not made to me.

Q. In the past, before the Reagan administration, almost every time we'd go to China there would be criticism the United States wasn't tough enough against the Russians or we weren't spending enough on military. In their press they now seemed to be critical of the United States for spending too much on the military. I just wondered in your discussions did you get a recent feeling that the Reagan administration's military program was appreciated.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I felt that it was, and that they welcomed the strength and determination of the United States. I don't hear any criticism whatever along the lines that you suggested in your question.

Q. You got into the question of technology transfer; you talked about that quite a bit. What is it that they are interested in specifically? Did you get a feeling of priority what they want, what they are interested in?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, the technology transfer issues have come up in a sense on two levels: One is with respect to some particular piece of equipment or area of knowledge for which an application has been made and about which there is discussion. And so that leads you into such discussion of criteria, and procedures, and speed of consideration, and so on. So that is what you might say is an operational level of discussing the subject. They also laid a lot of emphasis, and in many respects, the heaviest emphasis, on the intent and the atmosphere within which these operational questions were to be discussed. People made the point to me a number of times, on this particular equipment or that particular equipment, so much the way that you view us is more important than the way particular things are handled. It is the overall sense of atmosphere that is being displayed here. So you sort of go back and forth between these two levels. That was the nature of our discussions.

Q. (Inaudible)

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The whole subject is one that is a difficult one, inherently. You have always, particularly these days, a moving target, the sense that technology is changing constantly, particularly in the fields that are of the greatest interest. So you keep having to adapt your criteria and your judgment to this moving target. So I think it will remain a difficult issue but I do think there is a lot of room for clarification so that it can be put into a more satisfactory way. I am not directly answering your COCOM question. Obviously people can make decisions about things like that but that is an issue for the government to consider.

Q. Thank you, sir.

Testimony by the Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs (Wolfowitz) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, February 28, 1983 (Extract) [8]

U.S.–China Relations 11 Years After the Shanghai Communiqué

MR. WOLFOWITZ. . . .

I have submitted a slightly longer statement for the record in the interest of time. I will try to keep my opening remarks here to 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, developing a strong, stable, and enduring United States–China relationship is an important element of President Reagan's foreign policy. For compelling historical reasons, that goal has occupied a central place in the foreign policies of four successive administrations. We should not forget that, in the more than two decades preceding the Shanghai communiqué, [9] United States–China relations were deeply hostile.

China was a large and menacing power with which we maintained no human communications, cultural contact, or economic relations. We were at war in Korea. We nearly came to war over Quemoy and Matsu. And we supported opposite sides in Vietnam.

Indeed, China actively supported insurgencies on the soil of many of our Asian allies and friends. At great cost, we maintained a significant naval presence between Taiwan and the mainland, and at the same time we faced a growing threat from the Soviet Union.

By 1972, it had become clear to both the American and Chinese leadership that continuation of this hostile atmosphere was in neither country's interests. The result was a reconciliation of historic importance. Developments since then have demonstrated the importance of the productive and cooperative relationship that followed.

Let me mention just three instances that illustrate how far we have come and what has been achieved.

Perhaps nothing more dramatically illustrates the changes of the last 11 years than the fact that China is today a major restraint on Vietnamese aggression in Asia.

As another important indicator of change, our economic relations have grown substantially. Bilateral trade with China has risen from zero to more than $5 billion per year.

Perhaps most important of all for the long-term relationship between the United States and China, cultural relations and personal ties have resumed at many different levels. People-to-people contacts have virtually exploded. Nearly 10,000 Chinese students are studying at American universities, more than 100 Chinese delegations per month are visiting the United States, and over 100,000 Americans are visiting China each year. These exchanges bring to each of our societies an increasingly sophisticated appreciation of the other.

In my prepared statement, I mention many other benefits. These include that we no longer have to plan or spend to confront a Chinese threat; it includes agreement on the Soviet threat and parallel interests in containing the Soviet Union in Afghanistan and elsewhere; it includes a useful dialog on a wide range of important regional and international problems on which China has developed a more constructive regional and cooperative approach.

Despite problems, East Asia has emerged during this period as one of the more stable and prosperous regions of the world, with China playing an increasingly responsible regional role. Even Taiwan has never been more prosperous and the situation in the Taiwan Straits is peaceful.

These benefits are the fruits of a wide variety of agreements that have established the framework for an extensive relationship. Throughout the normalization process, we have consistently adhered to three fundamental principles and realities:

First, that China is already a significant factor in Asia, and is destined to be an important element in international affairs in the future, a power with which we hope to work constructively and cooperatively for mutual benefit.

Second, that the United States and China share certain common and important international perceptions and concerns, and that the development of United States–China relations serves the interests of both our peoples and the cause of peace and stability in East Asia and the world.

And third, that progress in United States–China relations can be made without sacrificing the interests of our friends and allies in the region or our valued commercial, cultural and other unofficial relations with the people of Taiwan.

Adhering to these fundamentals, in 1979 we negotiated a normalization agreement which established diplomatic relations between the United States and China [10] and under which it was understood that commercial, cultural, and other contacts with the people of Taiwan would from then on be conducted on an unofficial basis.

Reflecting the importance that they placed on good relations and their confidence in the relationship's evolution and progress, both sides chose to move ahead with normalization even though not all of our differences had been resolved.

Among the differences left unresolved by the normalization communiqué was the question of arms sales to Taiwan. In the August 17 joint communiqué of last year, we provided a framework for managing our differences with China over this highly sensitive matter. However, the lengthy and intense negotiating process placed a considerable strain on the relationship.

One result was a pause in high-level contacts and exchanges, a part of our relationship with China that is particularly important for clearing up misperceptions and for building the confidence on which progress in the relationship depends.

Thus, the Secretary's objectives in visiting Beijing early last month were to put United States–China relations back on a stable, realistic footing, to resume the process of building confidence and trust, to continue our dialog on important international issues, and to address openly and honestly the various bilateral issues that commanded attention on both sides.

In my prepared statement which I have submitted for the record I have described some of the results of that trip. Since I am sure we will discuss the trip in the period for questions that follows, let me just say here that Secretary Shultz and Foreign Minister Wu Xueqian succeeded in restoring the international dialog to its rightful place in the relationship. It was a dialog of high quality, providing that while China may not yet be among the world's wealthiest nations, it is among the more sophisticated, with a decidedly global approach.

Our delegation could not help but be impressed with the serious, constructive, and realistic approach that the Chinese leadership took in our discussions on a wide variety of key issues, including the continued threat posed by Soviet power and expansionism, restoring peace and independence to Afghanistan and Kampuchea, and even on issues where we disagreed in important respects, such as the question of progress toward peace in the Middle East, the question of Namibian independence and the desirability of the withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola.

China and the United States will undoubtedly continue to have some differences over Taiwan. However, the relationship with China is important enough to us—and, it seems, also to the Chinese—that we will work hard to manage those differences in a way that preserves our focus on shared bilateral and international concerns.

The Secretary's visit was not intended to and did not attempt to renegotiate or go beyond the August 17 communiqué or earlier communiqués that previous administrations had negotiated with China concerning the Taiwan issue. But the Secretary did reassure the Chinese that, consistent with our intent to rebuild mutual trust and confidence, we will faithfully carry out the policies enunciated in those three communiqués, and we are confident that the Chinese will do the same.

That is the key, I believe, to managing effectively our differences over Taiwan. At the same time, we have consistently made clear to China that we have a deep interest in the well-being of the people of Taiwan, as reflected in the Taiwan Relations Act, [11] and will continue the productive, unofficial relationship that we have with them.

The common interests and constructive attitude which we found in many aspects of the international sphere are even more markedly present on bilateral matters. I have cited earlier expansion of economic, cultural and personal relations that provide important advantages to both nations.

Naturally, such increased contacts will, on occasion, lead to increased frictions. It is inevitable, as relations mature and develop and as trade and exchanges advance and multiply, that the attendant bilateral problems grow more complex. This is especially the case for two countries which maintain fundamentally different systems.

The technology transfer issue is a good example of a problem that is born of progress. Since 1979, and particularly during this administration, we have worked hard to facilitate Chinese access to advanced American technology. Licenses issued have gone up roughly 300 percent in the last 3 years.

Secretary Shultz made clear to the Chinese that we intend to support their modernization efforts, and that we will continue to provide them with a broad range of American technology from agricultural know-how to advanced scientific information. Most of these items, in fact, are not subject to export controls. Some are.

We intend to administer those regulations in a manner that supports China's development and maintain only those restrictions that are necessary for national security purposes. Secretary Shultz encouraged the Chinese to consider the vast range of items made available in the past few years, to appreciate how far we have come in this area, and to work with us to streamline both their bureaucratic practices and our own in order to smooth the interaction between our two economies.

Looking back over the events of the last month, as well as the rapid progress of United States–China relations over the past 11 years, it is noteworthy that both sides, despite the peaks and valleys that have characterized episodes in the development of the relationship, continue to place a high value on it. Both sides wish to preserve what has been accomplished and to move forward where possible and where mutually beneficial.

As the Secretary noted to the Chinese, enduring relationships more often emerge from a process of working out arrangements for dealing with seemingly intractable disputes than from dealing only with the easy problems. Given the progress made thus far and the undeniable benefits to both sides, it is clear that there will be no turning back.

Some difficult problems lie ahead in United States–China relations. We intend to deal with them fairly and openly, and not to take the relationship for granted. With good will, with appreciation of the value of the relationship, with adherence to our own basic principles, and with Chinese reciprocity—for good relations are a two-way street—the prospects for further progress are encouraging. The stable and enduring relationship that we seek is important to the healthy economic growth that both countries desire and makes an important contribution to regional stability and to world peace.

Thank you.

MR. SOLARZ. Thank you very much, Mr. Secretary.

I do not think you have to be concerned that anything you have said in your testimony will unduly discomfort our friends in Beijing or elsewhere in the region. It was a very carefully constructed statement.

Let me ask you this: Based on the testimony of your predecessor before this subcommittee, Mr. Holdridge, [12] we were given the impression that our commitment in the August 17, 1982, joint communiqué to gradually diminish the quality and quantity of our arms sales to Taiwan was based on an understanding with the People's Republic of China expressed in the communiqué that they would refrain from the use of force as a way of resolving the problem of Taiwan, and that they would, in effect, attempt to resolve the Taiwan problem through peaceful means alone.

[11] P.L. 96–8, approved April 10, 1979; for text, see ibid., pp. 989–994.

[12] John H. Holdridge, then Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, testified before the House Foreign Affairs Committee on August 18, 1982, on the joint communiqué signed the previous day. For an extract of his testimony and text of his statement before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on August 17, 1982, see ibid., 1982, pp. 1042–1053.

Based on Secretary Shultz's discussions in Beijing, would you say that this, in fact, is the Chinese interpretation of the August 17 communiqué, or, do they have a somewhat different interpretation of the possible use of force as a way of resolving the Taiwan problem in the future?

MR. WOLFOWITZ. I have looked at Secretary Holdridge's testimony fairly carefully, and I think it was very correctly stated there.

I do not believe we have an understanding with China; what we have in the communiqué is a statement by China of their policy and, as I think Secretary Holdridge said in his testimony both here and in the Senate, our statements about arms sales are premised on that Chinese statement about their policy.

That is a relationship which the Chinese have made some statements about. They feel that, in the first place, they are under no commitment to us, even with their opening statements and, of course, they continue to disagree even with the statement of arms sales policy that we have asserted.

I think the key to working out our differences is that we proceed through actions, not by discussing one another's words; that is, they continue their fundamental peaceful policy and we continue our policy on arms sales. The theoretical difference will then be worked out in practice.

MR. SOLARZ. They said in the joint communiqué that it was their fundamental policy "to strive for a peaceful solution to the Taiwan question."

Was there any discussion of the meaning of that statement in any of the discussions Secretary Shultz had in Beijing?

MR. WOLFOWITZ. The Secretary's general approach to this communiqué was not to try to clarify or elaborate pieces of it, which would amount in fact to trying to go beyond very carefully arrived at language; but to say that we have both made commitments, we have both made statements of policy in the communiqué, and that the President has instructed me, Secretary Shultz, to tell you directly, and in his name, that we are going to carry out our obligations under that communiqué and, of course, we expect you to carry out yours.

MR. SOLARZ. Are you saying there was no discussion of the attitude or position of the People's Republic of China with respect to the possible use of force as a way of resolving the problem of Taiwan in the discussions that Secretary Shultz held?

I mean, you are saying, in effect, that all he said about this was that everything was said in the communiqué where you expressed your position and we expressed ours, so let's move on and talk about other things, but we expect you to live up to your statements and we will live up to ours. There was no further discussion of what the words meant?

MR. WOLFOWITZ. That is essentially correct.

MR. SOLARZ. Would it be fair to say that based on the actual wording of this communiqué, while the People's Republic of China said it was its fundamental policy to strive for a peaceful solution of the Taiwan question, it clearly does not completely exclude the use of force, in the sense that the People's Republic of China says its policy is to strive for a peaceful resolution, but it doesn't go on to say that there are no circumstances under which it would use force?

Would that be an incorrect interpretation?

MR. WOLFOWITZ. I think that is why they are insisting on the point that they have made no commitments. But they have made a statement of policy, and I think the point is not to look at hypotheticals of what might happen if either one of us departed from the statements of policy made in the communiqué but, rather, to say that if we both follow these parallel courses of policy there is a way in practice to manage the differences of principle.

MR. SOLARZ. I am going to ask you the kind of question which is asked of students who seek admission to Talmudic or Jesuit academies. I am going to read to you two statements and I would like you to tell me how they are consistent with each other.

The first statement comes from paragraph 6 of the United States–China joint communiqué of August 17, 1982, which I gather was reaffirmed, in effect, through Secretary Shultz's discussions in Beijing. We committed ourselves, you have just testified, to carrying that communiqué out. In the communiqué it says in paragraph 6 that the United States "intends to reduce gradually its sales of arms to Taiwan leading over a period of time to a final resolution."

Yet the President, in a recent interview which he gave to Human Events, said the following:

> "If the day ever comes that those two find that they can get together and become one China in a peaceful manner, then there wouldn't be any need for arms sales to Taiwan, and that is all that was meant in the communiqué. Nothing was meant beyond that. We are not going to say, well, just as time goes by we are going to reduce the arms to them. No, we hope for a peaceful resolution of this issue." [13]

On the one hand, the communiqué says it is our intention to reduce gradually sales of arms to Taiwan over a period of time; on the other hand, the President says that we are not going to say, "Well, just as time goes by we are going to reduce the arms to them."

Can you perhaps reconcile this seeming contradiction?

MR. WOLFOWITZ. Well, I hope if I succeed I won't be forced to become a Jesuit or a Talmudist.

But it is a valid question. I think it is important, perhaps first of all, to recognize that on the one hand you are dealing with a carefully crafted negotiated document; and on the other hand you are dealing with an interview. Very much like a line of questioning here, the interview bears in from a certain direction and is asking a certain question.

I think the basic question that is being asked there as you read it in context is how on Earth could the United States have made this commitment to a gradual reduction? I think the President's answer is really a very direct version of what I just said a few minutes ago about the more carefully crafted language of the communiqué, which is that it is not merely as time goes by that we talk about reducing arms, but in the context of a Chinese statement of a fundamental policy of peaceful approach to the problem.

Transcript of the Department of State Daily Press Briefing, March 21, 1983 (Extract) [14]

. . . . . .

Q. Some stories coming out over the weekend indicate the United States has now "announced," or made known in some way, what the level of arms to Taiwan is to be for this year. How was that done?

A. Don, there was a Congressional Presentation Document that was sent up to the Hill some time ago—I would guess almost 2 weeks ago. It's an open, unclassified document that went up to the Hill. I think it is that document which makes these various estimates or projections public.

Q. Would you get those and make them available to us, because we've repeatedly asked the question in the past about these levels, and the answer was given that they had not been established?

A. Well, projections—Again, there are projections—I will check and see whether the Congressional Presentation Document [13] Human Events, February 26, 1983, pp. 1–19. The President's statement was in response to a question about the sale of arms to Taiwan.

[14] Source: Office of Press Relations, Department of State. Department of State Acting Spokesman Alan Romberg conducted the briefing, which began at 12:12 p.m. is available. I'm not sure that we're the ones to do that.

Q. Is it a State Department document?

A. I don't know the answer to that. But again, let me say to you that, again, they are projections; they may not be realized. I think that the thing to do perhaps is to look at that, and then come back with some specific questions. There is some guidance which I think could be useful. But I don't think addressing it in the abstract is going to be very productive.

Q. Could you get the guidance plus the document or whatever it is, so we could find out what is being talked about when they, the Chinese are complaining about something that we've never heard of up to now?

A. The document, I will see where the document is available. If it's available here, we'll be happy to make it available.

Q. The Chinese say that the projected level is $1.6 billion annually, something in that order—

A. No, no, no. They didn't say annually; they said over a 2-year period.

Q. All right, a 2-year period. And they said that, in effect, is a reneging on the implied or explicit promise by the United States to have a diminished supply of arms going to Taiwan. Would you comment on that?

A. Let me just say this on that: First, as I say, the figures are projections, and may not be realized in the course of the fiscal years which are cited. The figures which are cited in that document are $800 million for FY-83 and $780 million for FY-84.

Q. The second figure?

A. $780 million. Should these levels be realized, they would be fully consistent with the August 17 communiqué. As the communiqué says, the reductions will be gradual, and although there may be occasional fluctuations, the trend will be apparent over time. As the Secretary has said, we intend to keep our commitments.

There are various tables which explain how figures for past years might be adjusted to bring them up to '83 levels in terms of this year's dollars to make comparisons and so on, and that's in that same document.

Q. You're saying that the figures are consistent with the Taiwan communiqué—with the communiqué of August 17, and the People's Republic says they're inconsistent, [18] and that's the way you're going to leave it at this point?

A. I can't speak for the Chinese. They have to speak for themselves on this issue.

Q. They have spoken for themselves.

A. Fine. I am saying to you that, yes, we view these as consistent with the August 17 communiqué.

Q. It sounds like, from what you're saying, you have adjusted the previous sales figures for Taiwan by an inflation factor.

A. That's right. We haven't adjusted it, but there is provided in the Congressional Presentation Document a table which would give you an inflation index.

Q. Why, then, did not the commitments say we will supply less arms adjusted for inflation?

A. Don, as you know, we haven't tried to get as specific as that. As John Holdridge said before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in August, we had no figures in mind of any dollar limit. We haven't gotten to that sort of specificity.

Q. You've gotten to it now, right? That is what you're telling us.

A. Not in terms of a limit. I'm not trying to set limits. I'm just trying to explain to you what is in the document to the extent that I can without your having it in front of you, and why it is not inconsistent with the August 17 communiqué.

Q. This August 17 communiqué is all about limits. You're now citing some figure, but you're saying they're not limits?

[18] The Chinese Foreign Ministry Information Department charged on March 21 that the projected U.S. arms sales to Taiwan exceeded the level since 1979 and violated the stipulations of the August 17 communiqué. It stated that the Foreign Ministry had made formal representations to the U.S. Embassy in Beijing. (Foreign Broadcast Information Service, Daily Report: China, March 21, 1983, p. B1)

A. For example, let me give you one example, if I have a figure. I'm not sure I do.

The 1979 level, for example, was $598 million which, if adjusted for inflation, would be $830 million in 1983 dollars. But I'm not again—no, I'm not trying to set a benchmark or a specific limit.

Q. What's the point of producing the figures then?

A. Just because it is assumed that there would be questions about how this fits with previous years' sales.

Q. Alan, a minute ago you said you were trying to explain why these levels are consistent with the communique, and maybe I'm being obtuse, but I didn't hear anything you said that explains why they are. I heard you say that they are. Why are they consistent?

A. As I said before, as the communique says, the reductions will be gradual and, although there may be occasional fluctuations, the trend will be apparent over time. I've just given you a figure for example, 1979, which adjusted into 1983 dollars is $830 million as compared with the projections.

Again, I've got to stress they're projections of $800 million for FY-83 and $780 [million] for FY-84.

Response by the Secretary of State (Shultz) to a Question Asked Following His Address Before the World Affairs Council, Dallas, April 15, 1983 [16]

"We're a Country of Refugees"

They have reacted negatively to our decision to give amnesty to Hu Na.[17] I might say that for some reason there is a perception in this country, let alone in China, that that's something that the President decides, or decided. It isn't.

Amnesty issues are decided in a semi-judicial forum in the Immigration and Naturalization Service which is part of the Department of Justice. There are criteria that have been set up, and they make a decision. It isn't a decision made in the State Department or by the President or whatever, but, rather, a decision that's part of a process and part of an expression in the United States of a kind of natural concern that I suppose represents our heritage—concern over refugee issues.

Unlike most other countries—certainly unlike China—we're a country of refugees. We all came, back there somewhere or more recently, from someplace else. That means we kind of have an instinct for that sort of a problem. Whereas if you take a country like China or Japan or a typical Western European country or Scandinavian country, there is a much more homoge-

The question concerned the current status of U.S.–China relations following the Department of Justice's April 4 announcement that the Immigration and Naturalization Service had granted asylum to Chinese tennis player Hu Na.

[17] The Chinese Foreign Ministry protested the decision in an April 6 note to the U.S. Embassy in Beijing, the text of which was carried by Xinhua the same day. On April 7, Xinhua reported that the Chinese Ministry of Culture and the All-China Sports Federation had announced the cancellation of all cultural and sports exchanges with the United States for the remainder of 1983 because of the U.S. decision. nous population there, and they all come from there.

I think sometimes it's harder for people with that heritage to understand the instinct of the United States for the problem of a person who feels displaced or cast out in some way. That's just part of our instinct and heritage. Personally, I love it. I hope we never lose that sense of being willing to help people who are having a hard time.

Address by the Secretary of Commerce (Baldrige) Before the National Press Club, June 1, 1983 (Extracts) [18]

U.S.–China Trade Relations

I'm glad to be back at the Press Club again. I'm just back from a trip to Japan and China and would like to give some of my thoughts on these areas. I was pleased with both visits because I believe we accomplished what we set out to do.

Let me shift to China.

Two years ago the President and the Chinese established a joint commission on commerce and trade. This was the first meeting as a result of that decision. In fact, the decision to actually hold the first meeting means that both countries want to expand trade and other governmental relations despite our political differences. It has been obvious that the Chinese Government has tried to put their joint political, economic, and commercial problems in separate compartments, as we were well received and there was a good deal of interest in our visit from both the government and the press.

I met with Premier Zhao for an hour as well as with Finance Minister Wang, Vice Minister for Foreign Affairs Han and, of course, my host the Minister of Foreign Economic Relations and Trade Madame Chen Muhua in the joint commission meetings where Minister Chen and I were cochairmen.

We agreed that the Seventh Round of Textile Negotiations should resume as soon as possible with efforts made to reach final agreement in that round under the USTR team.

Second, China agreed in principle to hold detailed discussions with the United States on an agreement on industrial cooperation. They feel that industrial cooperation cannot be separated from technical cooperation and they've agreed to give U.S. companies early warning of China's plans so we can be ready to bid and to help. In short, early identification of Chinese projects so that American companies can get in on the ground floor.

Third, we exchanged drafts of a bilateral investment treaty and negotiations began today in Beijing. This treaty will get into repatriation of profits, how to settle disputes, arbitration methods, etc.

Fourth, we will send specialists in economic and trade law to hold seminars in China this year. China will send their experts here next year. This will increase the understanding on both sides of the various laws that affect our opportunities. The Chinese do not fully understand our trade laws and, I might add, they are not alone. On the other hand, we feel they need more transparency in their laws as they go through the process of legal revisions. Patent law and tax law are important issues here.

Fifth, the Overseas Private Investment Corporation will sponsor, along with China's Ministry of Foreign Economic Relations and Trade, an investment mission of U.S. business to China. In the last 2 years every time an OPIC mission like this has been sent, an upsurge in investment in that country has followed.

Sixth, China agreed to give the head of the U.S. trade development program a list of China's highest priority projects so that the trade development program can consider financing feasibility studies.

Seventh, China sent a coal mission to the U.S. recently and we have offered to send a technical mission on coal transportation to China to review projects such as unit trains.

Eighth, in telecommunications, we expect China soon to sign a protocol. Again this provides us with early notice of plans.

Finally, I delivered a personal letter to Premier Zhao from President Reagan. I emphasized to the Premier the importance which the President attaches to our relationship with the PRC. We spent a great deal of time on the issue of technology transfer, which the Chinese need from us to develop their economy and provide jobs for their increasing workforce.

The Chinese have been treated far differently in transfer of technology by the U.S. in the last 2 years than before. From their point of view, though, we have not achieved what they and the American companies involved want—and that is predictability and certainty in advance that cases will be handled quickly, and that they will get a clear answer.

The President asked me to tell the Chinese that this process will be improved significantly and quickly. The President made his policy on significantly higher levels of technology transfer clear when he announced it in 1981.[19] The difficulty has been in our ability to translate that policy into the actual technical level of technology we would sell.

One good example of the difficulty in putting the policy into action is in computers. There are 14 different guidelines involved. If one component falls outside of one of those guidelines, the computer can't go even if the general technology level is quite old and available elsewhere.

We have to fix up the system and that's what we are working on now.

Of course, we still must take into account national security concerns. It's a question of making the decisions within predictable guidelines that live up to the President's policy and doing it on a timely basis.[20]

Finally, let me mention an important agreement on textiles we've just reached with the People's Republic of China.[22] No free market currently exists in textiles—only what is called the Multifiber Arrangement signed by 46 countries.[23] We're a party to that arrangement, but China is not and our bilateral agreement with them[24] expired last December. To prevent a flood of imports from harming our struggling textile industry, we imposed unilateral quotas on China's products.

[19] Then-Secretary of State Alexander Haig announced plans to relax U.S. controls on the sale of high technology items to China at a press conference in Beijing on June 16, 1981. For the transcript of the press conference and the text of President Reagan's remarks on the subject at his press conference the same day, see American Foreign Policy: Current Documents, 1981, pp. 951–956.

[20] On June 21, Secretary Baldrige announced a U.S. Government decision to raise the level of high technology goods licensed for export to China which was to be put into effect after new technical guidelines were prepared and after consultation with U.S. allies.

[21] Source: White House Press Release, August 6, 1983, Office of the Press Secretary to the President; also printed in Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, August 15, 1983, p. 1104. The President spoke on nationwide radio at 12:06 p.m. For the portion omitted here, which covers other trade issues, see document 61.

[22] The agreement, retroactive to January 1, 1983, was effected by an exchange of notes at Beijing dated August 19, 1983. (Text of agreement in Department of State Press Release 370, October 18, 1983)

[23] Agreement regarding international trade in textiles, signed at Geneva on December 20, 1973; 25 UST 1001. It was extended by a protocol signed at Geneva on December 22, 1981; TIAS 10323.

[24] Signed at Washington on September 17, 1980; for text, see Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Jimmy Carter, 1980–1981 (Washington, 1982), pp. 1794–1801.

They responded with large reductions in their purchases of American farm products. We faced three options: option 1, end our restrictions on Chinese textiles, which would help our farmers but risk further damage to our textile workers; option 2, cut back Chinese exports even further, which would cost our farmers billions more in lost sales; or option 3, negotiate a tough but fair 5-year agreement with China to permit controlled, moderate growth of Chinese exports. We chose option 3.

Our textile producers can be assured there will be no flood of imports and they can get on with the task of modernizing their industry, which is the best long-term assurance of jobs for our own people. This new agreement will mean more business for our farmers. And it promises China the opportunity to sell its products here. That's important for good relations between our two countries.

Bit by bit we're restoring America's reputation as a reliable supplier and as a supporter of free and fair trade for progress and for peace.

Until next week, thanks for listening and God bless you.

Statement by the Secretary of Commerce (Baldrige) Before a Subcommittee of the House Committee on Energy and Commerce, September 27, 1983 [25]

U.S. Policy on Exports of Advanced Technology to China

I am pleased to have this opportunity to appear before this committee to talk about the U.S. Government's policy on technology transfer to the People's Republic of China. I believe we share the goal of improving economic relationships with the People's Republic of China, the most important aspect of which is technology transfer.

One of China's most important goals is to modernize her industrial base. If China is to increase the economic well being of her people, to provide jobs for the many unemployed in that country and to remain a secure and stable society, China must build her overall industrial strength. We consider China to be a friendly, nonallied country. If we turn our backs on China's modernization efforts, China will likely turn to our competitors. This does not serve our national interest. There are millions of people they have to provide jobs for. Their industrial base is outmoded and they need that kind of assistance.

The administration's intense efforts to improve technology transfer of U.S. products and technologies to the PRC is the result of lengthy deliberations within the Government. I would like to provide some brief historical perspective. In June 1981 President Reagan issued a directive governing technology transfer to the PRC which stated that the United States "supports a secure, friendly and modernized China" and allowed for approval of equipment and technology at technical levels twice that approved for the U.S.S.R. (prior to their invasion of Afghanistan).

Under this directive, all cases, even those below the "two times" threshold, were subject to interagency review so as to minimize any national security risk. In May 1982 Judge William Clark, Director of the National Security Council, issued another directive reaffirming this presidential policy.

In the fall of 1982 the Commerce Department, at my direction, initiated a detailed study of the existing "two times" policy. That study concluded that:

The policy was neither clear nor predictable to the involved government agencies, the business community, or the Chinese Government.

The "two times" benchmark was not easily applied across the commodity control list.

I might add that as I understand the statement, if anything, the "two times" benchmark was premised on a comparison of the level of equipment and technology going to the U.S.S.R. This comparison with the U.S.S.R. offended the Chinese Government.

Compared to what the U.S. Government allows to be licensed to the free world, the "two times" policy was demonstrably more restrictive, and the intent of the President to increase technology transfer to the PRC was not being fully implemented.

Following this study, the President, in May of this year, decided to place China in the same export category as certain other friendly countries, that is, category V. This presidential decision was made immediately preceding my trip to China to discuss technology transfer and other trade matters. In conjunction with the change to category V, the President also directed that an interagency steering group on PRC technology transfer be established under the direction of the National Security Council. Several committees were established and one committee, chaired by the Commerce Department, was asked to define the new technical guidelines which would be used by the United States Government to guide licensing decisions for products and technologies to the PRC.

The work of these committees is, for the most part completed, and new regulations describing the new China policy will be published in the Federal Register in the near future. [26]

I think it is important to note that this new technology transfer policy to the PRC is intended to substantially increase the flow of technology and equipment while retaining national security controls on truly sensitive equipment and technology. This new policy also is being closely coordinated with our COCOM allies so that we can continue to honor our multilateral control obligations. In fact, our consultations with our COCOM allies are ongoing, and until they are completed, I will not be able to provide a detailed description of that new policy.

I wish to emphasize that the new policy toward China is in the best interest of our national security and foreign policy. This view is shared by the Departments of Defense, State, Commerce, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the National Security Council, and, of course, the President. As you know, Secretary Weinberger is presently in China, where he is discussing our new technology transfer policy.

It is the President's belief that U.S. technology transfer should support China's technological and economic modernization, support China's integration within the world economic system, and assist the stable development of China's policy.

It is the view of the U.S. Government that the People's Republic of China is unlikely to pose a threat to the U.S. security interests unless there is a major infusion into that country of the most advanced military systems. Moreover, this technology transfer will not alter the U.S.-PRC stragetic balance, though the transfer of technology will prevent a widening of the military gap between the PRC and the U.S.S.R.

With that as background, I would like to explain in more detail the new technology transfer guidelines for the PRC. As noted, China will be placed in category V, with a national security review being retained for license applications to the PRC. Second, under the new guidelines, there will be three zones established to guide licensing decisions. They are: green zone, intermediate zone, and red zone. These zones are defined as follows:

License applications within this [green] zone will receive, for the most part, routine approval. The Department of Defense will delegate review authority to Commerce and no interagency review will be necessary.

These applications will represent minimum national security risk.

The green zone represents a major change in our policy because almost 75 percent of PRC applications will fall within the green zone. We have raised the levels of technology within this zone, and so will be able to process more applications more quickly. This speedier processing will be possible since there will no longer be the time-consuming interagency review, which has been a serious problem in processing PRC applications.

Applications within this zone [intermediate zone] will be for very high technology and will require case-by-case review by Defense and other agencies, as appropriate.

We may approve licenses within this zone unless the commodity or technology poses a clear threat to the U.S. security interests.

I expect we will approve a large number of cases in the intermediate zone, subject to a close national security review.

The red zone includes the most advanced technologies which we usually would not share even with our closest allies.

The red list will be classified and will not be divulged.

License applications to export items in the red zone will have a strong presumption for denial. They will have direct application to advanced military systems and would pose a clear threat to U.S. security interests.

In addition, a senior interagency group under the direction of the National Security Council will review quarterly our progress in implementing the new policy and will continue to review the products and technologies within the three zones and make additions or deletions as appropriate. This steering group will also review the technology transfer policy in the context of the state of our relations with the PRC.

It is our belief that the new China policy accomplishes the following goals: The establishment of clear and predictable guidelines for technology transfer, the streamlining of the licensing process enabling the Government to make much prompter decisions as to whether a product can or cannot be licensed to the PRC, and the establishment of substantially increased technological levels for products and technologies consistent with the national security concerns.

These are some details of the new PRC licensing policy. As we are still consulting with our COCOM allies and are also having discussions with the PRC Government which have not been completed, I cannot give you more details at this time. Consistent with this restriction, however, I would be pleased to answer any questions that you might have.

Statement by the Secretary of Defense (Weinberger), Beijing, September 28, 1983 (Extract) [27]

Secretary Weinberger's Visit to China

Good morning, ladies and gentlemen. A short statement and then I will be glad to try to take your questions.

I am very pleased to announce that President Reagan has invited Premier Zhao to make a state visit to the United States and the Premier has accepted the invitation and he will meet with the President at the White House in January of 1984. I am equally delighted to be able to tell you that President Reagan has also accepted an invitation from the Premier to visit the People's Republic of China in the spring of 1984. And finally, the Minister of National Defense, Minister Zhang, has accepted my invitation and he will visit the United States at a mutually convenient time, and I hope that will be soon.

As we depart Beijing I would just like to say first of all that the entire delegation has enjoyed their visit here very much. We appreciate the very warm hospitality provided by our Chinese friends and they have certainly lived up to their reputation as hosts. We feel that our meetings and discussions have been very useful and positive and my talks with the Premier and the Chairman this morning were very friendly and they will certainly assist, I think, in furthering mutual understanding between our two governments.

Our meetings with the Defense Minister and our staff level discussions have been very friendly and frank and productive. Our exchange of views on the global situation enhanced our mutual trust and confidence. We have divergent views of course in some areas, but our positions on most important issues, I think, are close and both sides have been reassured on that.

[27] Source: Public Statements of Secretary of Defense Weinberger, 1983. The statement was made at the beginning of Secretary Weinberger's press conference.

The staffs of our two sides have been engaged in intensive and detailed discussions of military technology cooperation, including discussions of specific weapons systems, and these discussions will continue with my personal participation. We've also had discussions of the civilian technology and dual use technology.

On the basis of the work here I'm really confident that we have secured the basis for a continuing relationship that will add greatly to the ability of both countries to deter war and thereby increase the chances of peace. I think we've made substantial progress in understanding each other's position, and I anticipate greatly expanded cooperation in the future in this area. Future exchange of visits by personnel in various military specialties from both countries, I think further develop the friendship and the cooperation between our armed forces.

Visit of Chinese Foreign Minister Wu

SENIOR DEPARTMENT OFFICIAL. I don't have any formal statement but just a few remarks.

I think this was a very good visit. [29] The talks were friendly, frank and constructive. They were also very lengthy. The number of topics that were covered of global issues, regional issues, bilateral issues is kind of a testimony to the breadth of the relationship. The fact is that they had extended their schedule 6 hours of meetings to about 8, and then had a wrap-session this afternoon and gone into a little business as well; it went over half an hour. It was a lengthy and extensive discussion; very useful ones.

Q. You mean those with Shultz were 8 hours?

A. With Shultz alone, yes. He also had nearly an hour with the President. He met with Secretary Regan, Secretary Baldrige, Science Adviser Keyworth.

Have I missed any other Cabinet officers? I think that's the list. Excuse me, and Deputy Secretary Thayer. Weinberger was off in Korea. I think he chatted briefly with Weinberger just before Weinberger [departed?]. He chatted at the dinner.

I think these talks were very constructive. They helped to lay the groundwork for what we hope will be very useful exchange of high-level visits when Premier Zhao comes here in January and when the President goes to China in April.

There were no breakthroughs, as I indicated in my original backgrounder. We didn't expect any. I think our relationship is on the kind of basis now where we have a lot in common, a lot to talk about, that we can usefully learn from one another, and quite a few problems as well that take time and have to be worked on. I think there was a general agreement that we had made considerable progress in the relationship since the two ministers met in Beijing in February, and that we look forward to continuing that progress over the coming months and through the two very important visits that we have scheduled for next year.

Q. What aspect of the Taiwan question was discussed, or aspects?

A. It was discussed in terms of its effect on our relationship, discussed in terms of—at least they talked to us some about their attitude, about their 9-point proposal. [30] Our position has been, and we have simply reiterated it, that there are differences between us. We know there are differences between us on this issue. We are trying to approach those differences by adhering faithfully to the communiqués that we have signed. Regarding the issue of Taiwan is something that the Chinese on both Taiwan and the Mainland have got to resolve between themselves.

[29] Chinese Foreign Minister Wu Xueqian visited Washington, October 11–13, following his participation at U.N. General Assembly meetings in New York.

[30] For text of the nine-point proposal set forth on September 30, 1981, by Ye Jianying, Chairman of the Standing Commitee of the National People's Congress, see American Foreign Policy: Current Documents, 1981, footnote 25, p. 963.

Our interest is, and hope, that resolution will take place peacefully.

Q. Excuse me, if I may follow on that. Some of the reports I read of interviews with Minister Wu, he has said that he did not think we were adhering faithfully to the communiqués. Did he bring that up?

A. We think we are adhering to it. There are obviously some differences of view about it, but, frankly, over time, I think we will probably accept—I mean, our point has been rather than quibbling about specific interpretations, look at our actions over time; and over time you'll see a trend, as the communiqués suggest, that there should be.

Q. I gather from what you're saying that he said he still doesn't think we're adhering to it.

A. I don't think he put it in quite those terms. You would have to ask him how he put it. I don't want to characterize it. I'll just tell our position is that rather than getting into disputations about specific commas and specific words in the communiqué, we know there are some differences about how it's looked at. We, for example, have recognized that if one is to look at quantities in terms of dollar figures, then you've got to take account of the fact that dollars inflate. But the main point is that over time they can expect to see a trend. And our basic message is, we take the commitment seriously; the President takes the commitment seriously, and we intend to live by it.

Q. On Monday,[31] you said there are three different areas in which there will be discussions regarding the transfer of different kinds of things. The first one was on peaceful nuclear cooperation. Can you kind of just go through these three areas as to where we stand on the basis of these discussions?

A. Okay. I'm not sure I can be all that helpful, but I'll try.

As it turned out, all three of those were discussed. I was more trying to indicate the difference because each one is fairly complicated and each one we have specific restrictions imposed on us by law and the restrictions are different. It really is hard to keep it straight. I noticed many press stories written by very good journalists that don't get it straight.

I think the Chinese have—one of the reasons we have these very long discussions is that it takes a lot of time to explain it. And, to be honest with you, sometimes I'm not sure I have it straight.

Let me start with what I think is really the most important, and that is dual-use technology; the technology that is licensed under the Export Administration Act, which has been the subject of major attention by us, ever since Secretary Shultz' visit to Beijing in February. In fact, I can almost say that the most important thing we learned in that visit was the depth of Chinese concern on that issue and some of the specific points on which they were concerned. That was discussed, I believe it's fair to say, largely in terms of both sides recognizing—although you would have to ask them to speak for themselves—I think there's a recognition on both sides of the significance of the President's decision to reclassify China in Category V, as it's called, under the Export Regulations, and of our subsequently developed guidelines that would provide for a substantial liberalization of controls on exports to China.

There was specific discussion, as I've already mentioned, of our need for assurances against the unauthorized retransfer of our technology to third countries. That was not concluded, but I think we made some progress.

The second area, the area of peaceful nuclear cooperation, was discussed at some length. The Chinese did announce to us—and this is a matter of public record now—I believe that they, as of yesterday it is, joined the IAEA which is a very significant step in bringing China in as a responsible player in international, peaceful nuclear programs.

It is well known that China has some serious reservations about the Non-Proliferation Treaty [32] and certain other aspects that flow from it, just as I believe the French do and for similar reasons.

We explained to them the requirements that we have under our law for certain kinds of assurances if we are to trade in peaceful nuclear technology with countries, for certain kinds of assurances both about how our specific technology will be used and also about how the country receiving it will behave in its general dealings with other countries. This is a very tough issue.

Ambassador Kennedy had a round of talks in Beijing that were useful. I think the discussions here this week, I hope, have moved us forward some, but we're still some distance from concluding an agreement there.

The agreement is important both because of what it would represent in terms of China's effective participation in limiting the spread of nuclear weapons; and also because it would open the way to what I think could be very mutually beneficial trade in advanced nuclear reactors, and so forth, that we can sell them.

The third area is the area of military technology. It was discussed briefly with the Secretary. The point there simply being to register the importance of the discussions that Secretary Weinberger and members of his party held while he was in Beijing, and then it was discussed in considerably more detail when Deputy Secretary of Defense Thayer and Assistant Secretary Armitage called on the Minister yesterday.

Frankly, I thought we had covered the subject in such detail when Weinberger was there that now it was a matter of get back to the staff work and figure out our own positions a little better. But, actually, I think the discussion we had yesterday gave us a clearer picture of a couple of points that the Chinese were stressing, and I think they have gotten a clear picture on our side.

For example, in the case of things they've asked for, it's mostly a matter now of our going back and doing our staff work, making our policy decisions and deciding what kinds of things we can move ahead on.

Statement by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs (Brown) Before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, November 9, 1983 [33]

Proposed Senate Resolution on the Future of Taiwan

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

May I say that we share the concerns of the Congress expressed in the resolution which you are considering. [34] We have made clear our concern for a peaceful solution of the Taiwan issue in a number of joint documents with the People's Republic of China. For example, the U.S. Government's policy concerning the future of Taiwan and its people has been stated in the Shanghai Communiqué and reiterated in the 1979 Joint Communiqué Establishing Diplomatic Relations.

In the February 1972 Shanghai Communiqué, the U.S. side stated: "The United States acknowledges that all Chinese on either side of the Taiwan Strait maintain there is but one China and that Taiwan is a part of China. The U.S. Government . . . reaffirms its interest in a peaceful settlement of the Taiwan question by the Chinese themselves."

[32] Signed at Washington, London, and Moscow on July 1, 1968; 21 UST 483.

[33] Source: The Future of Taiwan. Hearing Before the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session, on S. Res. 74 (Washington, 1984), pp. 6–7.

[34] Senate Resolution 74, introduced by Senators Claiborne Pell, John Glenn, and Edward M. Kennedy on February 28, 1983, stated that it was the sense of the Senate that "Taiwan's future should be settled peacefully, free of coercion, and in a manner acceptable to the people on Taiwan and consistent with the laws enacted by Congress and the communiqués entered into between the United States and the People's Republic of China." (Ibid., pp. 3–4)

The United States reaffirmed this statement in the 1979 communiqué normalizing relations and stated: "The United States continues to have an interest in the peaceful resolution of the Taiwan issue and expects that the issue will be settled peacefully by the Chinese themselves."

This consistent position has two main points: One, the resolution of the Taiwan issue is a matter for the Chinese themselves to decide; and, two, the United States has an interest in having that resolution be peaceful.

The U.S. Government, therefore, has not expressed any opinion on what form the ultimate resolution might take nor the procedures which the Chinese should follow to arrive at it, other than that those procedures should be peaceful.

It is this position which is reflected in the Taiwan Relations Act.

The Taiwan Relations Act emphasizes that "the U.S. decision to establish diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China rests upon the expectation that the future of Taiwan will be determined by peaceful means," and that the U.S. Congress considers it to be of grave concern to the United States "any effort to determine the future of Taiwan by other than peaceful means."

I would like to say a word about the resolution you are considering and its possible effect on U.S. relations with China.

The reference in the congressional resolution calling for a settlement of Taiwan's future "free of coercion and in a manner acceptable to the people on Taiwan" could be considered the addition of new and undefined elements to the U.S. position on Taiwan.

These provisions do not contradict U.S. policy. However, we believe this new and different iteration of U.S. policy may be unnecessary and even unhelpful since it may appear to qualify the expression of the U.S. policy which has been contained in formal statements such as the Shanghai and normalization communiqués.

I have been asked to comment on the likely reaction by the People's Republic of China to your resolution.

The People's Republic of China has consistently expressed its intense opposition to the Taiwan Relations Act, contending that it constitutes an interference in China's internal affairs and that its substance is counter to the commitments undertaken by the U.S. Government in the communiqué on the establishment of diplomatic relations with China.

The People's Republic of China further asserts that domestic legislation in the United States ought not to take precedence over governmental agreements concluded between nations. Officials of the People's Republic of China make these points without fail in any conversation with U.S. officials or private citizens which touches upon resolution of the Taiwan issue.

It is reasonable to assume that the People's Republic of China would respond along similar lines to the passage of the resolution you are presently considering. The People's Republic of China regards settlement of the Taiwan issue as solely an internal affair of China. Thus, it can be expected to contest strongly the right of any other State to legislate on this question.

In recent months, our relations with the People's Republic of China have been developing in a very positive fashion. We have seen visits to Beijing by Secretaries Shultz, Baldrige, and Weinberger as well as Dr. Keyworth, and last month we received the Chinese Foreign Minister, Wu. As you know, a visit by Premier Zhao Ziyang is planned for January, and the President will visit China in April 1984.

A number of significant bilateral agreements are currently being negotiated. A healthy and developing relationship between the United States and the People's Republic of China contributes to the overall stability of the Western Pacific region and, thus, to continued prosperity and development of Taiwan.

The extent to which passage of the resolution would cast a shadow over these positive developments in United States-PRC relations is subject to debate, but this is a factor that should be considered by the resolution's sponsors.

In sum, while we do not consider the amendment to be inconsistent with our policy, its passage has the potential to cause complications in our relations with China.

Thank you.

Transcript of a White House Press Briefing, November 28, 1983 (Extract) [35]

Pending Legislation Relating to Taiwan

MR. SPEAKES. . . . There's been some speculation and some news coverage and some statements from the People's Republic of China regarding two pieces of legislation that are pending, mainly the Pell amendment in the Senate and the IMF legislation, which has been approved by the Congress, although it has not yet arrived at the White House for signature. [36]

Both measures reflect the views of the members of Congress who voted for them on specific issues. The policy of this administration toward the People's Republic of China has been clearly and consistently enunciated many times. We recognize the People's Republic of China as the sole legitimate Government of China and we do not think that the Senate resolution or the amendment to the IMF appropriations bill should affect Premier Zhao's visit to the United States and the President looks forward to visiting the People's Republic of China.

Questions on that?

Q. Yes. You say that we recognize the People's Republic of China as the sole legitimate Government of China.

MR. SPEAKES. Yes.

Q. Is there another China somewhere?

MR. SPEAKES. No, that's it.

Q. Is that the same thing as the Shanghai Declaration?

MR. SPEAKES. It's the Shanghai Declaration as expanded on by the Carter establishment of diplomatic relations with the People's Republic.

Q. When is the President going to China? Has that been set?

MR. SPEAKES. April.

Q. What date?

MR. SPEAKES. Don't have the specific dates yet.

Q. What do we feel about reunification of Taiwan with China, which I think is what specifically is addressed in the—

MR. SPEAKES. The stated policy is that it's a matter for the Chinese people.

Q. The President will have an opportunity to either sign or veto this legislation?

MR. SPEAKES. Yes.

Q. Will he sign or veto it?

MR. SPEAKES. I would anticipate he would sign it, but I think he will be in a position to express his views, as I have expressed it, and the views will be as I've expressed here.

Q. Beyond—

Q. One more. In other words, he might sign the legislation making it law, at the same time, say he really doesn't agree with it.

MR. SPEAKES. The IMF legislation, as you know, does not change anything.

Q. I don't know. That's why I'm asking.

[35] Source: White House Press Release, November 28, 1983, Office of the Press Secretary to the President. The President's Principal Deputy Press Secretary Larry Speakes conducted the briefing, which began at 1:38 p.m.

[36] Senate Resolution 74, or the Pell Resolution, was passed by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on November 15. House Resolution 3959, which provided supplemental appropriations for international financial institutions, declared that it was the sense of the Congress that "Taiwan, Republic of China, should remain a full member of the Asian Development Bank, and that its status within that body should remain unaltered no matter how the issue of the People's Republic of China's application for membership is disposed of." It was passed by the Senate on November 17 and the House on November 18. For text, see P.L. 98-181, approved November 30, 1983; 97 Stat. 1153.

The Chinese Foreign Ministry protested the Senate Foreign Relations Committee action in a note given to the Embassy in Beijing on November 18; for text, see The Future of Taiwan, pp. 35-36. Chinese Communist Party General Secretary Hu Yaobang declared at a press conference in Tokyo on November 26 that if the U.S. reply was not satisfactory, "we will have to reconsider if the exchange of visits between Premier Zhao and President Reagan can materialize." (Foreign Broadcast Information Service, Daily Report: China, November 28, 1982, p. B1)

MR. SPEAKES. Yes. The IMF legislation has a provision in it for the Asian Development Bank. It includes a reference to Taiwan that we don't customarily use. The same is true in the Senate resolution, the so-called Pell Resolution.

Q. The Pell Resolution is the more onerous one as far as the Chinese are concerned.

Q. He doesn't have to sign that, does he?

MR. SPEAKES. No, he does not have to sign the Pell Resolution, but he will sign the IMF legislation, I would anticipate. But I think that the reservations I have expressed here are his reservations.

Q. Larry, what is the reference in the IMF bill that's not normally used or is it too long for you to—

MR. SPEAKES. No, it's not too long, but I never let those words part my lips.

Statement by President Reagan, November 30, 1983 [37]

No Change in U.S. Policy Toward China

In signing this appropriation legislation, [38] which includes funding for the Multilateral Development Banks, I would like to clarify one point. While I firmly believe that we must continue the valuable and productive unofficial relations with the people of Taiwan, and I strongly support efforts to ensure their continued participation in the Asian Development Bank, certain terminology used in the amendment to the bill concerning this issue is not consistent with United States Government policy, which recognizes the People's Republic of China as the sole legal government of China. I want to make clear that my signing of this bill does not reflect any change in the position of four successive Presidents with respect to China nor should it be interpreted as any shift in the U.S. Government's recognition policy.

Response by President Reagan to a Question Asked During an Interview, December 15, 1983 [39]

U.S. Relations With China

I don't think they do. I know that the People's Republic of China is uncomfortable with our position on Taiwan. But we have reiterated time and time again to them that the people of Taiwan are longtime friends and, in fact, once were allies of ours. We have recognized that there is one China and that its capital is Peking. But we believe that the differences between Peking and Taiwan should be settled by peaceful negotiations.

We can't cast aside one friend in order to make another. We have argued to representatives of the People's Republic that they themselves should take some comfort from that because it's assurance to them that we wouldn't throw them aside to make friends with someone else.

I think we've made great progress. I know that sometimes the Government of the People's Republic has to speak out about this issue, but our trade relations and cooperation in the area of high technology, all of these things represent milestones and successive steps in improving our relations.

READEX FICHE

Now, the head of their government is coming here and I am going there in the spring. We're going to find other areas where we can improve and increase our relationship—cultural exchanges, things of that kind. All of this, I think, is on a good track. We've made some gains.

Document 479

Prepared Statement by the Deputy Director for Southeast Asia, Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense (International Security Affairs) (Meade), Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, March 18, 1983 (Extract) [1]

Security Assistance for Indonesia

. . . . . .

Our defense relations with Indonesia are based firmly on a shared commitment to the stability and independence of the nations of Southeast Asia. This commonality of interests has increased as a result of the expansion of Soviet forces in the region and the continuing Vietnamese occupation of Kampuchea.

Indonesia's foreign policy is based upon genuine nonalignment. While maintaining its nonaligned status, Indonesia greatly appreciates our friendship and values the assistance provided to its armed forces through FMS credits and IMET funds. U.S. assistance has been instrumental in enhancing Indonesian self-defense capabilities. The growing economic strength and political stability of Indonesia since the mid-1960's are major contributions to the stability of Southeast Asia, and these developments enhance U.S. interests in the region.

Indonesia's confidence in U.S. support has increased considerably since the late seventies. U.S. security assistance programs for our friends in the region, including Indonesia, reached a nadir in the late 1970's. In 1977, for example, FMS credits for Indonesia were $23 million. However, with the Vietnamese move into Kampuchea in 1978 and the expanding Soviet presence in Southeast Asia, the Congress strengthened our commitment by approving increased security assistance programs for our friends in the region, including $40 million in FMS credits for Jakarta in 1982. The increase in the Indonesian program underscored President Reagan's assurance to President Soeharto last October that the United States was a reliable friend. When visiting Jakarta in November, Secretary Weinberger reaffirmed to the Indonesian Defense Minister our intention to retain a major influence in Southeast Asia and to continue our strong support for Indonesian defense requirements.

The reduction in the FY 83 program threatens to undo the improvements of recent years and undermine the credibility of our security relationship. Without the supplemental $30 million for 1983, Indonesia may be forced to forego procurement of 105-MM artillery ammunition and the completion of a major overhaul to extend the life of its C-130 aircraft. If approved, the supplemental credits would be used to finance programs which are ongoing and which are appropriate for Indonesia's defense needs.

We anticipate that the requested FY 84 $50 million program in credits will be used to enhance the Indonesian Army's fire support capabilities, to improve further the capacity of its communications, and to upgrade its ability to support its combat forces through improved logistics systems. You will note that these are not extravagant systems involving sophisticated technology, but capabilities that are appropriate to Indonesia's defense requirements.

Indonesia has the fifth largest population in the world and it is by far the largest country in Southeast Asia. The $2.7 million requested in IMET funds is not large given the size of the Indonesian Armed Forces and the importance of the officer corps within Indonesian society. The entire range of our relations with Indonesia has benefited immeasurably from the mutual understanding engendered by these training experiences.

In conclusion, I would like to note that the nations of this region, desiring to protect their emerging importance as an economic and political community and sensitive to the substantial threat to their security, will seek adequate levels of security assistance from friendly Free World countries. It is in our mutual interest to respond to these requests to the extent we are able. We believe our security assistance requests for the Philippines and Indonesia meet real needs and should be supported.

Fiscal Year 1984 Assistance Requests for Indonesia

. . . . . .

Our request for Indonesia is:

For FY 83, we are recommending $21 million in supplemental FMS guaranteed credits, bringing the FY 83 request to $41 million.

For FY 84, we are requesting:

—FMS: $50 million in FMS guaranteed credits, a straight line projection of our original FY 83 request;

—Military Training (IMET): $2.7 million, an 11% increase over FY 83;

—Development Assistance: $64 million in developmental assistance, one million dollars less than last year because of overall budget stringencies; and —PL 480: $39.2 million in PL 480 assistance, up approximately a half million dollars over FY 83.

. . . . . .

Indonesia

I would turn now to our relations with Indonesia, a nation strategically located astride vital inter-ocean sea lanes, an important member of ASEAN and a moderate, friendly voice in world affairs.

Policy Framework

For nearly two decades, we have enjoyed close and cooperative political and economic relations with Indonesia, based on three essential pillars:

(1) common strategic perceptions and interests in Southeast Asia, especially our mutual commitment to the stability and independence of the states of the region;

(2) mutually beneficial, multibillion dollar trade and investment relations; and

(3) political dialogue and frequent cooperation, bilaterally and in multilateral fora, on such diverse issues as the Indochinese refugee problem, the situation in Kampuchea and human rights.

The State visit of President Suharto last October [3] underscored the importance we attach to our relationship with Indonesia and imparted to it a new vitality and warmth. This new momentum in our relations comes at an opportune time, as Suharto embarks on his fourth term as Indonesian President and as we confront such challenges as growing Soviet military presence in the Pacific and the severe impact of the global recession.

Program Justification

Our developmental and security assistance programs play a key role in fostering strong relations with and preserving our interests in Indonesia. These programs aim at three general goals:

---

[2] Source: Foreign Assistance Legislation for Fiscal Years 1984–85: Hearings and Markup Before the Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session (Washington, 1983), Part 5, pp. 571, 578–585.

[3] President Soeharto's state visit was from October 12 to 15, 1982.

(1) they help insure the stability and growing prosperity of Indonesia, one of the lynchpins of a stable Southeast Asia;

(2) they provide a measure of U.S. access to key Indonesian decisionmakers; and

(3) they are a concrete manifestation of the humanitarian concerns which underlie our policies.

U.S. Economic Assistance

Indonesia has made major economic progress during the past 15 years. By 1981, Indonesia in fact joined the ranks of the world's middle income per capita nations, as measured by the World Bank. The reelection of President Suharto March 11, and the likelihood that he will continue to rely on many of the same members of his economic management team, indicate that the regime's moderate and pragmatic economic policies will continue.

Yet the economic challenges which Indonesia faces are formidable. Some of its problems are long-term and structural in nature: over-dependence on oil earnings, daunting unemployment in a nation whose workforce grows two million annually, an agricultural economy pushed to the limit to meet its basic food needs.

Of more immediate concern are the severe impact of the global recession, which has cut Indonesia's export earnings about 49% the past two years; the near certain further drop in oil prices, on which the country has depended heavily to fund its ambitious and successful development efforts; and the effect of a prolonged drought, which has impacted adversely on the 1982 and 1983 rice crop. This coincidence of events, essentially beyond the control of the Indonesian Government, presents the country with a serious economic challenge.

The Indonesian Government has already taken several important steps to deal with these problems. President Suharto recently announced an austerity budget, putting a lid on Government operating expenditures. The Government has cut subsidies on key consumables such as fertilizers and refined petroleum products and taken measures to improve collection of public revenues. New trade regulations will probably result in fewer consumer imports, while a major effort is underway to spur non-petroleum exports.

The past strong record of economic management of Indonesia's leadership indicates it will succeed in surmounting its problems. We are committed to help, as the President pledged we would to President Suharto last October. As you know, we have already increased our FY 82 PL 480 Title I assistance to Indonesia from the originally projected $20 million to $30 million, in recognition of the drought's impact. For FY 84 we are seeking $30 million in PL 480 Title I and $64 million in developmental assistance, essentially a straight-line projection from this year.

Our developmental aid will be directed at four main targets: (1) helping Indonesia achieve food self-sufficiency; (2) expanding rural employment opportunities, especially in non-farm jobs; (3) improving family planning and basic health care; and (4) improving selected aspects of education and training.

Our PL 480 assistance will help minimize the amounts of scarce foreign exchange that Indonesia need commit to grain imports, while generating funds for specifically designated projects aimed at the neediest elements of society.

I would also note that our bilateral economic assistance programs are supplemented by important U.S. contributions to the international financial institutions. The World Bank and the Asian Development Bank, in particular, work cooperatively with the Indonesian Government and have made major contributions to Indonesia's development effort.

Security Assistance

Turning to security assistance, I would like first to address our request for both an FY 83 FMS supplemental of $21 million and an FY 84 FMS level of $50 million.

As the subcommittee is aware, we regret deeply that extremely tight budgetary constraints forced the slashing by 60% of our original FY 83 FMS request of $50 million. The cut came at a particularly unfortunate time: immediately on the heels of the Suharto visit, just when Jakarta was beginning to feel the impact of its economic problems, and at a time when we are looking to strong and stable governments in countries like Indonesia to contribute to the stability of Southeast Asia. More generally, such a cut contributes to the erroneous impression that the United States is lessening its interest in the area and in ASEAN at a time when we wish to support just the opposite.

We believe that a restoration of FY 83 FMS through a $21 million supplemental (yielding a level slightly above the FY 82 total) would mitigate much of the disappointment in Jakarta over the initial cut. It would also be of particular substantive importance to the Indonesian Government now, in light of its tight foreign exchange situation. We anticipate that the bulk of the funds would be used in procurement of badly needed war reserve munitions and the overhaul of C–130 aircraft, which are essential to give the Indonesian Armed Forces even a minimal capability to defend their far-flung archipelago.

We believe with equal vigor, and for many of the same reasons, that an FY 84 FMS level of $50 million is warranted and needed. While respecting Indonesia's nonaligned status, we have developed a constructive security assistance relationship. This reflects our mutually shared strategic perceptions and demonstrates our readiness to assist Indonesia in meeting its legitimate defense needs. The FMS we provide will be used in essential military modernization programs. We anticipate, for example, that substantial portions of the funds would be used in procurement of an adequate air defense system and shipborne weapons systems.

Before concluding the discussion of security assistance programs, I would say a brief word about our FY 84 IMET request of $2.7 million. Indonesia's military leaders regard personnel training as a key element in their force modernization program and our IMET program as one of the most important aspects of their training effort. The FY 84 program will permit about 300 Indonesian middle and upper grade officers to travel to and train in the United States, while U.S. Mobile Training Teams (MTTs) train additional hundreds of Indonesian officers in Indonesia. This overall effort makes a considerable contribution to upgrading Indonesian managerial and technical capabilities in critical defense-related fields and, incidentially, provides those officers who will be the backbone of their country's future military and political leadership an understanding and appreciation of the United States.

CONCLUSION

I would conclude my comments this afternoon with three observations.

First, we have substantial security, political and economic interests in the Philippines, in Indonesia and, more generally, in Southeast Asia, where, as ASEAN members, these countries play leading roles. It is important that we provide sufficient resources to match and promote these bilateral and regional interests.

Second, our assistance programs are tied to our continuing humanitarian interests in the Philippines and Indonesia. Our developmental and food aid programs, of course, address those interests directly. Our total aid effort, including security assistance, fosters stronger bilateral relationships. Out of these grow bilateral dialogues and cooperation on other important issues such as human rights and refugees.

Third, and finally, we seek to be a nation clear in our strategic goals, faithful in our friendships and reliable in our long-term commitments. That, too, is what our friends want of us. I would hope that our assistance programs for the Philippines and Indonesia for FY 83 and FY 84 can be constructed and implemented according to those principles.

Statements by President Reagan and Japanese Prime Minister Nakasone, January 19, 1983 [1]

Visit of Japanese Prime Minister Nakasone

THE PRESIDENT. Nancy and I have been very pleased to have as our guest Prime Minister Nakasone and his wife and daughter. These last 2 days have given us the opportunity to get to know the Prime Minister and his family, and to establish the kind of warm personal relationship that is so vital to nations that are as close as the United States and Japan.

The Prime Minister's visit so soon after he assumed office underscores the significance that we both place on U.S.-Japanese relations and our role as leaders of the two industrialist giants of the free world.

Our consultations were friendly and covered a wide agenda of very serious issues, and I am pleased that we have made some imprint on the first steps in the area of trade, something of utmost significance to the economic well-being of both our peoples; to economic health of the Western world; and we are encouraged by the recent commitments to further open Japan's markets.

I am aware of the political sensitivity in Japan to tariff reductions on a number of products as well as to the Prime Minister's decision to conduct a comprehensive review of their standards and certification systems. Yet nothing would better prove to the American people the good intentions of our Japanese trading partners than tangible progress in revising relevant Japanese certification laws and regulations, to remove obstacles that have currently impaired some of our manufactured exports to Japan.

In the area of energy trade between our two nations, we have agreed to establish the U.S.-Japan Working Group on Energy, to actively explore how the abundant opportunities for energy cooperation can be transformed into realities for the benefit of both our countries.

During our wideranging consultations we discussed our intention for extensive and fruitful cooperation in space. I presented the Prime Minister with a plaque containing the flags of our two nations which were flown together on the first flight of the Space Shuttle Columbia.

I am pleased to announce today that I have offered Prime Minister Nakasone, and he has accepted, the opportunity for Japanese participation in our shuttle program, including an invitation for a Japanese specialist to be a part of the space lab mission in 1988.

Both the Prime Minister and I look forward to continuing our efforts together in peaceful use of the vast expanses of space. Further, I am encouraged after our meetings, and also by recent positive initiatives taken by the Prime Minister, the Japanese Government is now willing to do more to share in the burden of peace and stability.

This is a responsibility that hangs heavy on the shoulders of all peacelovers, and the Prime Minister has assured me that Japan is committed to increasingly play their part in this crucial undertaking.

My meetings with Prime Minister Nakasone have been excellent both on a personal and a professional level, and I am gratified at the rapport we developed in this short time, and I am confident it will be put to good use in the future.

We have taken the first significant steps towards resolving the urgent challenges which face our two countries. We can now move forward with our 1983 agenda, which seeks mutually acceptable answers to questions, especially in trade, that continue to weigh heavily on our relationship.

We stand as equal partners in the world, and I am convinced that no two nations are more mutually dependent than the United States and Japan. I know the Prime Minister shares this view. Our partnership is so essential, we have a strong obligation to our own peoples, to each other, to insure its continued vitality.

And, again, we have enjoyed and appreciate this visit by the Prime Minister and look forward to welcoming him to our country again for the Williamsburg Summit this spring.

PRIME MINISTER NAKASONE. Thank you very much, Mr. President.

As you may recall, Mr. President, you were the first foreign leader I greeted over the telephone when I assumed the post of Prime Minister of Japan.

Yesterday and today I had frank exchanges of views with you. We discussed issues related to world peace and arms control, and the world economic situation and our bilateral issues.

It is a great pleasure for me that our talks have been fruitful and we could reconfirm our mutual friendship and confidence. You are indeed a man of strong conviction, dedicated to peace. Japan and the United States have the important relations of alliance, having broad economic and cultural ties of mutual reliance across the Pacific, and are dedicated to the cause of freedom and democracy.

Solid cooperation between Japan and the United States is the cornerstone of peace in Asia, the Pacific, and the world. We reconfirmed that both Japan and the United States intend to share responsibilities in the world appropriate to both countries.

Frictions between our two countries can be solved by consultation between us. We are both strong democracies who can do so.

Finishing my friendly talks with President Reagan, I am going back to Japan with satisfaction and confidence. I should like to express my most sincere gratitude for the hospitality extended to myself and my family by President and Mrs. Reagan, particularly for their kindness in inviting us for a breakfast meeting this morning.

I have extended my invitation to President and Mrs. Reagan to visit Japan, and my wife and I look forward to welcome you at a time convenient to both of us.

Finally, I thank the American people of all walks of life for their kindness during my stay.

Thank you very much. (Applause)

Transcript of a Press Conference by the Secretary of State (Shultz), Tokyo, February 1, 1983 (Extracts) [2]

Discussions During Secretary Shultz's Visit to Tokyo

. . . . . .

Q. I have the following two questions, both concerning defense matters: when we look at the budget message covering fiscal year 1984 and the defense report issued recently, a tremendous amount of funds is allocated to the defense area. Also there is a matter of collective defense with European countries, South Korea, and Japan. Against this background, the "Team Spirit" military exercise is starting today. North Korea has reacted to this by calling for a state-of-readiness on the part of all its forces. It is the first time North Korea has called for a state-of-readiness of its forces and is treating the situation as if war is on the brink of breaking out.

Now, Mr. Secretary, what sort of comment would you make to this situation? That is the first point.

The second point concerns the defense of the sealanes by Japan. In connection with this ramification of collective defense, we are very much interested and very much concerned with the sealanes defense matter. In this connection, to what level and extent do you think Japan's defense capabilities should be enhanced to meet the expectations that Japan faces from other countries? What do you think would be a reasonable level of defense capability on the part of Japan to discharge its responsibility compared to the present level? That is the second question.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. With respect to the first question, people throughout the world are interested in peace. The United States and its allies will start no wars. Our efforts to build up our defense forces are efforts to create the capacity to deter aggression. That is our objective. And if our opposition can be convinced of that, perhaps they will even agree with us to reduce the level of armaments. But we know that we must have the strength to defend our interests against aggression and to work with our allies in doing so as well. I think that is the basic point, and it applies whether we are thinking with respect to the Soviet Union, North Korea, what is happening in Cambodia or throughout the world.

With respect to the second question, Japan has set for herself the mission of being responsible for the defense of the airspace of Japan and for the seas around Japan. And I think that is a very appropriate mission, given the fact that Japan is obviously a seafaring nation and depends upon air and sea traffic and movement. It is clear that to fulfill responsibilities in connection with that mission, more needs to be done. How much more remains to be seen. But certainly a greater effort is necessary. And no one disputes that. The question is, how rapidly can this mission be taken up. We applaud the determination that Prime Minister Nakasone has been expressing in this regard.

Q. Looking at relations between Japan and the United States recently, it seems that trade friction has become less important since Prime Minister Nakasone assumed power. Is it correct to say—I have two questions on this. Is it correct to say that the two countries decided to solve at least part of the trade friction problem through exchange of military technology or through an improvement of Japanese expenditures for defense? The second thing is, what are the trade problems which are still to be discussed and which you have been discussing with Japanese leaders in these days? Thank you.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. There is no tradeoff between an exchange of military technology and the solution of so-called "trade frictions" involving access to Japanese markets or other such things. These are independent matters. Of course, we were all pleased, the President was pleased, at the announcements that Prime Minister Nakasone made before he came to the United States for some additional measures, particularly measures dealing with the processes through which goods from another country get into the Japanese market, and for changing those conditions of inspection and registration and so on. And it has been interesting and reassuring to hear also the sense in which the Japanese in charge have a good sense of the fact that it is not enough to set a policy. There has to be a kind of managerial follow-through to transform a policy statement into an operating reality. And there appears to be a firm grasp of that point and, at least expressed to me, a determination to follow through on it. That will, of course, not be the end of all these frictions, but it will be a great help.

I might say beyond the particulars of whatever trade disputes there are between the United States and Japan, we share a tremendous stake in maintaining the general openness of the world trading system. And that openness is under severe attack by forces of protectionism around the world. I think that it well behooves Japan and the United States together, and along with other countries, to, in a sense, take responsibility for keeping this system open and healthy, because we both have so much to gain as do others around the world.

Address by the Secretary of State (Shultz) Before the Sixth Shimoda Conference, Warrenton, Virginia, September 2, 1983 [3]

Japan and America: International Partnership for the 1980's

Distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen: The Shimoda Conferences are the most important nongovernmental forum for the discussion of the Japanese-American relationship. These meetings bring together a truly distinguished body of experts in the field of Japanese-American relations and people from both countries who care about the future of our partnership. I am pleased and honored to take part today in the Sixth Shimoda Conference—the first to be held in the United States.

As most of you know, Shimoda has a symbolic and historical significance that long precedes these conferences. Formal relations between Japan and America in fact began with the Treaty of Amity, signed in 1854, which opened Shimoda as a port of refuge for American shipping. A few years later a commercial treaty was signed by our first Consul, Townsend Harris, who opened the first American Consulate in Japan—at Shimoda.

Much has changed since then. Both our countries have grown from isolated agrarian societies into major industrial powers actively engaged in the affairs of the world. If Shimoda in 1854 represents the beginnings of communication between us, the Shimoda Conferences today reflect the richness and fullness of our cooperation in the modern era.

I want to say a few words here about the importance of our relationship, the impressive record of our cooperation, and the agenda of common action that is still before us.

It is truly extraordinary that two countries so culturally different, so geographically distant, have forged a partnership as close and effective as ours.

Its importance in the last 30 years can be measured by some economic statistics, which show:

—Japan took about 10 percent of our total exports last year, a larger share by far than any country except Canada.

—We bought 25 percent of Japan's total exports.

—In 1976 our two-way trade already was a whopping $27 billion, but in 1983, it is expected to exceed $60 billion, more than double what it was 7 years ago, and more than triple what it was 10 years ago.

—Our combined Gross National Product now accounts for about 35 percent of the total GNP of the world.

Even more important than the statistics, however, is the recognition on both sides that our ideals and values are fundamentally the same, and that our political, economic, and security interests are fundamentally congruent. We are two great democracies, permanent friends, firm allies, and partners in any number of cooperative endeavors, from mutual security, to aid for developing countries, to medical research. I can tell you that the American people are proud to be friends and allies of modern Japan.

But like all good things, our partnership requires care and attention to maintain it. These conferences, I notice, have often convened during times of stress in the relationship. In 1967, the First Shimoda Conference dwelt on two potential problems then looming on the horizon: continuation of the Security Treaty [4] and the negotiation on the reversion of Okinawa. In 1969, at the time of the Second Shimoda Conference, there was much concern about what many referred to as the textile "war" that had erupted between us. In 1977, considerable attention was given to tentative plans that the United States had for withdrawing our ground troops from Korea—plans that were later dropped.

It is well to remember that stress is not new to this relationship. As some of you may know, Commodore Perry brought with him to Japan a letter from President Fillmore. Like some of the correspondence between the President and the Prime Minister today, its subject was trade relations. When the 1854 Treaty of Amity was being negotiated, the American side was under pressure at home to secure trading rights in Japan. And yes—they found the going pretty tough!

But it is also well to remember that the problems we have faced from time to time in our relationship have been met and solved to mutual satisfaction. Such solutions demand dialog—of the kind so well exemplified by this conference. Undoubtedly there are problems of communication; because of cultural and linguistic differences, there probably always will be. Real dialog is a process of talking and listening, and it is clear that this process is increasingly characteristic of our relationship.

[4] For text of the Treaty of Mutual Cooperation and Security, signed at Washington on January 19, 1960, see 11 UST 1632.

The frequency of our bilateral consultations has expanded enormously in the past few years. When I meet with Foreign Minister Abe during the President's trip to Japan this November, it will be our sixth meeting this year. In November the President and Prime Minister Nakasone will be meeting for the fourth time this year. [5] It was not until 30 years after the end of World War II that an American President first visited Japan. Now, when President Reagan goes to Japan in November, he will be the third consecutive President to do so.

And the dialog is expanding at every level. At our annual Aid Consultations in June, for example, the Japanese side suggested and we agreed that our yearly meetings were not enough to get the job done. Henceforth, we will meet quarterly. The semiannual Japan–U.S. sub-cabinet economic consultations involve nine US departments and organizations, with their Japanese counterparts, in reviews of the full-range of our economic relations.

Nongovernmental contacts are expanding just as fast. I take particular personal interest in the newest of these—the U.S.–Japan Advisory Commission—members of which are here with us today. This Commission has been charged by the President and Prime Minister to look over the horizon and provide ideas and recommendations on the problems and opportunities of the future, and consider how the United States and Japan can cooperate in meeting them. This is an awesomely open-ended mandate, but the Commission has made considerable progress in its first 3 months.

The United States enthusiastically welcomes the expansion of this dialog. It is a reflection of the maturity of the relationship as well as of its scope. It has helped not only to solve bilateral problems, but also to prevent a number of problems from developing at all. Rarely in history have two nations conferred so fully and so frequently on so many subjects.

The very growth of the dialog, however, can raise problems of its own. In an earlier, less complex stage of the relationship, all of its important bilateral issues were addressed by men and women thoroughly conversant with all aspects of the relationship—that is, by experts on relations between Japan and the United States. Today, there simply are not enough of you to go around, either in government or out. The new participants, although they are experts on the specific issues on which they work, do not always have your broad backgrounds or your sensitivity to all facts of the relationship. You must be educators, therefore, as well as pioneers. Perhaps you can help find solutions to this problem, which is a byproduct of your own success.

The real measure of our success is not how much we talk together but what we do together. In this respect, something else very remarkable has happened, which presents us with another, more profound, challenge. An increasing Japanese perception of Japan's global responsibilities; a resurgence of American confidence and of confidence in America; our combined influence on world events; and, indeed, the fact that increasingly what we do bilaterally has worldwide ramification, have turned our partnership into a truly global relationship. We are faced now with unprecedented opportunities, to act as partners on a global scale, and we have an obligation to grasp those opportunities and to use them for the advantage of present and future generations of the entire world.

We must not fail. We will not fail.

Already there are many examples of the good we can accomplish working with one another and with our friends and allies. The United States and Japan are the two largest providers of relief for refugees. In July, Japan's Ministry of Foreign Affairs announced its intention to provide nearly $9 million worth of American wheat to Afghan refugees in Pakistan through the World Food Program. This generous gift is but one of many that both countries make throughout the world frequently. The Japanese have provided Afghan refugees with over $41 million in assistance since 1979.

In the strategic Persian Gulf, whose security is vital not only to Japan and the United States but equally to our European allies, Japan's role today is already far more important than commonly realized. Indeed, Foreign Minister Abe has just returned from a highly constructive mission to Iran and Iraq. Egypt, Turkey, and Pakistan are three key countries close to the Persian Gulf region whose stability is critical to the security of the Gulf itself. Yet they are not wealthy oil exporters, and they confront formidable economic problems. Significantly, Japan gave more economic assistance to Pakistan last year than any other donor in the world, including ourselves; more economic assistance to Egypt than any European donor; and more economic assistance to Turkey than any European donor except Germany. Japan has thus assumed, largely within the space of the last 5 years, a major role in the stability of a vital region, a role that reflects both Japan's growing assumption of global responsibilities and the contribution that Japan can make to strengthening global stability.

Other examples of political cooperation come to mind. On the problem of Kampuchea, our two countries not only have provided substantial relief for Khmer refugees but also have opened new opportunities for consultation with other concerned nations, particularly the ASEAN nations, on the continuing crisis in Indochina. Japan's decision to withhold economic aid from Vietnam until all Vietnamese troops withdraw from Kampuchea has helped to make the dialog with ASEAN a fruitful one. America and Japan also share a common goal in promoting China's modernization and in encouraging China's constructive engagement in Asia. The recent Japanese economic aid to the Republic of Korea and the steady improvement in Korean-Japanese relations are contributing significantly to the stability of Northeast Asia.

Japan's more active foreign policy is contributing significantly to efforts to control and reduce nuclear weapons. At the Williamsburg Summit, Japan joined with the other industrial democracies in a common position on theater and strategic nuclear weapons and the effort to reduce them. Together we have made it clear to the Soviet Union that an agreement on intermediate-range nuclear forces that shifts the threat from Europe to Asia is unacceptable; limits on these systems must be global if they are to be meaningful. The growth of Soviet military power in Asia leaves us no alternative. For the Soviets are increasing their Asian deployments of nuclear weapons and are continuing to build up their naval and ground forces well beyond the maximum conceivably necessary for defense. President Reagan, therefore, has dedicated his administration to the goal of reducing nuclear weapons in negotiations with the Soviet Union. We have consulted closely and continually with the Japanese Government. Japan's views and advice on our arms reduction initiatives are highly valued.

Our cooperation, of course, extends to many other areas, including medical research (particularly cancer research), energy, technology transfer to developing countries, controlling strategic exports, and more. Altogether it is an impressive record.

But history never stops. as we face the future—as mature partners now on a global scale—a number of essential tasks remain on our agenda.

First, we have a responsibility to reaffirm by our actions our commitment to free trade. At Williamsburg, our countries committed themselves to halt protectionism as recovery proceeds and to reverse it by dismantling trade barriers. The strength of Japan's economy clearly allows for further action now with respect to important trade restrictions that remain, such as agricultural import quotas and the de facto limitation of major areas of government procurement to domestic firms.

I recognize that such farsighted actions are not easy or without cost. But the value of the open trading system is immeasurable—to Japan above all—and, correspondingly, the damage should it break down would be immeasurable. Responsibility for the trading system is a shared one. Although we experience occasional setbacks, President Reagan's recent decision on numerically controlled machine tools stands as an example of his administration's dedication to maintaining the free trading system.

Recently, the Japanese Government has taken several important steps to reduce trade barriers in order to increase access and give more equal treatment for foreign goods in Japan. We welcome these steps. We encourage Japan not only to put them into effect expeditiously but also to pursue other measures for opening markets, for this will reduce serious stresses in our relationship. We would urge Japan, for example, to act promptly to carry out the simplifications of standards and certification procedures recently enacted into law. In anticipation of liberalized access to Japanese markets, the Reagan administration, for its part, pledges to continue to oppose protectionist measures in the Congress.

A second important task for the future is to work together and with the other major industrialized countries to create the conditions for a more stable international monetary system. This also was a commitment at the Williamsburg Summit. Many in both our countries are worried that current exchange rates do not accurately reflect the relative trade competitiveness of our two economies. In fact, exchange rates in today's highly interdependent world reflect more than trade relationships. The relative conditions in our whole economies, and resulting international flows of capital, now determine these rates.

Last spring our governments agreed that bringing about greater convergence in economic performance was the essential prerequisite for greater exchange rate stability. Closer convergence of performance will also help assure that exchange rates more accurately reflect the real comparative advantages of our economies.

We both have some work to do here. The United States needs to work harder to reduce its budget deficits and to bring down interest rates. Japan needs to nourish its still-modest recovery, for recovery will enable Japan to use more of its impressive savings at home. There is one important error we must both avoid: Anxieties over the yen–dollar rate must not lead us to take actions, such as new restrictions on trade, for such restrictions would only make matters worse.

A third task facing us is to help in the development of the less developed economies of the world. Both Japan and the United States have a vital interest in this. At Williamsburg we agreed to work for new trade liberalization negotiations in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, with particular emphasis on expanding trade with developing countries. No single action could contribute more to the long-term economic well-being of the developing world. Growing and stable economies in the developing world provide the essential basis for the growth of democratic political institutions, the flourishing of which throughout the world is unquestionably of prime importance to both Japan and the United States. Our two countries are now actively studying how to coordinate our foreign assistance programs. We applaud the efforts Japan is making to open its markets more fully to the products of developing countries.

A fourth task for the future is to respond to other opportunities for cooperation throughout the world. Often, this can be accomplished through such institutions as the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs, the International Energy Agency, the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, and the regional development banks. But in addition, we must be prepared to coordinate directly, as we have in the past. Our responses—along with others—to the invasion of Afghanistan and to martial law in Poland provide good examples.

Finally, our efforts in the field of mutual security require continuing attention. Japan has made significant progress toward strengthening its capabilities for self-defense. We must both do more to quicken our pace in fulfilling the roles and missions we have each adopted. In this regard, the Japanese have stated as a matter of policy that they will undertake to defend the sea lanes to a distance of 1,000 nautical miles from Japan. When Japan is ready to perform this mission, it will provide a credible deterrent to Soviet adventurism in northeast Asia; and it also will allow us more flexibility in responding to emergencies in the Southwest Pacific and Indian Oceans that affect our mutual interests.

The message I want to leave you with today is that our current problems, including those in the trade field, should be viewed in the perspective of other problems we have met and solved over the years. But above all, they must be viewed in the perspective of our common goals. The problems are serious, and they may even be more complex than those we have solved before. But for all our cultural differences, our sense of shared values and interests is also deeper than in the past. This is why I am confident that our two countries have the political will to resolve these difficulties. This is all the more essential as our relationship has grown beyond the bounds of the bilateral and become global in scope.

There are farsighted, dynamic leaders in both of our countries who are addressing these challenges—challenges on the frontiers of scientific research in biomedicine, energy, seismology, geothermal physics, weather, and other sciences; in the enhancement of global stability and prosperity; in spreading and cultivating the growth of freedom and democracy throughout the world. The opportunities are almost unlimited. But in both our countries—since we are democracies—forward-looking policies and closer cooperation depend on broad public understanding. It would be a tragic irony if the very democratic system that unites us morally were also to prove our political undoing. We must look to you, therefore, the distinguished participants of the Sixth Shimoda Conference—and to all concerned citizens—to help nurture that broad public understanding and support.

If Japan and the United States maintain and strengthen their partnership, as they should, the 1980's can be a period of great achievement. If we act wisely, and with foresight, we can assure our common prosperity, security, and freedom. Not every generation has such an opportunity. Not every generation has such a responsibility.

I thank you for your participation in this endeavor.

Transcript of a Press Conference by the Secretary of Defense (Weinberger), Tokyo, September 25, 1983 (Extracts) [6]

Secretary Weinberger's Visit to Japan

Good morning, ladies and gentlemen. I have a short statement I would like to make and then I will be glad to try to take your questions. First of all, it's a great pleasure and privilege to be back in Tokyo and to be so very warmly and hospitably received as my party has been.

We have, I think, with the Williamsburg Summit come to view and perhaps that even will be viewed as a watershed in the U.S. Government's formal recognition of the significance of the Pacific Basin and the critical importance of United States and Japanese relations in that whole theater. Indeed, the economic center of gravity of the world is rapidly shifting to the Pacific.

The wealth of that whole Pacific Basin is contained within a huge area within which the Soviet Union maintains very large military forces, growing military forces, very large land forces and only one of her naval fleets that is larger in numbers than the entire U.S. Navy. The enormous expenses which the Soviets have incurred in the 1960's and 1970's to achieve these force levels testifies to their recognition of what is at stake in this whole area.

The growing United States-Japanese cooperation, which is so vital to both of our countries, will help to ensure that this Pacific Basin will remain stable and at peace and allow this prosperous area to remain free for all to use.

Earlier this month, in the skies just north of Japan, a civil airliner was shot down and its 269 passengers became victims of the paranoia of a corrupt governmental system which occupies Japanese territory illegally. Without the U.S.-Japanese Treaty of Mutual Cooperation and Security, all of Japanese territory would be subject to Soviet blackmail and, indeed, the whole Pacific Basin would shortly be in that condition.

The best defense against this growing and continuing threat is for Japan and the United States both to increase their defensive military strength. Japan's self-defense efforts can play a significant role in the defense of this region and the central thrust of our administration in Washington, has been to see a rational division of labor among the United States, our NATO Allies and Japan. And the joint communiqué of 1981 [7] affirmed—for the first time—the appropriateness of our Japanese-American defense burden sharing.

The self-chosen, the appropriately chosen, roles of territorial defense, protection of neighboring seas and skies and defense of the sealanes out to a 100 miles are roles endorsed by the United States, endorsed by the Japanese Government and chosen by them and by Japan's friends. And achievement of this capability by Japan will provide far greater Japanese local security and will also aid global stability by complicating the task of our potential adversary.

As I prepare to leave for Beijing, I leave confident that the Japanese-American partnership which is a strong partnership and which is critical to the prosperity and stability of the Pacific Basin, will endure, will grow and will strengthen, and that our cooperation is welcomed not only by Japan and by the United States but by the majority of the Asian nations—including those that I will visit on this trip. I will be glad to try to take your questions.

Q. Did you talk at all about the 6.88 percent ceiling that has been imposed on increases in defense expenditures for the FY 1984 budget in Japan?

A. Yes, we discussed that subject. And again, I was advised that this is not a final figure in the Japanese budget process. I made the point that we appreciated the efforts that had gone into securing this as at least a preliminary figure, in view of the fact that other ministries are receiving reductions in their appropriations. And I made the point again which we all know and are all thoroughly familiar with—that the Japanese self-defense goals are very appropriate, and that this sum, while an increase, and while it does not include salaries, as I understand it, as our budgets do, still will not enable Japan to achieve the self-defense goals as early as may be necessary by world events. I found no disagreement whatever with this, but obviously they have the same problems we have, the difficulties of adequate defense expenditures in a period of recession and with a number of other competing ministries.

Report by the U.S.–Japan Advisory Commission Submitted to President Reagan and Prime Minister Nakasone, October 18, 1983 [8]

The Conduct of U.S.–Japan Relations

Since its establishment in May of this year, the Advisory Commission has held two joint meetings (June 21–22, and September 1) as well as separate meetings of the members from each country. We have outlined a program of work on a broad agenda of bilateral and multinational issues. We will be reporting to you as we reach conclusions, but would like at this time to share with you some of our preliminary thinking on the general direction of the partnership.

The Importance of the Relationship

The basic national interests of Japan and the United States are highly complementary. Both nations share political and economic institutions based on democratic and free-market principles, and both face similar kinds of issues associated with mature industrial societies. No two nations have a greater stake in a prosperous and peaceful world. There are not two countries from whom international leadership is more needed. By working together more effectively Japan and the United States will be far better able to promote their complementary interests than they can individually.

On the one hand, the political and economic stability of virtually every quarter of the globe affects the well-being of our two countries. At the same time, there can be no effective solutions to global issues, ranging from the problems of developing nations to coordinated East-West policies without harmonization of approaches by the United States and Japan, accounting as they do for 35 percent of global product.

[8] Source: Department of State files. David Packard, U.S. Chairman of the U.S.–Japan Advisory Commission, met with Secretary of State Shultz on October 18, 1983, to convey the Commission's initial recommendations on the conduct of U.S.–Japan relations. The Commission, consisting of seven private citizens from each country, was established in May 1983 by the President and Prime Minister Nakasone to offer advice on current issues concerning both countries and to address how they could better fulfill their long-term world responsibilities. The report was presented to Prime Minister Nakasone by the Japanese Chairman, Ambassador Nobuhiko Ushiba.

For this reason, the members of the Commission are concerned that surveys and other data suggest that although there remains a strong core of friendship, persistent bilateral friction, aggravated by the recessionary conditions of the past several years, has been eroding the sense of public goodwill in both countries. Bilateral issues have come to be cast in sharp confrontational terms as if what is of benefit to one country must necessarily be a loss to another. These issues have obscured the growing scope and intensity of U.S.-Japan cooperation, which has become an almost daily fact of life in all spheres—government as well as private-sector relationships.

There are some in both countries who use the other as a "scapegoat" for problems whose roots lie elsewhere. For example, Americans should not blame Japan for trade-performance problems which reflect unrealistic American policies or a failure of the U.S. to adjust to a more competitive world trading environment. There are many measures which the U.S. itself needs to take to stimulate productivity and remove burdensome overregulation that reduces the international competitiveness of American industry. Similarly, Japanese should not blame the United States for Japan's need to adjust its traditional approaches to foreign trade and international security. Japan's past policies reflect a different international economic and security environment, and Japan needs to adjust its policies for reasons of its own national interest.

As economic ties, political consultations, and other contacts between Japan and the United States have expanded, the "management" of the relationship has become more complicated. Both sides have had to adjust to new roles in the international community—Japan to a role more appropriate to its economic power and the United States to a role emphasizing shared global leadership. An expectation gap has developed as each country has placed new demands on the relationship over and above accustomed areas of contact and cooperation. The process of adjustment and defining new modes of cooperation can itself generate friction.

Consequently, we believe that the most important outcome of your November meeting will be the affirmation of our positive partnership. The overriding theme of U.S.-Japan relations should be that of friends sharing similar problems and interests, and working together. As a longer-term vision, we see our countries sustaining the closest cooperation; our common interests far outweigh the areas of disagreement. In our judgment, your previous meetings have helped build a fresh sense of understanding and collaboration at the summit which will be further consolidated with the forthcoming visit.

Trade and Investment

The growing bilateral trade imbalance is one of the most difficult—and certainly the most visible—political problems in the bilateral relationship. For better or for worse the trade-balance will be seen as a barometer of the health of our trading relationship. The bilateral merchandise trade imbalance is part of a broader pattern of multilateral flows in goods, services, and capital, and to try to artificially establish a bilateral trade balance could result in a net economic loss to both countries.

Nevertheless, an imbalance of the current magnitude, against the backdrop of high unemployment in the U.S., has caused deep concern, resentment, and alarm in the United States. During the past eight years, Japan's exports to the U.S. have increased at a rate of 16 percent a year, while U.S. exports to Japan have only grown 9 percent. There are no signs that this trend is being reversed. To preserve and strengthen the overall U.S.-Japan relationship, it is essential the growth of the bilateral trade imbalance be brought under control. Vigorous action and visible results in both countries—by governments and by the private sectors—are essential. We would stress the following priority areas:

Exchange Rates

The exchange value of the dollar and the yen has become an extremely important factor in the competitive position of industries of Japan and the United States, as well as a difficult political problem for both countries. The current rate for the dollar reflects in large part the nature of the macroeconomic-policies of the two governments resulting in a high differential in interest rates and attracting the flow of capital toward the dollar. Although the revenue, spending, and monetary policies of the two countries primarily depend on domestic priorities and pressures, neither the United States nor Japan, as the world's two largest economies, can ignore the implications of their economic policies on the rest of the world and their relations with each other. It is essential that the governments of both countries give high priority to actions to bring the yen and dollar into better balance and to get the growth in the bilateral trade imbalance under control.

Trade and Competitiveness

The United States and Japan are both committed to sustaining the world trading system on the basis of GATT principles. In view of Japan's global trade surplus, Japan has a special responsibility to continue its efforts to liberalize market access. Since December 1981, Japan has announced several trade packages further to open the Japanese market. The recently enacted changes in Japanese laws governing standards and certification are a significant step in the market-opening process; Japan should continue expeditiously to implement these measures. The Prime Minister's appeal in December 1982, directed at stimulating import consciousness, is regarded by the Commission as especially important. To avoid further erosion of the relationship, it is essential to put force behind these measures so that the needed visible results can be achieved.

United States industry for its part has a responsibility to continue efforts to improve productivity and strengthen U.S. competitiveness in world markets. This subject warrants the greater attention it is being given in the United States.

We have had extensive discussion of auto restraints, recognizing it is an important current issue. We understand it is receiving attention at appropriate levels and hope for an outcome that will serve our mutual long-term interests.

Investment

Direct investment which facilitates the flow of goods, capital, technical information and managerial skills between the two economies is important in strengthening the economic relationship. To this end, the United States and Japan must assure their foreign investors that direct foreign investments will be encouraged. Laws and practices limiting the free flow of investments, such as the unitary tax method applied by certain states in the United States and Japan's prior-notification requirements for foreign investors, are damaging.

Private Sector Consultations

The United States–Japan Businessmen's Conference has found that the organized study and exchange of views on sectoral issues among the businessmen in the industries involved can be useful in identifying and evaluating problems, narrowing the scope of differences, voluntarily promoting fair trade, and providing recommendations which can be the basis for constructive government action. We believe such industry-to-industry discussions, consistent with the national laws of both countries, should be encouraged.

Strengthening the World Trade System

The GATT system was established on the assumption that international agreements on tariff and non-tariff barriers could promote economic growth through the expansion of an open trading system. In today's world of more diversified competition, the United States and Japan should work closely together to update and further develop the system of international trade rules and regulations, for example, in such areas as agriculture, safeguards, and services. Where multilateral agreements cannot readily be reached, Japan and the United States should provide a model in their international trading relationships.

Agricultural Trade

Agriculture deserves special mention. Focus on a few agricultural issues has obscured the enormous benefits of agricultural trade to both countries. American farmers depend significantly on the Japanese market, now amounting to almost $6 billion in sales, while Japanese consumers and farmers rely on the United States for a substantial portion of their supplies of food and feedgrains.

We believe that there are opportunities to resolve agricultural trade issues in a manner that contributes to the long-term economic health of the agricultural communities of both countries while serving consumer interests. Inflexible formulas are neither desirable nor politically feasible. For example, the United States should recognize the importance of rice cultivation to Japan. Agricultural trade issues should be resolved in a manner compatible with the overall goal of promoting freer world trade and controlling the growth of the bilateral imbalance.

INTERNATIONAL SECURITY

The Advisory Commission will be examining the long-range security relationship between the two countries, seeking means of improved cooperation. Pending recommendations on this subject at a later time, we would like to share with you some of the lines along which we are thinking.

We believe that security must be examined in its broadest context—not just protection against military threats to be sure, but also changing political and economic conditions that affect international peace and stability. Both countries have important international responsibilities to consult about such conditions and to maintain close cooperation in formulating policies of mutual benefit. Such policies include foreign assistance programs, mediation efforts, and coordinated positions on some political issues, and defense cooperation in the context of the U.S.-Japan Mutual Security Treaty, consistent with the geostrategic circumstances of our two nations. We must avoid paying homage to constructs that may have suited the world of the 1960's and 1970's to the extent they are no longer appropriate to the world situation that will confront us in the 1980's and 1990's. It is our intention to assess our interests in the decade ahead in formulating concrete recommendations, taking into account such developments as the growth of Soviet military power, diffusion of political power, and new sources of instability in the third world.

We are encouraged by Japan's more active role in international diplomacy, including arms control. Japan's voice should be heard in appropriate forums. Each nation, Japan and the United States, should pay close attention to the interests of the other in formulating its policies.

We see much value in further promoting cooperation in defense technology, an area we will be examining in detail. Superior technology has enabled free countries to maintain a deterrent with less manpower and a relatively lower defense burden than the Soviet Union. The sharing in the development of defense technology, consistent with our respective defense policies, can reduce costs and improve the quality of technology, benefiting the security and economic interests of both nations.

Finally, we would note that there are a number of other significant areas where there is potential for solidifying our partnership. We call attention to one or two of these:

—Energy: Long-term energy collaboration would constitute a vital element in advancing U.S.-Japan ties and interdependence into the next century. We believe the two governments should use the opportunity provided by the current period of relatively plentiful energy supplies to encourage cooperation in the development of new sources when demand exceeds existing contractual arrangements.

—Science and Technology: Along with the freer flow of goods and capital, scientific and technological development has been one of the mainsprings of the unprecedented progress of the postwar period. The United States and Japan have had a long-standing, fruitful cooperative relationship embracing virtually all forms of scientific and technological research. Continuation of this relationship offers a promise for increasing benefits for both countries and opportunities for constructive collaboration with the third world. Existing agreements should be reviewed to assure they are in keeping with the times and reflect the changing balance in the scientific and technological capabilities of the two countries.

We hope these preliminary thoughts of the Commission will prove useful. We wish you every success for a meaningful Tokyo meeting and pledge our continued efforts to contribute to better relations between our countries.

Transcript of a Press Briefing by the Secretary of State (Shultz), November 3, 1983 (Extracts) [9]

President Reagan's Visit to Japan

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. Secretary, do you feel that the security issues now will take precedence over the trade and economic issues because of Rangoon and because of KAL 007?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. There are important security issues in our relationship with both Japan and Korea. They certainly have been underlined by the Korean Airline massacre and by the Rangoon atrocity. And obviously those security matters will be discussed; economic matters will be discussed. I might say there are a tremendous number of important subjects around the world on which we have strong mutual interests with both countries. Just to take an example, without trying to hold it out as the most important, but just as an example, the relationship of the flow of oil supplies to the Iran–Iraq war concentrates our attention and concentrates the Japanese attention on that subject. I am sure that is one among many international subjects that the President will be discussing. That is just an illustration.

Q. Mr. Secretary, do you anticipate this trip will help encourage the Japanese to take more of a role in their own security and the security, the joint security of the Far East?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. They have set out certain objectives and a mission, you might say, for themselves. And we agree with what they have set out for themselves involving their own self-defense and the defense of the sea lanes around Japan. And we encourage them to develop the capacity to fulfill that mission. So that is an important thing as they see it, and we agree.

Obviously security problems are dramatized, not only by the events in the earlier questions, but such things as the very large deployments of SS–20's in Asia. And everybody is noticing that more and more.

Q. Mr. Secretary, you said that Japan—that we agreed with Japan's objectives, security objectives, their broader objectives, but their proposed budget, which goes into effect, I think, in March, is for a 6.8 percent increase, which is not large enough to meet those objectives. So the question is, will the President either privately or publicly make any inference that they have to do more, and what is the effect of the December elections in Japan on the security commitment?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. We will be discussing our agreement with the mission that they have set out and our feeling that, obviously, they want to take the steps necessary to be able to carry the mission out and that's what they say, that's what we say. How rapidly you're able to get to an objective you have is always an issue. The Japanese are going about it in, I think, a positive way, but I'm sure the subject will be discussed.

Q. Because of the elections and Nakasone's vulnerabilities, will the President have to be more cautious about raising some of these issues?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, I don't want to make any comment about the internal Japanese political situation. Prime Minister Nakasone is the—he's the Prime Minister, where—this will be the fourth time this year, incidentally, the President will have met with Prime Minister Nakasone. It's an ongoing process and relationship, and we are there to talk about substantive matters of great interest, and I might say, almost a sense of partnership in many respects with the Government of Japan, and that's the object of the trip.

The Japanese politics is a different issue entirely and that's a strictly Japanese set of issues, and we have no comment to make on them.

Q. How much discussion do you expect there will be of trade and economic issues and, specifically, issues like the yen–dollar relationship, which have been a problem?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. There undoubtedly will be considerable attention devoted to economic issues. It's very important to the Japanese and it's very important to us. The yen–dollar relationship is, I think, a very significant aspect of this and, in particular, the relationship of the present relative values to large-scale capital movements. I think, as sort of the heart of the problem analytically, and therefore at the heart of the problem operationally. So, somehow, actions in the area of capital markets and capital flows and openness in capital markets I'm sure will come in for a lot of discussion. It's a very important set of points. But it is not sort of unique that there'll be a discussion here. This is an ongoing matter and the Treasury and Japanese Finance Ministry have had lots of discussions about this and I am sure will continue to do so. The subject has gotten a lot of attention in the U.S.-Japanese Advisory Committee—this high-level private group that's been appointed by the Prime Minister and the President.

That group has made a report [10] to the President and the Prime Minister, and so we have some input from the private sector there. David Packard, as you know, is the U.S. chairman.

Q. Mr. Secretary, can you give us some reading on what the speeches the President will give to the Diet and National Assembly—what the theme will be or what he hopes to accomplish—

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, it's a great privilege, of course, to be invited to speak to the Diet or National Assembly—the congress of another country—and the President views it that way and he will be expressing the U.S. view of the relationship and our views of the world situation generally. But, as for previewing the speech, I think we'll wait till we get a little closer to it in any detail.

There was a followup question over here—

[10] Supra.

Q. Now that the Japanese have agreed—or at least we've agreed to allow them to increase their quota of imports on foreign cars, [11] are we going to go to Japan and demand that they open their markets up to more U.S. exports?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, there has been a long dialog between Japan and the United States about opening Japanese markets to our products. And there have been a lot of steps taken, and we believe that there are a lot more steps that should be taken. And, as I said, this is all part of a process—it's a continuing process.

As far as the auto restraints are concerned, of course those are voluntary restraints undertaken by the Japanese. It's not any quota imposed by the United States. They're voluntary restraints by the Japanese, and that's a restraint of flows into our market and not anything to do with their market as such.

Q. But is there going to be any reciprocal demand by the President?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The President will be discussing these economic issues with the Prime Minister, I'm sure. But he is not inclined to use inflammatory language like you used. (Laughter)

. . . . . .

Q. You said that there were a number of steps that you'd still like to see the Japanese Government do in terms of opening up their markets more. Could you mention some of those steps and in particular, if the yen–dollar problem is as severe as you and other Government officials have said, what would you like the Japanese to do, specifically?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. My opinion is that the particular areas to work on on the yen–dollar are capital market measures. And there is a great, extensive list of possibilities that have been developed to some extent in the Treasury and to some extent out of discussions between our Treasury and the Japanese Finance Ministry and, also, that have been suggested to us by various private groups in this country. The U.S.-Japan Advisory Committee has weighed in on the subject. So there are a great many ideas that are around. And the subject is in the process of being identified as very important. And things to be done about it are getting identified. And I think, as we go on here, we'll start to see things happen more and more in this area.

As far as specifics are concerned, I think you can dig out long lists of things we care about, involving various commodities and types of manufactured goods and so forth. And I don't need to just go through that list.

Statements by President Reagan and Japanese Prime Minister Nakasone, Tokyo, November 10, 1983 [12]

Strengthening of the U.S.-Japan Partnership

PRIME MINISTER NAKASONE. For the people and Government of Japan as well as for myself it is indeed a great pleasure to welcome the President of the United States of America and Mrs. Reagan as State guests.

Yesterday and today, the President and I had very productive meetings covering a wide range of subjects. Through these meetings, we reconfirmed the importance for Japan and the United States, two countries sharing the common ideas and values of freedom and democracy of promoting further cooperation toward peace and prosperity of the world.

The President has a clear recognition of the importance of the Asian and the Pacific region. His present visit to Japan and Republic of Korea and his planned visit to China next year amply testify to this fact, together with his visit to the countries in Southeast Asia, which I'm sure will be rescheduled in the future. The economic dynamism in the Asian and Pacific region is one of the central elements in the expansion of the world economy. Thus, the President and I are in full agreement that we should continue to make efforts for the further development of the Asian and the Pacific region.

Mr. President, I issued on November 1st the Tokyo Statement jointly with Chancellor Kohl of the Federal Republic of Germany in line with the spirit of the political statement adopted at the Williamsburg Summit in May this year declaring that we should maintain the unity and solidarity among the western countries in our joint endeavor in pursuit of freedom, peace, and stability of the prosperity of the world economy and of the development in the Third World.

As I know the recent events of increasing tension in the East-West relations, as well as frequent occurrences of regional disputes and violence in various parts of the world, I am worried that the peace in the world could be gravely threatened if such trends continue and amplify themselves. Under such circumstances, I firmly believe that the countries of the world should renew their resolve for the maintenance of freedom, peace, and stability for the revitalization of the world economy and for the world prosperity of the peoples of the world.

I, further, believe that the rational dialogs and negotiations should be conducted to solve such international conflicts and disputes, and that the parties concerned should spare no effort in taking step-by-step measures or gradual approach in pursuits of ultimate goals, and should carry on steady and realistic endeavors. This I consider is particularly pertinent to the arms control negotiations.

The Western countries should stand firmly in unity and solidarity for freedom and peace, and should not hesitate to bear any hardships in upholding this cause. All these points are included in the Tokyo statement. It is, indeed truly significant, Mr. President, that you have fully endorsed this statement in our meeting.

The President and I had exchanges of views on East-West relations with emphasis on the question of arms control and on the situation in such areas as Asia, the Middle East, and Central America. With regard to the INF negotiations in particular, it was reconfirmed that the negotiations should not be conducted at the sacrifice of the Asian region, but should be conducted on a global basis, taking the Asian security into consideration.

With respect to the recent bombing in Burma, the very act of terrorism, we agree that it should be strongly condemned as an inexcusable conduct in challenge of world peace and order and that continued efforts must be made to bring about lasting peace and stability on the Korean peninsula. On the Middle East, I expressed my deep appreciation for the role played by the multinational forces for stabilizing the situation in Lebanon.

The Japan-U.S. security arrangements are the foundation of the peace and security of Japan and the Far East. I wish to express that Japan will continue her efforts towards further strengthening the credibility of the Japan-U.S. security arrangements. With respect to the improvement of our defense capability, I wish to make further efforts along the lines of the Joint Communiqué of May, 1981.

As to the international economy, the President and I reconfirmed—in line with the Declaration of the Williamsburg Summit—the importance of obtaining sustained, non-inflationary growth of the world economy, of rolling back protectionism, and of lowering the prevailing high interest rates. We consider them important, together with extending financial cooperation, in order to alleviate the plight of the developing countries, which are suffering from accumulated debts.

With regard to bilateral economic issues, we acknowledge the achievements made thus far and agree to continue our efforts for the solution of the remaining issues. In this context, I highly appreciated the pledge by the President to combat protectionism in the United States. The President and I are in full agreement on the importance of the yen-dollar issue. We have agreed on establishing consultative fora on exchange rate issues and investments. In this connection, I asked for continued U.S. efforts to lower U.S. interest rates.

The President and I have also underscored the importance of greater two-way investment flows between our two countries and I expressed my concern that the unitary method of taxation is becoming a serious impediment to the Japanese investment in the United States. I stressed the importance of promoting the preparations of a new round of multilateral trade negotiations in order to consolidate the free trading system and to inject renewed confidence in the world economy. I am very glad that the President has strongly supported my view. We intend to call on other countries to join in our efforts.

Mr. President, in the present international situation, you are shouldering enormous global responsibility. I will, on my part, make as much contribution as possible to the peace and prosperity of the world. Thank you very much. (Applause)

THE PRESIDENT. On behalf of the American people and our government, I would like to thank His Imperial Majesty the Emperor, Prime Minister Nakasone and the government and people of Japan for the generous and warm reception that you have extended to my wife Nancy, myself and my staff during our trip to your country.

Prime Minister Nakasone [and I], as you've been told, have just completed 2 days of very productive discussions on a wide range of bilateral issues and global affairs. As leaders of two great Pacific nations, we're guardians of a strong, rich and diverse relationship. Japan and America are bound by shared values of freedom, democracy and peace. We're committed to great future cooperation across the broad spectrum of political economic security, educational culture and scientific affairs. I have come as a friend of Japan seeking to strengthen our partnership for peace, prosperity and progress.

I will leave Japan confident that our partnership is stronger than before and confident that we're giving birth to a new era in Japanese-American relations. We have agreed to move forward with an agenda for progress by drawing upon the great well of talent, drive, determination and creativity of our free peoples. We welcome Japan's more assertive role as a fellow trustee of peace and progress in international, economic and political affairs.

We have discussed global issues and we hold many similar views on opportunities for cooperation. The principles that Prime Minister Nakasone has enunciated as the Tokyo Statement are principles that I fully endorse. Together we have no greater responsibility than to make our world a safer place.

There are serious threats to peace on the Korean peninsula, in the Middle East, in the Caribbean, and over the northwestern Pacific. Also, the attitude on the part of our adversary at the negotiating table on arms talks is at odds with the will of the world to reduce the weapons of war and build a more stable peace.

I conveyed to the Prime Minister my satisfaction that our mutual security relationship is proceeding smoothly. Japan is host to 45,000 American troops and our bases in Japan, made possible by the Treaty of Mutual Cooperation and Security, are essential not only to the defense of Japan, but also contribute to peace and prosperity in the Far East.

As for Japan's defense efforts, the United States remains convinced that the most important contribution Japan can make toward the peace and security in Asia is for Japan to provide for its own defense and share more of the burden of our mutual defense effort.

During our discussions on arms control, I assured Prime Minister Nakasone that we seek global reductions in the Soviets' intermediate-range SS-20's to the lowest level possible.

The United States will take no action in the intermediate nuclear forces negotiations that adversely affects the security of Asia. We agreed on the urgency of achieving consensus on comprehensive international safeguards to prevent the spread of nuclear weaponry.

Prime Minister Nakasone and I discussed Japan and America's compelling international economic responsibilities as spelled out at the Williamsburg Summit. Together we must press for continuing liberalization of the international trade and financial system, fight protectionism, promote economic development without inflation by encouraging the growth of free enterprise throughout the world, and share the obligation of assisting developing countries, including those facing severe debt problems.

We also agreed to enhance coordination in foreign assistance. Trade issues figure prominently in the Japan–U.S. relationship. There is no simple, overnight solution to our trade problems, but we have agreed to exert our best and continued efforts to solve these issues.

We welcome recent actions by your government to reduce trade barriers, and I have emphasized the importance of further measures to open the Japanese market to trade and investment. I didn't come to negotiate specific trade issues, but I did indicate certain issues of immediate importance to us.

Because of both their trade and consumer significance, for example, we are seeking reductions in Japan's tariffs on certain products in which the United States is highly competitive. Japanese quotas on agricultural products are a cause for concern. In return, the United States must combat protectionism in our country, and I have given the Prime Minister my pledge to do so.

Progress in Japan-U.S. trade issues can foster greater trade liberalization efforts worldwide, such as the Prime Minister's call for a new round of multilateral trade negotiations which I heartily endorse. I expressed confidence that the United States can be a reliable long-term supplier of energy, particularly coal, to Japan. And I was pleased that the Prime Minister Nakasone shared this view.

Expanded energy trade will mean more jobs for Americans and greater security for both our countries.

With the approval of Prime Minister Nakasone and myself a joint press statement [13] is being released today by Finance Minister Takeshita and Treasury Secretary Reagan—Regan (laughter)—I tried to get him to pronounce it the other way—on the yen-dollar issue and other financial and economic issues of mutual interest. We agree that the commitments and steps outlined in that statement will further strengthen economic relations between the United States and Japan.

We have noted the importance of the yen-dollar exchange rate, of free and open capital markets in each country. We stress the need for closer economic consultations between the two governments. A ministerial-level working group is being set up to monitor each side's progress in carrying out the agreed-upon actions to improve the yen–dollar exchange rate.

Our mutual commitment toward specific steps to achieve open capital markets will allow the yen to reflect more fully Japan's underlying political stability and economic strength as the second largest economy in the free world. In addition, we've agreed to instruct our economic sub-Cabinet members to form a committee to promote mutual investments. But Japan and America began taking those steps together. I've been heartened that beginning with our first meeting, last January, continuing with the Williamsburg Summit and now again during our visit this week, Prime Minister Nakasone and I have agreed that our two great democracies share special responsibilties to each other and to the world. Let us continue to go forward, building on our progress step by step. We must set milestones to monitor the success of our agenda for progress and to assure the follow-through that is essential. And I will be discussing this matter in more detail with the Prime Minister tomorrow.

This visit has strengthened the bonds of friendship between our two great nations. We are now better prepared to work together as partners to build a more peaceful and prosperous future at home and throughout the world. We know what needs to be done, we know how it must be done. Let us have the faith to believe in each other, the courage to get on with the job, and the determination to see it through.

Thank you very much.

Joint Announcement Issued by the Secretary of the Treasury (Regan) and the Japanese Finance Minister (Takeshita), Tokyo, November 10, 1983 [14]

Measures To Resolve U.S.–Japan Economic and Financial Issues

Secretary Regan and Finance Minister Takeshita have had a number of candid and cordial exchanges of views in recent weeks on a variety of issues of mutual interest. They have agreed that both countries:

1. Will pursue appropriate monetary and fiscal policies that will promote sustained real economic growth with low inflation, reduced interest rates, and higher productive investment.

2. Will cooperate closely in dealing with LDC debt problems in order to promote effective adjustment on the part of debtor countries and the flow of financing necessary to support those adjustment efforts.

3. Consistent with the understandings reached at Williamsburg with the other summit countries regarding exchange rate policy, will consult more closely on exchange market developments and undertake coordinated intervention to counter disorderly market conditions.

In addition, both Ministers agreed that open, liberal capital markets and the free movement of capital are important to the operation of an effectively functioning international monetary system.

Minister Takeshita stated that the Japanese Ministry of Finance will assure the prompt and thorough implementation, following due procedures, of the measures listed in the "Comprehensive Economic Measures" of October 21, 1983, which would further liberalize Japan's capital markets, internationalize the yen, and allow the yen to more fully reflect its underlying strength. In particular, the Ministry of Finance announced its decisions to: —Eliminate the real demand rule in forward exchange transactions, effective April 1, 1984.

[14] Source: Department of the Treasury files, November 10, 1983.

—Submit a bill in the next ordinary Diet session starting from December 1983, to reform the designated company system, after consultation with agencies concerned.

—Submit a bill in the next ordinary Diet session to enable issuance of foreign currency denominated national bonds abroad.

—Expedite the study concerning establishment of a yen-denominated bankers' acceptance market.

In addition, the Japanese Ministry of Finance announced that it will:

—Seek to lower the minimum denomination of CDs to yen 300 million from its current level of yen 500 million, effective January 1, 1984.

—Seek to enlarge further the ceiling on each bank's CD issues, effective April 1, 1984.

—Ease guidelines on the issue of Euro-yen bonds by residents, effective April 1, 1984.

—In this connection, the withholding tax on interest earnings on Euro-yen bonds held by non-residents will be reviewed, having due regard to maintaining proper taxation including the withholding tax system.

Minister Takeshita also confirmed his policy stance on the occasion of announcing the "Comprehensive Economic Measures" that "we, as one of the major industrial nations, will continue to take positive steps towards the internationalization of the yen and the liberalization of our financial and capital markets."

In reply to questions by Secretary Regan, Minister Takeshita stated that there are no discriminatory restrictions under Japanese laws on the acquisition of Japanese banks by foreign banks. He stated that the banking laws governing acquisitions by foreign banks are identical with those governing acquisitions by domestic banks.

Secretary Regan welcomed the announcement of these measures indicating that they represent significant progress by the Government of Japan in its efforts to liberalize its capital markets and internationalize the yen, and would make an important contribution to the functioning of foreign exchange markets and the world trade and financial system.

In addition, Secretary Regan announced that the U.S. Treasury will:

—Fully take into account the concerns of the Japanese authorities in its review of the issues related to unitary taxation.

—Welcome the issuance of Japanese Government guaranteed bonds in the U.S. market, with or without a currency swap.

—Pursue as quickly as possible a reduction of the U.S. budget deficit through additional measures to reduce government spending.

—Strive for early passage of the legislation enabling the United States to consent to the increase in its IMF quota.

—Attempt to agree with other IDA donors on the next replenishment as soon as possible.

Minister Takeshita and Secretary Regan agreed that further progress on these matters is desirable. To that end, they agreed that the Japanese Ministry of Finance and the U.S. Treasury Department would establish a joint ad hoc group of financial authorities on yen/dollar exchange rate issues. The purpose of the group would be to:

—Monitor U.S. and Japanese progress in implementing the agreed upon measures, and to develop and implement additional steps, such as increasing the use of yen in denominating Japanese exports.

—Strengthen mutual understanding and to establish a common recognition of the current state of the yen/dollar rate and its determinants.

This ad hoc group would be co-chaired by Finance Minister Takeshita and Treasury Secretary Regan, with a working group at the Under Secretary level. The working group will meet by February 1984, and submit a report to the Chairmen by Spring 1984. Minister Takeshita and Secretary Regan agreed to continue to be in close contact on these and other economic and financial issues.

Address by President Reagan Before the Japanese Diet, Tokyo, November 11, 1983 [18]

"Japanese-American Friendship Is Forever"

Mr. Speaker, Mr. President, Mr. Prime Minister, distinguished members of the Diet, it is with great honor and respect that I come before you today, the first American President ever to address the Japanese Diet.

I have been in your country only two days. But speaking for my wife, Nancy, and myself, may I say you have more than made us feel at home. The warmth of your welcome has touched our hearts. In welcoming us, you pay tribute to the more than 230 million Americans whom I have the privilege to represent. From all of us—all of them to you we reach out to say: The bonds of friendship which unite us are even greater than the ocean which divides us. (Applause.)

It was a dozen years ago on an autumn day like this one that I first visited Japan and today, as then, I feel energy, initiative and industry surging through your country in a mighty current for progress. And just as before, I am struck by a unique gift of the Japanese people: You do not build your future at the expense of the grace and beauty of your past.

Harmony is a treasured hallmark of Japanese civilization and this has always been pleasing to Americans. Harmony requires differences to be joined in pursuit of higher ideals, many of which we share. When former President Ulysses S. Grant visited here in 1878, he discovered Japan is a land of enchantment.

During his stay, he met with the Emperor and their discussion turned to democracy, the pressing issue of the day. President Grant observed that governments are always more stable and nations more prosperous when they truly represent their people.

I am proud to help carry forward the century-old tradition, meeting first with your Emperor on my arrival and now meeting with you a great milestone in your history: The 100th session of the Diet under the modern Japanese Constitution. In 6 years you will celebrate your 100th anniversary of representative government in Japan, just as we will celebrate the birth of our own Congress. I bring you best wishes and heartfelt greetings from your American counterparts, the Congress of the United States. (Applause.)

One cannot stand in this chamber without feeling a part of your proud history of nationhood and democracy, the spirit of hope carrying the dreams of your free people. Of all the strengths we possess, of all the ties that bind us, I believe the greatest is our dedication to freedom. Japan and America stand at the forefront of the free nations and free economies in the world.

Yes, we are 5,000 miles apart; yes, we are distinctly different in customs, language and tradition; and yes, we are often competitors in the world markets. But I believe the people represented by this proud Parliament and by my own United States Congress are of one heart in their devotion to the principles of our free societies.

I am talking about principles that begin with the sacred worth of human life; the cherished place of the family; the responsibility of parents and schools to be teachers of truth, tolerance, hard work, cooperation and love; and the role of our major institutions—government, industry, and labor—to provide the opportunities and security—opportunities and security free people need to build and leave behind a better world for their children and their children's children.

America and Japan are situated far apart, but we are united in our belief that freedom means dedication to the dignity, rights and equality of man. Yukichi Fukuzawa, the great Meiji-era educator, said it for you: "Heaven has made no man higher or no man lower than any other man."

Our great American hero Abraham Lincoln put it in political perspective for us:

The President spoke at 9:35 a.m. in the Assembly Hall of the House of Representatives at the National Diet Building. All brackets are in the source text.

"No man is good enough to govern another man without that other's consent." We both value the right to have a government of our own choosing. We expect government to serve the people. We do not expect the people to serve government.

America and Japan speak with different tongues, but both converse, worship, and work with the language of freedom. We defend the right to voice our views, to speak words of dissent without being afraid, and to seek inner peace through communion with our God.

We believe in rewarding initiative, savings and risktaking. And we encourage those who set their sights on the farthest stars, and chart new paths to progress through the winds and waters of commerce. Others censor and stifle their citizens. We trust in freedom to nurture the diversity and creativity that enriches us all. I like what your poet Basho said: "Many kinds of plants and each one triumphant in its special blossoms." (Applause.)

Finally, our freedom inspires no fear because it poses no threat. We intimidate no one. And we will not be intimidated by anyone. The United States and Japan do not build walls to keep our people in; we do not have armies of secret police to keep them quiet; we do not throw dissidents into so-called mental hospitals; and we would never coldbloodedly shoot a defenseless airliner out of the sky. (Applause.) We share your grief for that tragic and needless loss of innocent lives.

Our two countries are far from perfect. But in this imperfect and dangerous world, the United States and Japan represent the deepest aspirations of men and women everywhere—to be free, to live in peace, and to create and renew the wealth of abundance and spiritual fulfillment. I have come to Japan because we have an historic opportunity, indeed, an historic responsibility. We can become a powerful partnership for good, not just in our own countries, not just in the Pacific region, but throughout the world. (Applause.) Distinguished ladies and gentlemen, my question is: Do we have the determination to meet the challenge of partnership and make it happen. My answer is without hesitation, yes, we do and yes, we will.

For much of our histories our countries looked inward. Well, those times have passed. With our combined economies accounting for half the output of the free world we cannot escape our global responsibilities. Our industries depend on the importation of energy and minerals from distant lands. Our prosperity requires a sound international financial system and free and open trading markets. And our security is inseparable from the security of our friends and neighbors.

The simple hope for world peace and prosperity will not be enough. Our two great nations, working with others, must preserve the values and freedoms our societies have struggled so hard to achieve. Nor should our partnership for peace, prosperity and freedom be considered a quest for competing goals. We cannot prosper unless we are secure and we cannot be secure unless we are free. And we will not succeed in any of these endeavors unless Japan and America work in harmony.

I have come to your country carrying the heartfelt desires of America for peace. I know our desires are shared by Prime Minister Nakasone and all of Japan. We are people of peace. We understand the terrible trauma of human suffering. I have lived through four wars in my lifetime. So I speak not just as President of the United States, but also as a husband, a father, and a grandfather. (Applause.) I believe there can be only one policy for preserving our precious civilization in this modern age. A nuclear war can never be won and must never be fought. (Applause.)

The only value in possessing nuclear weapons is to make sure they can't be used ever. I know I speak for people everywhere when I say, our dream is to see the day when nuclear weapons will be banished from the face of the earth. (Applause.)

Arms control must mean arms reductions. America is doing its part. As I pledged to the United Nations less than two months ago, the United States will accept any equitable, verifiable agreement that stabilizes forces at lower levels than currently exist. We want significant reductions. And we're willing to compromise.

In the strategic arms reduction talks, American negotiators continue to press the Soviet Union for any formula that will achieve these objectives. In the longer-range INF talks, we are pursuing the same course, even offering to eliminate an entire category of weapons. I'm very conscious of our negotiating responsibility on issues that concern the safety and well-being of the Japanese people. And let me make one thing very plain. We must not and we will not accept any agreement that transfers the threat of longer-range nuclear missiles from Europe to Asia. (Applause.)

Our great frustration has been the other side's unwillingness to negotiate in good faith. We wanted to cut deep into nuclear arsenals, and still do. But they're blocking the dramatic reductions the world wants. In our good faith effort to move the negotiations forward, we have offered new initiatives, provided for substantial reductions to equal levels, and the lower the level the better. But we shall wait. We still wait for the first positive response.

Despite this bleak picture, I will not be deterred in my search for a breakthrough. The United States will never walk away from the negotiating table. Peace is too important. Common sense demands that we persevere. And we will persevere. We live in uncertain times. (Applause.) There are trials and tests for freedom wherever freedom stands. It is as stark as the tragedy over the Sea of Japan where 269 innocent people were killed for the so-called cause of "sacred airspace." It is as real as the terrorist attacks last month—the Republic of Korea's leadership in Rangoon—and against American and French members of the international peacekeeping force in Beirut. And yes, it is as telling as the stonewalling of our adversaries at the negotiating table, and as their crude attempts to intimidate freedom-loving people everywhere.

These threats to peace and freedom underscore the importance of closer cooperation among all nations. You have an old proverb that says, "A single arrow is easily broken, but not three in a bunch." (Applause.) The stronger the dedication of Japan, the United States and our allies to peace through strength, the greater our contributions to building a more secure future will be. The U.S.-Japan Treaty of Mutual Cooperation and Security must continue to serve us as the bedrock of our security relationship. Japan will not have to bear the burden of defending freedom alone. America is your partner. We will bear that burden together. (Applause.)

The defense of freedom should be a shared burden. We can afford to defend freedom; we cannot afford to lose it. The blessings of your economic miracle, created with the genius of a talented, determined and dynamic people, can only be protected in the safe harbor of freedom.

In his book, In Quest of Peace and Freedom, Former Prime Minister Sato wrote: "In the hundred years since the Meiji Restoration, Japan has constantly endeavored to catch up and eventually overtake the more advanced countries of the world." I don't think I'll be making headlines when I say, you've not only caught up, in some cases, you've pulled ahead. Here again, our partnership is crucial. But this time, you can be teachers. To all those who lack faith in the human spirit, I have just three words of advice: Come to Japan. (Applause.)

Come to a country whose economic production will soon surpass the Soviet Union's, making Japan's economy the second largest in the entire world. Come to learn from a culture that instills in its people a strong spirit of cooperation, discipline, and striving for excellence; and yes, learn from government policies which helped create this economic miracle—not so much by central planning, as by stimulating competition, encouraging initiative, and rewarding savings and risktaking.

Our country has made great strides in this direction during the last 3 years. We are correcting past mistakes. Hope is being reborn. Confidence is returning. America's future looks bright again. We have turned the corner from overtaxing—(applause)—turned the corner from overtaxing, overspending, record interest rates, high inflation, and low growth. The United States is beginning the first stage of a new industrial renaissance, and we're helping pull other nations forward to worldwide recovery.

But some in my country still flinch from the need to restrain spending. Under the guise of lowering deficits, they would turn back to policies of higher taxes. They would ignore the lesson of Japan. A look at Japan's postwar history yields two stunning conclusions. Among the major industrialized countries, your tax burden has remained the lowest and your growth and savings rates the highest. (Applause.) Savers in Japan can exempt very large amounts of interest income from taxation; your taxes on so-called unearned income—(laughter)—are low; you have no capital gains tax on securities for investors; and the overwhelming majority of your working people face tax rates dramatically lower than in the other industrial countries, including my own. (Applause.) And incentives for everyone—that's the secret of strong growth for a shining future filled with hope and opportunities and incentives for growth, not tax increases, is our policy for America. Sometimes I wonder if we shouldn't further our friendship by my sending our Congress here and you coming over and occupying our Capitol building for a while. (Applause.)

Partnership must be a two-way street grounded in mutual trust. Let us always be willing to learn from each other and cooperate together. We have every reason to do so. Our combined economies account for almost 35 percent of the world's entire economic output. We are the world's two largest overseas trading partners. Last year, Japan took about 10 percent of our total exports and we bought some 25 percent of yours. Our two-way trade will exceed $60 billion in 1983, more than double the level of just 7 years ago.

At the Williamsburg Summit last May, the leaders of our industrial democracies pledged to cooperate in rolling back protectionism. My personal commitment to that goal is based on economic principles, old-fashioned common sense and experience. I am old enough to remember what eventually happened the last time countries protected their markets from competition: It was a nightmare called "the Great Depression." And it was worldwide. World trade fell at that time by 60 percent. And everyone, workers, farmers and manufacturers were hurt.

Let us have the wisdom never to repeat that policy. (Applause.) We're in the same boat with our trading partners around the globe. And if one partner in the boat shoots a hole in the boat, it doesn't make much sense for the other partner to shoot another hole in the boat. Some say, yes, and call that getting tough. Well, forgive me, but I call it getting wet all over. (Applause.) Rather than shoot holes, let us work together to plug them up so our boat of free markets and free trade and fair trade can lead us all to greater economic growth and international stability. (Applause.)

I have vigorously opposed quick fixes of protectionism in America. Anti-competitive legislation like the local content rule, which would force our domestic manufacturers of cars to use a rising share of U.S. labor and parts. Now, this would be a cruel hoax—(applause)—raising—it would be raising prices without protecting jobs. We would buy less from you. You would buy less from us. The world's economic pie would shrink. Retaliation and recrimination would increase.

It is not easy for elected officials to balance the concerns of constituents with the greater interests of the nation. But that's what our jobs are all about. And we need your help in demonstrating free trade to address concerns of my own people. Americans believe your markets are less open than ours. We need your support to lower further the barriers that still make it difficult for some American products to enter your markets easily. Your government's recent series of actions to reduce trade barriers are positive steps in this direction. We very much hope this process will continue and accelerate. In turn, I pledge my support to combat protectionist measures in my own country.

If we each give a little we can all gain a lot. (Applause.) As two great and mature democracies, let us have the faith to believe in each other, to draw on our long and good friendship and to make our partnership grow. We are leaders in the world economy. We and the other industrialized countries share a responsibility to open up capital and trading markets, promote greater investment in each other's country, assist developing nations, and stop the leakage of military technology to an adversary bent on aggression and domination.

We believe that the currency of the world's second largest free market economy should reflect the economic strength and political stability that you enjoy. We look forward to the yen playing a greater role in international financial and economic affairs. We welcome the recent trend toward a stronger yen. And we would welcome Japan's increasingly active role in global affairs. Your leadership in aid to refugees and in economic assistance to various countries has been most important in helping to promote greater stability in key regions of the world. Your counsel on arms reduction initiatives is highly valued by us.

We may have periodic disputes, but the real quarrel is not between us. (Applause.) It is with those who would impose regimentation over freedom, drudgery over dynamic initiative, a future of despair over the certainty of betterment, and the forced feeding of a military goliath over a personal stake in the products and progress of tomorrow.

You and your neighbors are shining examples for all who seek rapid development. The Pacific Basin represents the most exciting region of economic growth in the world today. Your people stretch your abilities to the limit, and when an entire nation does this, miracles occur. Being a Californian, I have seen many miracles hardworking Japanese have brought to our shores.

In 1865, a young Samurai student, Kanaye Nagasawa, left Japan to learn what made the West economically strong and technologically advanced. Ten years later, he founded a small winery at Santa Rosa, California, called the Fountaingrove Round Barn and Winery. Soon he became known as the great king of California. Nagasawa came to California to learn and stayed to enrich our lives. Both our countries owe much to this Japanese warrior-turned-businessman.

As the years pass, our contacts continue to increase at an astounding rate. Today some 13,000 of your best college and graduate students are studying in America. And increasing numbers of U.S. citizens are coming here to learn everything they can about Japan. Companies like Nissan, Kyocera, Sony and Toshiba have brought thousands of jobs to America's shores. The State of California is planning to build a rapid speed train that is adapted from your highly successful bullet train. In 1985 the United States will join Japan in a major exhibition of science and technology at Tsukuba, another symbol of our cooperation. (Applause.)

For my part, I welcome this new Pacific tide. Let it roll peacefully on, carrying a two-way flow of people and ideas that can break from barriers of suspicion and mistrust, and build up bonds of cooperation and shared optimism. (Applause.)

Our two nations may spring from separate pasts; we may live at opposite sides of the earth; but we have been brought together by our indomitable spirit of determination, our love of liberty, and devotion to progress. We are like climbers who begin their ascent from opposite ends of the mountain. The harder we try, the higher we climb and the closer we come together—until that moment we reach the peak and we are as one. (Applause.)

It happened just last month. One American and two Japanese groups began climbing Mt. Everest—the Japanese from the side of Nepal and the Americans from the side of Tibet. The conditions were so difficult and dangerous that before it ended two Japanese climbers tragically lost their lives. But before that tragedy, those brave climbers all met and shook hands just under the summit. And then, together, they climbed to the top to share that magnificent moment of triumph. (Applause.)

Good and dear friends of Japan, if those mountaineers could join hands at the top of the world, imagine how high our combined 350 million citizens can climb, if all of us work together as powerful partners for the cause of good. (Applause.) Together there is nothing that Japan and America cannot do.

Thank you very much. God bless you. (Applause.)

Joint Statement Issued by President Reagan and Japanese Prime Minister Nakasone, Tokyo, November 11, 1983 [16]

U.S.–Japan Energy Cooperation

Prime Minister Nakasone and President Reagan share the view that further progress be made in energy trade and cooperation in oil, natural gas and coal between Japan and the United States as outlined in the following Joint Policy Statement recommended by the Japan–United States Energy Working Group:

Taking account of the energy prospects for the entire Pacific basin, the two countries agree that the sound expansion of U.S.–Japan energy trade will contribute to the further development of the close economic and energy security relationship which exists between the two countries.

They will continue to discuss and find ways of developing this trade for the mutual benefit of both countries, noting the importance of longterm cooperation, the central role of the private sector, and the need for a balance between economic cost and energy security.

Both countries consider Alaska to be a particularly promising area for joint development of energy resources. Both governments will encourage private sector discussions regarding the possibilities for such development.

With regard to trade in oil, gas and coal, we have agreed on the following next steps:

A. The United States and Japan recognize that if legislative barriers can be removed, the U.S. has the potential to ship substantial quantities of crude oil to Japan, thereby increasing economic incentives for U.S. oil production and helping to diversify Japan's energy sources. The United States will continue to keep under review the removal of restrictions on exports of domestic crude oil.

B. The United States and Japan will encourage private industry in both countries to undertake now the prefeasibility or feasibility studies necessary to determine the extent to which Alaskan natural gas can be jointly developed by U.S. and Japanese interests.

C. The United States and Japan will encourage private industry in both countries to discuss the possibility of concluding long-term coal contracts and jointly developing mines and transportation systems to make American coal more competitive in the Japanese market.

D. In this regard, the two countries welcome the examinations underway of the technical and economic aspects of several steam coal projects by private companies concerned on both sides. As economic recovery proceeds, Japan will encourage its industries to consider purchase of more competitively priced U.S. steam coal to meet future demands not already covered by existing contracts. In addition, Japan will invite the private sector concerned to explore the possibility of further increasing substitution of coal for oil in electrical generation.

E. With regard to metallurgical coal, both sides noted that the depressed state of world steel manufacturing had reduced demand for traded coal. However, in view of the fact that the United States has been a major supplier to the Japanese market, both sides will endeavor to maintain the level of Japanese imports of U.S. coal. Japan expects that imports of competitively priced U.S. metallurgical coal will not continue to decline, and will encourage its steel industry to increase U.S. coal imports when conditions in the industry permit.

F. As a first step toward developing U.S.–Japan coal trade, from a mid- to long-term prospective, a mission composed of representatives of major Japanese coal users and other appropriate interests will visit the U.S. to meet with major coal mining and transportation interests. The purpose of this mission will be to explore the possibility of expanding coal trade between the United States and Japan, and the possibility of conducting a major study of the opportunities for reducing the delivered price in Japan of U.S. coal.

Statement by the Representative at the U.N. Donors' Conference on Kampuchean Relief (Dewey), May 24, 1983 [1]

U.S. Denunciation of Vietnamese Attacks on Civilian Khmer Border Camps and Concern Regarding Interior Kampuchean Conditions

Mr. Chairman, all of us here today who have worked so hard for the Khmer on the border and in the interior cannot but react with horror to the brutality of recent Vietnamese actions. My government joins Thailand and other concerned countries in denouncing the Vietnamese attacks and calling on Vietnam to cease further military action against the border refugee camps. We also wish to express our continued support for a negotiated settlement to the Kampuchean problem which will lead to the withdrawal of all foreign troops and the restoration of Kampuchean independence and self-determination. Only when such an agreement is reached will the killing stop once and for all.

Mr. Chairman, my government would like to commend the Royal Thai Government for the generosity it displayed in providing refuge to Khmer refugees seeking escape from the Vietnamese onslaught. We hope that the refugees displaced by the Vietnamese attacks will soon be able to relocate safely to the border area.

My government would also like to commend you, Sir Robert [2] in particular, and the staffs of UNBRO, the ICRC and the voluntary agencies for their work in caring for the displaced refugees under difficult and often dangerous conditions. We were particularly impressed by their contingency planning which saved countless lives and helped immeasurably to reduce human suffering.

Mr. Chairman, we believe that it would be tragic if, at this crucial juncture, the border relief operation were forced to cut back for the want of adequate funding support. The United States has already provided $7.5 million to UNBRO and an additional $1.5 million to the ICRC for their work with the border refugees. Unfortunately, the recent Vietnamese attacks have aggravated the already substantial operational deficits carried by both organizations. My government encourages the other donors who have delayed their contributions to contribute quickly so that the relief program can be ensured the financial stability so essential to effective operation.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the World Health Organization for surveying medical conditions in the border camps. We were encouraged that the report of the WHO assessment team laid to rest many of our fears about the reported deterioration of the health of the border refugees. As the WHO team reported, however, increased assistance is required for expanded health care, increased feeding and improved malaria control. We support the WHO recommendations and encourage UNBRO to adopt them quickly. The United States is prepared to contribute additional financial support to UNBRO and we look to other donors to join us in providing improved health care and malaria control on the border.

Turning now to the interior of Kampuchea—we have reviewed Dr. Schreur's most recent report and believe that it essentially represents a restatement of the conclusions reached by the Rao mission. We have already expressed our concerns about that mission's objectivity and thoroughness in estimating rice requirements and evaluating the effectiveness of the Phnom Penh authority's utilization of relief assistance. Our concerns on this latter point appear to have been confirmed by the recent WFP report which states that the Phnom Penh authorities continue to use emergency assistance to pay employees. Regarding Dr. Schreur's observations about child health, we believe that he did not follow accepted procedures for conducting his study and that the data provided does not support his general conclusions.

The United States remains concerned about conditions inside Kampuchea and we are distressed that the safeguards established last year to prevent a relapse and deterioration in the health and well-being of children and other vulnerable groups inside Kampuchea were not implemented. We encourage UNICEF, which is the agency most concerned with child health inside Kampuchea, to monitor the nutritional well-being of Khmer children, and to provide adequate warning if any future widespread emergency situation were to arise.

I would like to commend, in closing, the extraordinary efforts that have been taken to protect the substantial investment in human lives and to prevent the affected people in Kampuchea from slipping back into deplorable conditions. We commend the serious, persistent efforts to update our information on health and nutritional conditions in the country. Differences in assessment of conditions and solutions, in no way changes our admiration and respect for the truly remarkable achievements for which your dedicated team is responsible. Thank you.

Statement by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs (Monjo) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, September 15, 1983 [3]

Kampuchea After Five Years of Vietnamese Occupation

Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to have the opportunity to appear before this subcommittee to review the situation in Kampuchea after 5 years of Vietnamese occupation. Since 1975 the Khmer people, have suffered immeasurably, first from the brutal efforts of the Pol Pot regime to completely restructure Khmer society and, since 1978, from invasion and occupation by their stronger neighbor, Vietnam. I welcome this chance to review recent developments in Kampuchea.

It has been almost a year since this administration last discussed Kampuchea before this committee. In the past year, ASEAN's strategy for a political settlement—which the United States strongly supports—has succeeded in further isolating Vietnam because of Hanoi's occupation of Kampuchea. This is particularly evident in increased voting at the United Nations against Vietnam's occupation, but also in opportunities Hanoi has lost in aid and trade with the great majority of nations who condemn its Kampuchean policies.

Inside Kampuchea, Vietnamese occupying forces have long since worn out their welcome.

—There is increased hostility to the occupation, especially as the Vietnamese increase their treatment of Kampuchea as a colony.

—Resistance to Hanoi's occupation has increased noticeably during the current wet season. In response, the Vietnamese in some areas have cracked down on local officials and the armed forces of the Heng Samrin regime.

—Heightened repression by the Vietnamese has caused large numbers of Khmer to flee to the Thai-Kampuchea border.

Despite international condemnation and the opposition of the Khmer people, Vietnam's occupation of Kampuchea continues, with no end in sight. Hanoi's offers to talk avoid the underlying issues and its claims of partial troop withdrawals are false. Hanoi refuses to address the widely accepted framework for a settlement set forth in the Declaration of the International Conference on Kampuchea. [4] Hanoi's intention to avoid a political settlement and continue with a military solution has been nowhere more evident than during the past dry season when its forces repeatedly launched brutal assaults against Khmer civilian refugee settlements along the Thai-Kampuchean border.

Now I would like to turn to these points in more detail.

During this past dry season in Indochina, Vietnam continued its efforts to destroy the anti-Vietnamese resistance forces and consolidate its hold on Kampuchea. Beginning in late January 1983, the Vietnamese Army launched a series of attacks against resistance positions and civilian encampments along the Thai-Kampuchean border. These attacks, backed by armor and heavy artillery, overran several of the border encampments, forcing more than 85,000 Khmer civilians to seek refuge elsewhere. In early April, Vietnamese units entered Thai territory in force, prompting the Royal Thai Air Force to launch air strikes against Vietnamese troops. These wanton attacks against civilian encampments, and the disregard they show for Thai territory, are indications that Vietnam has not changed its policy of seeking a military solution to the problem of Kampuchea.

Recent intelligence has enabled us to refine our estimate of Vietnamese troop strength in Kampuchea to 150–170,000 men, a large portion of them concentrated near the Thai-Kampuchean border. This changed estimate reflects only more precise information now available to us, not any change in Vietnamese strength. In May 1983, Hanoi announced a second partial troop withdrawal and said that the Cuu Long or Fourth Corps with 10,000 troops would return to Vietnam. Foreign journalists invited to Kampuchea for the event observed 2,000–3,000 Vietnamese troops leaving the country. Some headquarters units were indeed withdrawn, but there is no indication of a reduction in Vietnamese strength in Kampuchea. More new personnel have been joining units near the Thai border than departed and the Vietnamese army appears to have been reorganized to increase its combat power near the border. There is no indication of a genuine withdrawal. In fact, our information indicates that this was simply a troop rotation and unit reorganization exercise.

The Heng Samrin regime's own army is weak and ineffective. Widespread conscription has brought its strength to 20–30,000 men but morale is low and desertion a widespread problem. Even the main force units are considered unreliable by the Vietnamese while some local militia are apparently suspected by the Vietnamese of collaborating with the resistance.

The Vietnamese, however, have been unable to eliminate the resistance threat and face the prospect of protracted conflict. The resistance forces have grown in strength and capability. The Khmer Rouge maintain more than 30,000 troops and are apparently able to conduct operations over a large area of the country. The Khmer People's National Liberation Front has increased its strength and has become a more effective combat force. It has reorganized its command structure to pursue a more vigorous guerilla war. The KPNLF has 12,000 armed troops and some 6,000 more troops awaiting equipment. The pro-Sihanouk forces number approximately 5,000 men. Shortages of equipment continue to limit the effectiveness of the non-Communist forces.

The resistance forces, both Khmer Rouge and non-communist, have been more active this wet season than in the past. Attacks and ambushes along the roads and the railroad between Phnom Penh and western Kampuchea have been more frequent. The Vietnamese army appears to be facing greater difficulty in supplying its forces near the border.

We do not see any prospect of the Vietnamese destroying the resistance forces. The resistance does not pose a serious military threat to Vietnam's hold on the main population centers, but it is a problem for Hanoi and prevents the Vietnamese-installed regime from consolidating its control of the country.

Within Kampuchea, there has been some improvement in the domestic economy. The food situation is better than in past years and there is a prospect of self-sufficiency in rice. The requirements for international relief assistance have already fallen significantly and should continue to fall in the future. The rains this year, however, have been late and below normal. We are watching the situation carefully in cooperation with the U.N. Secretary-General's Special Representative for Khmer Relief.

Politically, Vietnamese efforts to establish the legitimacy of the Heng Samrin regime have made little progress. The regime is dependent on Vietnamese advisors down to the provincial level and all major policy decisions are made on sufferance of the Vietnamese. Often, they seem to serve Vietnam's interests at the expense of Kampuchea's. Hanoi and Phnom Penh recently announced an agreement on delimiting their common border which abandoned the position held by every Kampuchean Government since independence and accepted the Vietnamese view of the border's true location. The regime has gained, at best, only the tacit acquiescence of the Khmer. Hanoi is concerned about the reliability of the Heng Samrin regime's civilian administration and the general population. In May and June the Vietnamese arrested a number of regime officials on suspicion of sympathizing with the resistance. Vietnamese military units have also carried out pacification campaigns in the countryside directed at villagers believed to support the resistance. The brutal excesses of these campaigns have driven several thousand Khmer to flee to the Thai-Kampuchean border in search of refuge, joining the more than 200,000 already in border encampments.

Interviews with refugees fleeing Kampuchea indicate that anti-Vietnamese sentiment and support for the resistance is on the rise. The Khmer Rouge are still widely remembered and hated for their bloody excesses while in power. The Vietnamese and the Heng Samrin regime have used this fear to control the country but Khmer nationalism is reasserting itself. Conscription, forced labor, a fear of the sometimes undisciplined behavior of Vietnamese troops, and increasing suspicion of Vietnam's long-term intentions have all contributed to the increasing resentment of the Vietnamese. Moreover, the senior levels of Heng Samrin's regime are heavily composed of former Khmer Rouge officers, including Heng Samrin, who broke with Pol Pot before the Vietnamese invasion of Kampuchea but who share responsibility for the Khmer Rouge regime's horrifying record of atrocities. The formation of the Coalition last year, the reemergence of Prince Sihanouk, and the leadership also provided by Son Sann have given the Khmer renewed hope of an eventual choice other than the Khmer Rouge or a government controlled by the Vietnamese.

The recent influx of Vietnamese settlers into Kampuchea will further contribute to popular disaffection. Estimates of the number of Vietnamese immigrants range from the official Phnom Penh figure of 40,000 to an improbable 1.2 million. We believe that the true number may lie in the 150–200,000 range. There were some 500,000 ethnic Vietnamese in Kampuchea before 1970. Most fled between 1970 and 1979. Some of the Vietnamese settlers are undoubtedly returning residents. As many as a third, however, are new immigrants. When combined with Vietnamese-imposed changes to Kampuchean administration and Khmer society, this officially sponsored Vietnamese immigration raises serious questions about Hanoi's long-term intentions towards Kampuchea.

The members of the Association of South East Asian Nations (ASEAN), the countries in the region most threatened by Vietnamese aggression in Kampuchea, seek a political settlement to the problem of Kampuchea based on the complete withdrawal of Vietnamese troops and the establishment of a neutral, independent Kampuchea through internationally supervised elections. These principles were adopted by a majority of the world's nations in the Declaration of the U.N.-sponsored International Conference on Kampuchea (ICK). Increasing majorities have passed resolutions incorporating the ICK formula at every U.N. General Assembly since 1979. ASEAN's strategy includes applying political, diplomatic and economic pressure on Vietnam to persuade Hanoi that a political settlement is in its own interests.

Support for ASEAN and its approach to the Kampuchean problem is the cornerstone of U.S. policy in Southeast Asia. We share ASEAN's objective of a comprehensive political settlement and work with ASEAN to achieve the objectives of the ICK Declaration. We share ASEAN's belief that only a peaceful solution to the problem in Kampuchea can address the concerns and interests of all the parties involved.

Internationally, Vietnam remains isolated because of its conduct in Kampuchea. The majority of nonaligned nations have joined ASEAN, Western Europe, Japan and the United States in condemning Vietnam's aggression which is in violation of international law and the U.N. Charter. Hanoi's only support comes from the USSR and Soviet allies. The Soviet Union provides Vietnam with military and economic aid exceeding $1 billion annually. This aid supports Vietnam's war effort in Kampuchea and keeps the Vietnamese economy functioning at a minimal level, but is insufficient to allow Hanoi to reconstruct and develop the country. Moscow has been able to trade on this support to obtain access to Vietnamese air and naval facilities, notably the former U.S. base at Cam Ranh Bay. We and ASEAN are concerned at this increasing Soviet presence in Southeast Asia. Some argue we should soften our stance toward Vietnam to give it an alternative to the Soviets. However, it is not the policies of ASEAN or the United States which isolate Vietnam and leave it dependent on the Soviet Union. It is Hanoi's own policy of invading and occupying a neighbor which leave it without friends outside the Soviet camp. Only a change in those policies will allow Hanoi to expand its contacts with the rest of the world.

In 1982, with encouragement from the ASEAN nations, the Coalition Government of Democratic Kampuchea was formed. [5] It broadened the DK regime into a coalition joining non-Communist factions led by respected Khmer nationalists Prince Sihanouk and former Prime Minister Son Sann with the Khmer Rouge to oppose the Vietnamese occupation of Kampuchea. These groups retain their own political identities and military autonomy but are pledged to work together to seek implementation of the ICK Delaration on Kampuchea.

The United States was not directly involved in the Coalition's formation. We nevertheless welcomed it as a step in the process of achieving a settlement in Kampuchea. The United States continues to give diplomatic and political support to the non-Communist elements in the Coalition. We welcomed Prince Sihanouk and Mr. Son Sann to Washington last year during the UNGA. They met the Secretary of State in New York and the Vice President here in Washington. [6] We are pleased that Son Sann is in Washington again and that he will be meeting with the Secretary this afternoon. [7] We look forward to continuing our contacts with Prince Sihanouk during his upcoming visit to the United States. We will continue our political and humanitarian support for the coalition, but we do not plan to offer military aid to the Coalition or any of its members. We do not provide aid of any kind or have any contact with the Khmer Rouge and our welcoming of the Coalition does not imply any support for the Khmer Rouge.

The Coalition has greatly enhanced international support for ASEAN's strategy on Kampuchea. Last year at the UNGA, the ASEAN-sponsored resolution calling for the withdrawal of all foreign forces and internationally supervised elections was adopted by 105 votes to 29. [8] The United States joined the majority which included most nonaligned nations. We believe that ASEAN is again in a strong position to manage the Kampuchean debate in New York and we will work with ASEAN to support moves designed to achieve a settlement.

At every General Assembly since 1979, the Vietnamese or their supporters have challenged the credentials of the Democratic Kampuchean delegation. Hanoi's ultimate objective is to seat its client Heng Samrin regime. In each case the challenge has been defeated easily through the efforts of the ASEAN governments supported by much of Western Europe and the nonaligned world, the United States and Japan. The United States will again support ASEAN's position in favor of continuing to accredit the Democratic Kampuchean delegation.

Our stand remains based on the technical ground that Democratic Kampuchea has been accepted as a member of the United Nations since its assumption of power in 1975. Having accepted Democratic Kampuchea, the United Nations can withdraw those credentials only if there is a superior claimant to the seat. There is no superior claimant to the Kampuchean seat. The Heng Samrin regime is certainly not a superior claimant. It was installed in Phnom Penh and is maintained there solely by the force of Vietnamese arms. Seating representatives of the Heng Samrin regime would indicate international acceptance of a government imposed by

[5] In Kuala Lampur on June 22, 1982, the three principal resistance leaders, Prince Norodom Sihanouk, Khieu Kamphan, and Son Sann, signed a joint declaration creating the Coalition Government of Democratic Kampuchea. Sihanouk was named President of the coalition; Son Sann became Prime Minister; and Khmer Rouge leader Khieu Kamphan became Vice-President with responsibility for foreign affairs. The coalition government issued a declaration calling for a common struggle against Vietnamese occupation, restoration of Khmer sovereignty, and implementation of relevant U.N. General Assembly resolutions on Kampuchea. The new government pledged to operate under "principles of tripartisan, equality and nonpreponderance." The text of the coalition agreement is in Foreign Broadcast Information Service, Daily Report: East Asia, June 28, 1982, pp. H1–H2.

[6] Prince Sihanouk addressed the U.N. General Assembly on September 30, 1982. The text of his statement is in U.N. document A/37/PV.11. Sihanouk and Son Sann met on October 6 and October 8, 1982, with Secretary of State Shultz and Vice President Bush. Both Shultz and Bush confirmed that the United States would support the coalition politically, but that aid would be limited to humanitarian assistance and would not extend to military supplies.

[7] On September 15, 1983, Son Sann also appeared before the Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs in an informal session. For text of his prepared statement, see Cambodia After 5 Years of Vietnamese Occupation, pp. 80–90.

a foreign aggressor in violation of the U.N. Charter and in defiance of the General Assembly. U.S. support for Democratic Kampuchea's U.N. credentials does not imply recognition of Democratic Kampuchea or support for the Khmer Rouge whose gross misrule and atrocities we continue to abhor.

We see no prospects for an early settlement of the problem of Kampuchea. Vietnam has made tactical moves in an effort to appear flexible but remains intransigent on the key issues. Hanoi's proposals for regional talks have sought to gain acceptance of Vietnam's position in Kampuchea and recognition for the regime installed by Hanoi in Phnom Penh. In addition, Vietnam has sought to project itself as spokesman for the Indochina bloc. All of these moves are designed to support Hanoi's objective of an Indochina dominated by Vietnam and subservient to its interests. Ultimately, Hanoi seeks to establish an Indochinese federation. Vietnam has turned aside all ASEAN proposals, including an ASEAN offer to meet the Vietnamese in Hanoi if Vietnam withdrew its forces in Kampuchea 30 kilometers from the Thai border. Hanoi continues to deny, in fact, that there is a Kampuchea problem. ASEAN's legitimate security concerns are dismissed as border issues amenable to resolution through bloc to bloc talks between ASEAN and the Indochinese states. Such an approach is designed to draw ASEAN into open-ended talks about peace and security in Southeast Asia, talks which would serve to grant implicit recognition to the Heng Samrin regime. Hanoi continues to reject the U.N. Kampuchea Conference principles, which are supported by a large majority of the world's nations. Such an approach ignores the fundamental cause of instability in Southeast Asia—Vietnam's occupation of Kampuchea.

We can expect to see more tactical moves by Vietnam but so far we have not seen any genuine willingness on Vietnam's part to seek a settlement in Kampuchea which would restore Khmer self-determination. We, like ASEAN, remain convinced that a political settlement will be possible only once Vietnam realizes the disastrous results its policies have produced. Only a change in Hanoi's policy will reconcile Vietnam's interests with those of its neighbors and bring peace to the region. Until then, the international community must continue to maintain the pressure on Vietnam.

The view from Hanoi, then, cannot be encouraging. Vietnam faces a long-term struggle in Kampuchea. Its client regime is a failure and popular dissatisfaction is rising at Vietnam's treatment of Kampuchea as a colony. The Vietnamese economy is suffering from mismanagement and the burden of a foreign war. Hanoi is at odds with its most powerful neighbor, China, and with the nations of ASEAN. It is isolated internationally and almost wholly dependent on Soviet support and assistance. Only a settlement of the problem in Kampuchea which allows that unhappy country to finally chart its own course is consistent with Vietnam's own long-term interests.

Situation in Kampuchea

The United States supports ASEAN's efforts to achieve a comprehensive political settlement of the problem in Kampuchea based on a complete withdrawal of foreign forces and an internationally supervised election. These principles have been adopted by a great majority of the world's nations in the declaration of the U.N.-sponsored International Conference on Kampuchea and some successive resolutions at the U.N. General Assembly. The Khmer Resistance Coalition is an important element of the ASEAN strategy. Although the U.S. is not directly involved in the Coalition's formation, we've welcomed it as a vehicle for them to achieve a political settlement in Kampuchea. We give moral, diplomatic and political support to the Coalition's non-Communist elements led by Prince Sihanouk and former Prime Minister Son Sann. We provide no assistance to and have no contact with the Khmer Rouge. Last year, President Sihanouk and Son Sann met with the Vice President here in Washington during the U.N. General Assembly. The President's meeting with the two individuals, not as representatives of the Government of Democratic Kampuchea—which we've never recognized—but as respected Khmer nationalists and leaders of non-Communist groups struggling to free their countries from Vietnam's occupation; the President will reaffirm our opposition to the Vietnamese occupation of Kampuchea and our support for ASEAN's efforts to achieve a settlement which will restore Kampuchea's independence. He will also seek their views on the present situation in Kampuchea and the prospects for the current U.N. General Assembly.

Statement by the Representative in the U.N. General Assembly (Solarz), October 27, 1983 [10]

"In Four Successive Sessions, the General Assembly Has Called For the Total Withdrawal of Foreign Troops From Kampuchea"

It is regrettable that the General Assembly must yet again consider the problem of Kampuchea, now almost five years after the invasion of that unhappy country by its more powerful neighbor, Vietnam.

In four successive sessions, the General Assembly has called for the total withdrawal of foreign troops from Kampuchea, the restoration of the Khmer people's inalienable right to self-determination through free elections, and the provision of humanitarian assistance to the Kampuchean people uprooted and made homeless by the Vietnamese occupation of their country. Each year the resolution on Kampuchea has passed by overwhelming margins, reflecting the strong and growing concern of the great majority of nations, aligned and nonaligned alike, over the fate of Kampuchea and the Khmer people.

Few countries in the world have suffered more over the course of recent decades than Kampuchea. First, a civil war raged there from the time Prince Sihanouk was overthrown in 1970 until the Khmer Rouge came to power in the spring of 1975. Then, between 1975 and 1979, the Pol Pot regime, in an act almost unprecedented in the annals of human history, embarked upon a policy which the French priest, Father Ponchaud, in a memorable phrase, termed "autogenocide," the murder of a people by their own people. Not since Hitler's holocaust condemned and consumed a third of the Jewish people has the world witnessed anything like it. Turning their country into an Asian Auschwitz, the Khmer Rouge systematically slaughtered and starved an estimated 2 million people, out of a total population of 7 million.

If that were not enough, the Vietnamese invaded Kampuchea in late 1978, forcing hundreds of thousands of Kampucheans to flee their country and, with approximately 170,000 troops, have occupied it until today.

In an effort to bring this long nightmare of suffering and occupation to an end, the United Nations has repeatedly proclaimed the need—indeed the necessity—for those who have captured control of this beautiful but broken land to leave and let the future of Kampuchea be determined by the people of Kampuchea themselves.

As far as my own country is concerned, let me state that, although there are, under our democratic system of government, inevitably differences from time to time between the executive branch and the Congress over key policy issues, on this issue both branches of government are clearly united. Only 3 days ago, the House of Representatives unanimously adopted a resolution endorsing the resolution that we are considering here today. [11]

[11] Reference is to H. Con. Res. 176, which supported the efforts of the Association of South East Asian Nations with respect to Kampuchea. The resolution was passed by the House on October 24, 1983, and by the Senate on November 15, 1983. For text of the resolution, see Cambodia After 5 Years of Vietnamese Occupation, pp. 75-77.

The adoption of this resolution by the Congress, without a dissenting vote, is indicative of the strong bipartisan consensus in our country in favor of the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Kampuchea and self-determination for the Kampuchean people. But while we fully intend to continue supporting this effort by the United Nations to resolve the Kampuchean problem, we also think it is important for Vietnam to know that, if and when it is prepared to withdraw its forces from Kampuchea, in the context of the kind of peaceful resolution of the problem envisioned by this resolution, the United States will be prepared to adopt a different attitude toward it.

The need to consider and adopt, year after year, these resolutions on Kampuchea is testimony to the stubborn policy of military conquest and colonization being pursued by Hanoi in disregard of the collective judgment of the international community and in violation of the Charter of the United Nations. Vietnam's continued illegal occupation of its neighbor, in defiance of four successive resolutions of the General Assembly, weakens the security of all nations and is the fundamental source of instability in Southeast Asia. All of us bear the burdens of Hanoi's unchecked and continuing aggression.

It is, of course, the Kampuchean people who suffer most from Hanoi's policies. Nearly 230,000 Khmer civilians encamped along the Thai-Kampuchean border live in constant fear of Vietnamese attacks. From January to April of this year, Vietnamese forces launched a series of massive assaults, backed by armor and heavy artillery, against these civilian encampments. Hundreds of civilians were killed or wounded in these attacks and more than 85,000 forced to flee to safety inside Thailand. There have been reports of atrocities by the attacking troops against civilians. The world community has reacted in horror to these attacks which have been condemned by the United States and other governments. The U.N. Economic and Social Council has asked the Secretary-General to investigate charges of atrocities committed by the occupying troops.

In this regard, we wish again to express our sincere appreciation to the Secretary-General and his Special Representative for Humanitarian Assistance to the Kampuchean People, Sir Robert Jackson, for their efforts on behalf of the Khmer people uprooted by invasion and war. The staffs of the United Nations Border Relief Operation, the World Food Program, U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees and other specialized U.N. agencies, the International Committee of the Red Cross, and the various voluntary organizations continued their untiring work in providing emergency food and medical care to the Kampuchean people, often in dangerous and hostile conditions caused by Vietnamese attacks. They deserve the heartfelt thanks and commendations of the international community. Appreciation is also due to those members of the international community who have continued to support efforts to assist the Kampuchean people through their contributions to UNBRO and the other agencies involved in relief efforts. We must continue these efforts until the time when the Kampuchean people along the Thai-Kampuchean border can return to their homes in safety. My government will continue its efforts and hopes that other members will join us in ensuring that this vital assistance continues to reach those Kampucheans still in need.

Vietnamese repression against Khmer civilians now is more evident in the interior as well. In their frustration at growing popular support for the resistance, the Vietnamese launched a major security crackdown and pacification campaign in western Kampuchea in May and June of this year. According to the reports of those who fled, hundreds of villagers were arrested. Torture was used in an effort to coerce those arrested into "confessing" their support for the resistance. Many of those arrested have not yet returned to their villages and some have reportedly been killed. Thousands of Khmer, including entire villages, have been driven by this crackdown to seek refuge along the Thai-Kampuchean border. They have told of beatings, torture, theft, rape, and other excesses by Vietnamese troops, and these are the actions of an army which claims to protect these people.

The security crackdown has even extended to the ranks of the Heng Samrin regime. Scores of middle level officials have been arrested or detained for questioning about suspected resistance sympathies. This demonstrates that the Vietnamese are not welcomed by the Kampuchean people. Despite its best efforts, even those chosen for their presumed loyalty are now suspected by the Vietnamese of supporting resistance efforts. Vietnam faces an increasing resurgence of Khmer nationalism against its occupation army and its client regime.

What sort of regime has Hanoi created? Despite propaganda claims originating in Hanoi, the Heng Samrin regime does not enjoy the support of the Khmer people. It does not have loyal officials to administer the country. Vietnamese advisors dominate the civil administration, a fact reflecting the regime's inability to function effectively. Heng Samrin officials act only on suffrance of their Vietnamese advisors who hold real power. The Heng Samrin regime recently agreed to Vietnam's position on the delineation of the Vietnamese-Kampuchean border, something every previous Kampuchean Government has refused to accept. These are not the actions of an independent government, but of one controlled by outsiders.

The very fact that Hanoi remains compelled, nearly 5 years after its invasion, to maintain a costly 150–170,000-man army of occupation in Kampuchea to prop up its client regime points up Hanoi's failure and the Heng Samrin regime's failure. Vietnam bears the full weight of maintaining security and defending the regime. Despite increased conscription, the regime's own army remains weak and ineffective, plagued by widespread desertions. Without Vietnam's protection, the regime would rapidly collapse. In 1982, Vietnam claimed that it was withdrawing a portion of its army. There was no evidence of a genuine withdrawal and, in fact, the evidence clearly shows that Vietnam acted to replace soldiers who had completed their military service and to strengthen its military forces in Kampuchea in a troop rotation exercise. This year, Vietnam staged another so-called "troop withdrawal," but again the evidence indicates that there was no reduction in Vietnamese troop strength in Kampuchea. This second claimed withdrawal was simply a reorganization of Hanoi's occupation forces and part of its annual troop rotation. Hanoi has claimed that it will make future withdrawals based on the security situation. Such a unilateral policy ignores the legitimate interests of its neighbors and the international community.

Hanoi would have us think that its policies in Kampuchea are based on saving the Khmer people from the Khmer Rouge. It is well-documented that the ranks of Hanoi's client Heng Samrin regime are filled with former officials of the detested Pol Pot regime, including Heng Samrin himself and Hun Sen. There is a double hypocrisy here in that Vietnam supported the Khmer Rouge both before and after 1975 when that genocidal regime was installed in power. It was only after Hanoi came into conflict with and toppled the Khmer Rouge that the Vietnamese government belatedly condemned their atrocities in an effort to promote an image of itself as the savior of the Kampuchean people.

The presence in the General Assembly of the representatives of Democratic Kampuchea demonstrates that the international community will not accept a client Kampuchean regime imposed by Vietnam. Past Vietnamese efforts to challenge the credentials of Democratic Kampuchea were soundly defeated by large majorities in the General Assembly. This year, Vietnam shrank from even challenging Democratic Kampuchea's right to be represented here. The formation in 1982 of the Khmer coalition broadened Democratic Kampuchea to include nationalist groups led by Prince Sihanouk and former Prime Minister Son Sann. We have been impressed by the response the Khmer people have shown to the leadership of these two respected representatives of Khmer nationalism.

Furthermore, in the past year, thousands of refugees have fled Vietnamese-controlled areas to join the non-Communists along the border. The growing number of forces loyal to Prince Sihanouk and Son Sann are increasingly active inside Kampuchea. The leadership of these two dedicated nationalists gives the Kampuchean people renewed hope in contrast to the grim choice between a Vietnamese-controlled regime or a return of the Khmer Rouge. We welcome their presence in the United Nations. The international community will benefit from their participation and the opportunity to hear the authentic voice of Khmer nationalism.

Originally, the Vietnamese justified their invasion of Kampuchea in terms of saving the Kampucheans from themselves. Now the Vietnamese claim their reason for occupying Kampuchea is a perceived threat from China. These facile and transparent justifications for aggression cannot obscure the obvious fact that Hanoi has sought for three decades to dominate all of Indochina.

Since the General Assembly last considered the situation in Kampuchea, we have begun receiving disturbing reports of massive Vietnamese immigration into Kampuchea, apparently endorsed by Hanoi and the Heng Samrin authorities. Documents of the Vietnamese-controlled Heng Samrin regime and refugee reports reveal that thousands of Vietnamese civilians are now settling in Kampuchea in what appears to be a deliberate, long-term plan by Hanoi to alter the demographic makeup of the Kampuchean nation. Refugees report that Vietnamese farmers, fishermen, and merchants are displacing Khmer in rich farming and fishing areas and in marketplaces. The Heng Samrin regime has acknowledged the existence of the directives which appear to reflect official support for large-scale Vietnamese immigration.

When combined with Vietnamese-imposed changes to Kampuchean administration and Khmer society, this immigration raises serious questions about Hanoi's intentions in Kampuchea. Vietnam is often depicted in Khmer mythology as a crocodile trying to swallow its smaller neighbor. Vietnam's attempts to colonize and absorb Kampuchea arouse among Kampucheans fears for the future existence, much less independence, of their country.

The costs to Vietnam of its foreign war are exacting. Hanoi is at odds with China, is estranged from its neighbors in ASEAN, and is isolated in the international community. Vietnam, with a per capita income of less than $200, maintains the world's third largest standing army. The burden of this ponderous military apparatus and the costs of Hanoi's military adventures fall on the shoulders of Vietnamese farmers, laborers and draftees, many of whom continue to risk their lives each year as "boat people" in search of freedom rather than remain in Vietnam. Soviet assistance exceeding $1 billion a year supports Vietnam's war effort but increases Hanoi's dependence on Moscow. Vietnam's Kampuchea quagmire will in time convince Hanoi's leaders that they cannot subjugate the Khmer people. Political isolation abroad, economic deterioriation at home, and a growing realization of the price it pays for Soviet support in terms of sacrificing its historic independence will eventually lead Hanoi to the realization that a comprehensive political solution to the Kampuchean problem is in its own long-term interests.

The door to a fair and just settlement remains open. The five members of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations have pursued a flexible and unselfish course in this regard. Under ASEAN's leadership, the General Assembly resolutions on Kampuchea and the 1981 International Conference on Kampuchea outline a basis for a comprehensive political settlement in Kampuchea based on the complete withdrawal of foreign forces, restoration of Khmer self-determination through U.N.-supervised free elections, and nonintervention and noninterference in Kampuchean internal affairs. All of the elements for a settlement are in place. Such a settlement would meet the essential interests of all the parties involved and would restore to the Kampuchean people their right to control their own destiny.

No one, least of all the Kampuchean people, wishes to see those responsible for the atrocities of 1975–78 return to power. If Vietnam is reluctant to withdraw because it fears that, were it to do so, the Khmer Rouge would return to Phnom Penh, the answer is that the resolution provides a mechanism specifically designed to prevent such an outcome.

The opportunity is there for Vietnam. Peace is within Vietnam's grasp. By agreeing to withdraw from Kampuchea in accordance with the terms of this resolution, it can both make possible the self-determination of the Kampuchean people and simultaneously protect its legitimate security concerns.

Instead, Vietnam has continued trying to consolidate its hold on Kampuchea through military action, to legitimize its client regime, and to confuse international opinion through phony troop withdrawals and calls for discussions on a Southeast Asian zone of peace. All of this ignores the real source of instability and the real threat to peace in the region—Vietnam's continued occupation of Kampuchea. The members of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations recently presented an "Appeal on Kampuchea." This appeal calls on Hanoi to demonstrate its sincere desire for peace by committing itself to a phased total withdrawal of its forces in Kampuchea with a definite period to be worked out as part of negotiations. This proposal, which is consistent with the principles of the International Conference of Kampuchea, can be accepted by reasonable governments genuinely seeking the restoration and salvation of the Kampuchean nation. It would produce a free and neutral Kampuchea, a threat to none of its neighbors, respecting the fundamental rights of its citizens. Hanoi's leaders should accept this opportunity for a settlement.

Such a settlement would then permit the Khmer people, with the help of the international community—including the United Nations—to turn to the task of rebuilding their country. Ravaged by conflict, famine, genocide, and foreign oppression, Kampuchea's recovery will be a long-term and formidable task. The task to bring peace to Kampuchea, however, is potentially less formidable. It would also end Vietnam's international isolation, restore Vietnam's dignity and freedom of action, and permit Vietnam to begin healing the wounds of forty years of warfare and raise the living conditions of the Vietnamese people. All it takes is a step toward compromise and justice. The world, and above all the people, the tragic, long-suffering people of Kampuchea, are waiting for Vietnam to take that one small step toward peace.

U.S.-South Korean Mutual Commitment to the Security and Safety of the Korean Peninsula

You've compared Korea with Indiana. And, of course, you wouldn't have any way of knowing, but that would strike a particularly responsive chord with me since that's the State that my father was born in and raised in and we think of Indiana as in the heartland of America. So when you spoke of Korea being surrounded by three big powers through its history, I was pleased to see that a fourth power, Indiana, and all surrounding Indiana in the United States have provided you with an ally that is present and will continue to be present.

I visited Korea before but this is my first visit as Secretary of State of the United States of America. Even before the gracious occasion we are enjoying this evening, the visit began auspiciously. Mr. Minister, our talks this afternoon were very informative and useful to me, and I look forward to further consultations with you, as well as to my meetings with President Chun and Prime Minister Kim tomorrow. I thought that perhaps there was something symbolic in the sort of spontaneous way, this afternoon, in which you wound up sitting on the side of the table with my American colleagues and I wound up on the Korean side. And perhaps what that suggests is there aren't two sides but only one side in this partnership.

Our talks will touch on a variety of themes of vital importance to both the Republic of Korea and the United States, and to the relationship between us. We'll exchange views and concerns on the state of the international economy, on the diplomatic efforts of our Governments to ensure peace and promote international understanding, and on our shared belief in the need for continued political development. But everything we discuss, to my mind, will relate to the central theme of this visit: The reaffirmation of our mutual commitment to the security and stability of the Korean Peninsula, and of the northeast Asian region.

Tomorrow afternoon I will be visiting both Korean and American units in some of the areas north of Seoul. When this trip to the forward areas was proposed to me, I readily agreed. I have seen some of these areas on earlier visits, and I know that an awareness of the seriousness and immediacy of the military threat, which comes through so clearly up there, is basic to any real understanding of the situation in Korea. I'll have a chance to refresh my own impressions of the harsh realities of peace and war which must be faced in this nation every day. More important, I believe my visit will demonstrate anew the steadfast commitment of the United States to the security of the Republic of Korea.

The hostile confrontation between two parts of a divided nation which has characterized Korean life for decades is undeniably a tragedy. It requires an enormous diversion of resources away from peaceful purposes, resources that could be used to provide better lives for all the Korean people. And it poses a constant danger. President Chun has repeatedly demonstrated his desire to break the deadlock and establish a basis for dialogue with the north. You yourself, sir, took part in early efforts to bring that about. He has put forward, without conditions, a comprehensive program for the reduction of tensions and the eventual reunification of the nation.

Unfortunately, North Korea has not chosen to take up this offer; nevertheless it remains on the table.

One of the great accomplishments of the South Korean people is that you have achieved dramatic, almost unparalleled economic progress over the past two decades despite the very heavy defense burden you must bear. The United States will continue to do everything it can, consistent with our own budget constraints and global security responsibilities, to ease the burden your defense effort imposes. I am confident that by working together we can continue to deter aggression and maintain a shield behind which economic growth and political development can flourish, and the human spirit prosper.

We applaud the breadth of vision exemplified in President Chun's thoughtful proposals about Pacific cooperation. In addition to his visit to the United States in 1981, President Chun has had highly successful tours of Africa and the ASEAN countries—visits which clearly advanced the stature of Korea in the world. Your political and diplomatic standing is now more nearly in line with your widely recognized economic accomplishments. As friends and allies of both Korea and Japan, we were profoundly encouraged by the recent highly successful efforts to put that vital relationship on a sound and harmonious footing.

I am confident that you will be able to build on the foundation laid during Prime Minister Nakasone's visit.

The ties between Korea and the United States are—as I believe everyone here would agree—both strong and full of promise for the future. I am pleased and honored to represent my country here this evening, at the outset of what I am confident will be an excellent year, and a productive second century, for our relationship.

Mr. Minister, I propose a toast to the health of His Excellency, President Chun, to the friendship of our people, and to the common commitment to security and to peace.

Prepared Statement by the Commander in Chief, United Nations Command/Combined Forces Command and Commander U.S. Forces in Korea (Sennewald) Before the House Armed Services Committee, March 8, 1983 (Extracts) [2]

Overview of the Military Situation on the Korean Peninsula

Mr. Chairman [3] and members of the committee, I welcome this opportunity to provide an overview of the military situation on the Korean Peninsula. I fully support Admiral Long's statement, [4] especially his comments concerning the need to continue ongoing improvements for U.S. forces established in the Pacific. As this is my first opportunity to address Congress, I would like to open by expressing my appreciation for the support you have given to strengthening our joint and combined defense effort in the Republic of Korea, and by highlighting some of the major points that are addressed in the body of the statement.

First, you can be proud of our servicemembers in Korea. They know their jobs, are physically fit, well-disciplined and have pride in themselves, their units and their country. They, together with their ROK counterparts, are the key to a high state of combat preparedness. This combined strength has deterred aggression since 1953, and our forces, combined with those of the Republic of Korea, will acquit themselves well in any conflict with North Korea. However, we must continue to improve our readiness, sustainability, doctrine, and modernization programs in order to deter, or defeat, a calculated effort by the North Koreans to unite the two Koreas by force.

Second, the Republic of Korea is a staunch ally. Our military alliance had its origins on the battlefield three decades ago and endures today as a model of a truly combined effort. This year will mark the fifth anniversary of the ROK/US Combined Forces Command which is charged with the responsibility for the defense of the Republic of Korea. This Combined Command maintains stability and peace on the Korean Peninsula, a condition which is not only important for the Republic of Korea, but is a cornerstone of our policy in northeast Asia.

Third, the Republic has grown into a strong, confident and respected member of the world community. This growth has taken place in all aspects of society and is a tribute to the perseverance, pride and determination of the Korean people. In terms of national security they dedicate 6 percent of their GNP to defense and have a well-developed industrial capability that can provide for the bulk of their military needs. They make important contributions to U.S. defense capabilities through the combined defense improvement program (CDIP) or "host nation support" as it is known elsewhere. We realize significant annual cost avoidances from CDIP programs which range from construction of major military facilities to morale enhancing programs for U.S. servicemembers.

Finally, the North Korean military threat is real and consists of modern, well-trained fighting elements which are logistically well-supported. Their military might has grown far beyond what would be required for an adequate defense, and the complexity of their exercises has demonstrated they are capable of combined arms actions, as well as integrated air/ground combat. They are fully prepared to wage modern warfare and remain dangerous and unpredictable.

U.S. Forces in Korea, together with those of our ROK ally, represent our most forward-deployed units in the Pacific. They are key to our forward line of defense and daily demonstrate U.S. resolve to protect our mutual vital interests in northeast Asia. All the nations in the area share common sea lanes and several international straits are located within range of our bases in Korea. Control of this area is essential in containing potential foes in a regional or Pacific-wide conflict. Conversely, complete control of the peninsula by an adversary would pose an unacceptable threat to our regional allies and provide a formidable location from which to project their power throughout the area. In addition to the obvious strategic importance of maintaining a military presence on the peninsula, we also have a clear obligation to stand by our oft-stated commitment to assist in the preservation of freedom for the people of South Korea. This firm commitment forms the basis of our continuing fine relationship and our mutual efforts to preserve the peace on the peninsula.

Although Kim Il-Sung professes peaceful intentions and insists that North Korea possesses only a modest military force, the opposite is true. North Korea continues to strengthen its already-significant military capabilities. New or improved weapons systems are being introduced in the ground forces at a rapid pace, and additional aircraft and naval vessels have further enhanced their fighting capabilities. North Korea rehearses offensive operations frequently during exercises, exercises which are increasing in size and complexity. Their preparations also include strong emphasis on improving their logistics sustainability. In September 1979, Kim Il-Sung ordered a new policy requiring a six-month stockage of supplies. Significant progress has been made in reaching this objective for most classes of military supplies.

North Korea's massive military buildup during the past decade has been made possible by the investment of nearly 25 percent of its annual GNP to military spending. During this period the North Korean army has doubled in size to 750,000 men and its inventory or major ground force weapons systems has more than doubled. During the past three years, they have accelerated their mechanization program—an action made possible in part by the introduction of large numbers of North Korean-built copies of the Soviet T-62 tank.

The North Koreans are placing emphasis on developing highly mobile, combined arms forces through large-scale offensive exercises. A force of more than 20 brigades of ranger/commandos and other special operations forces continues to train intensively and would become the vanguard for an attack across the DMZ as well as sea and air insertion deep into the rear areas of the ROK. Airborne elements of this force are well trained especially in night operations. Major restructuring and strengthening of reserve forces have also occurred. These are predominantly ground forces and total approximately four million people. They are being equipped with heavier weapons displaced from the regular forces as they modernize.

The North Korean Air Force has further increased its numerical superiority over the ROK Air Force with the addition of between 25 and 50 F-7 fighters which are Chinese built copies of the Mig-21. Their inventory of fighters and bombers now totals well over 700. The North Korean Air Force has many jet capable airfields, yet continues to construct more, as well as the underground facilities necessary to house and protect the aircraft.

The North Korean Navy has a highly versatile force of over 500 combatant vessels, yet continues to strengthen its capability for offensive operations. Their large force of submarines is capable of interdicting shipping and of offensive minelaying in the approaches to ROK ports. They have an impressive force of high-speed landing craft, boats armed with multiple rocket launchers and gunboats which are ideally suited for carrying out amphibious raids and shore bombardment operations against airfields and other installations near the ROK coast. The fastest growing capability in the North Korean Navy is in ship borne surface-to-surface missiles. Forward-basing of some of these boats near the UNC-controlled northwest islands poses an immediate threat to friendly shipping and defensive patrols in that area.

North Korea appears to be having troubles with its domestic economy. These problems can be attributed to mismanagement, stagnant agricultural production, the already-tight supply of timber, coal, steel and electric power, and an inadequate labor force. Neglect of light industries has also led to shortages of processed food, clothing and other basic necessities.

Kim Il-Sung also may be having trouble with the campaign to designate his son, Kim Chong-Il, as his successor. The People's Republic of China has recognized the younger Kim's status but Soviet support is still being withheld. There are continuing signs that the support for Kim Chong-Il's ascendancy is also less than compiete inside North Korea.

Despite these economic and political developments, there has been no sign of a slackening of spending in the military sector. The North Koreans have an inordinately large and growing, offensively oriented military force with the capability to initiate a massive attack with little advanced warning.

The United Nations Command (UNC), organized in response to the UN Security Council Resolution of 7 July 1950, continues today to enforce the armistice agreement. Seven of the original 16 nations (Australia, Canada, New Zealand, Philippines, Thailand, United Kingdom, United States) remain accredited to the UNC and actively participate in its activities. The UNC provides, through the Military Armistice Commission (MAC) at Panmunjom, the only legitimate, internationally recognized channel of communication to North Korea. Through the MAC, the UNC has met the North Korean belligerence and their military buildup with forthcoming initiatives to reduce tensions and achieve a final peaceful settlement in Korea.

A year ago, following large North Korea exercises, the UNC proposed that both sides provide prior announcement of major military training exercises. We also invited the North Korean/Chinese MAC members to observe team spirit '82 and outlined the agenda of the exercise. The same offer was recently made for team spirit '83. We have taken other initiatives such as suggesting that a third party investigate armistice agreement violations, but have not yet received a positive response from the North Koreans to any proposal to reduce tensions.

The mission of integrating ROK and U.S. forces into a cohesive organization capable of fighting coalition warfare is the responsibility of the combined forces command (CFC). This headquarters, formed only five years ago, is manned by an equal number of ROK and U.S. military personnel from each of their respective services. CFC has over 650,000 soldiers, sailors, airmen, and marines under its peacetime operational control, and is the headquarters that will fight the war if deterrence fails. As commander-in-chief of CFC, it is my responsibility to provide a credible deterrence by maintaining a ready, fully capable force at all times. This is done through the integration of tactics and doctrine with emphasis on interoperability and complementarity of our combined effort.

We have taken positive steps in planning, equipping, and training our forces to execute an integrated air-land battle. These tactics will deny the North the ability to concentrate their numerically superior force at the place of their choosing on the battlefield. By looking deep into the battle area, with existing and planned intelligence gathering systems, we believe we can successfully attack his forces with airpower and other long range strike systems. By disrupting and slowing the enemy forces not yet engaged in the battle area, we can better control the fight at the line of contact and, at the appropriate time, seize the initiative.

Since airpower is so important in our defensive plans our qualitative edge over the North's air threat must extend beyond weapons systems. Training programs stress the interoperability of ROK and U.S. air operations—Korean and American pilots flying side by side. The recent activation of combined air-to-air and air-to-ground training ranges provides our crews with the experience needed to fight together in an integrated mode and win in tomorrow's sophisticated conflict. Pilots practice with the latest computer-scoring and display systems and attack realistic targets in an integrated high-threat environment.

Just as we are stressing joint and combined air and ground support in Korea, we are also improving the interoperability of air and naval forces. This effort counters Pyongyang's edge in total naval combatants. We have begun training exercises that will pay dividends in the protection of ROK coastlines from seaborne infiltration, and provide additional dividends by giving our pilots the necessary experience to support U.S. fleet operations in Korean waters.

Several command, control, communication and intelligence (C^3I) system improvements are underway and will be critical to our ability to fight and support combined coalition warfare. They include a hardened combat operations intelligence center at Osan Air Base, an automated data processing-assisted intelligence system, and two major programs to improve communications capability and interoperability. Efforts are underway to establish combined all-source intelligence centers (CASICS) throughout the ground component command at the field army level. These facilities perform collection management, analysis, production and dissemination of combined all-source intelligence information from both U.S. and Korean sources in support of combined operations. This crossflow of information is crucial to allow commanders to make force employment decisions based on total information of a rapidly changing tactical situation. Our combined air-land battle doctrine demands that commanders at all levels be able to see deep and attack deep, and these C^3I improvement programs are an essential element in realizing that capability in Korea.

Combined sustainability initiatives complement our readiness and modernization actions. The challenges are multi-faceted and include maintenance of overage equipment, shortage of petroleum and materiel storage areas, and a shortage of war reserve stocks for us and our ally. Programs are underway in each area to remedy these shortages for both countries and to improve our sustainability posture.

We have current shortages in our munitions stockage objectives for fighting the ground war. Some essential ammunition items are either not available or are available in extremely limited amounts. It is crucial to have sufficient, pre-stocked munitions because of the distance from CONUS support bases. Recent war reserve stocks for allies (WRSA) have improved our situation, and continued support will significantly reduce shortages.

The past year we concluded a memorandum of agreement that permits immediate transfer of up to $2 billion of on-hand WRSA stocks during certain military emergencies. By implementing this agreement, we have streamlined and quickened the procedures for the orderly transfer of WRSA assets in a time-critical situation.

A comprehensive program is also underway to correct deficiencies in petroleum stockage levels. A major U.S. and ROK program to improve, expand, and harden our POL storage capability is in progress. There is also a major effort underway to improve the survivability of the trans-Korean pipeline to insure that we can move POL from the port to the user.

There has been a commitment by the ROK Government to assist in the area of strategic lift. Signed agreements commit selected ROK flag air and sea assets to augment U.S. strategic lift during contingencies.

No improvements in readiness, interoperability and other warfighting capabilities are complete without evaluating them through realistic command post and field training exercises. We conduct five major annual exercises and practice the skills and tactics that would be required in an actual conflict. The largest of these, team spirit, a field training exercise, is now in progress. These events provide the training realism necessary for the maintenance of a fully ready force, and are clear demonstrations of U.S. resolve to support its Korean ally.

Turning to U.S. improvements, our ability to fight on the ground will be improved markedly by the 8th U.S. Army (EUSA) modernization program. During fiscal year 1982, EUSA fielded the new M198 155MM towed howitzer, AH-1S TOW Cobra and activated a military intelligence battalion in the 2d Infantry Division (2ID), our major combat unit. The EUSA modernization program includes plans for the introduction of 180 new equipment systems over the next few years, including counterfire radar, multiple launch rocket system, Viper, Blackhawk helicopter, improved TOW, M60A3 tank, Tacfire fire direction, and Divad gun. A key modernization effort will be the conversion of the 2ID mechanized and tank battalions to the new heavy "Division 86" design. Complementing this will be a modest programmed increase in military and civilian manpower. We still have a number of shortfalls and your continued support for our programs in fiscal year 1984 and the out-years is vital if we are to improve the combat effectiveness and readiness of EUSA.

The introduction of F-16 and A-10 aircraft to Korea during the past year has increased the qualitative edge over the numerically superior North Korean Air Force. We have also initiated a program to upgrade contingency airfields, principally at locations receiving U.S. Air Augmentation Squadrons. This action will improve force survivability and ensure our capability to sustain air operations. At the same time, we are working to revet or shelter all of our aircraft, but this is an expensive proposition and we will not be finished with this project for some years.

We are witnessing a reassertion of U.S. naval seapower in the Western Pacific and our plans reflect an increasing integration of this capability into our defensive strategy. Recent 7th Fleet initiatives have brought about an expanded awareness of the value of seapower, and we welcome improvements such as the addition of the Carl Vinson and the New Jersey to the Pacific. They will clearly enhance the ability of the U.S. Fleet to support the defense of the ROK.

Other U.S. Navy and Marine Corps initiatives promise greater flexibility in our concept of operations. I encourage support of efforts to improve the Westpac Amphibious Force. Anti-submarine surveillance provided by increased P-3 coverage in the Sea of Japan and the Navy's airborne mine countermeasures initiatives, foster increased confidence in our future capability for defense of the sea lines of communication upon which we in Korea are so dependent. The increased U.S. naval presence in the East Sea (Sea of Japan) has sent a clear signal to the North that the United States has the ability and resolve to apply whatever force is necessary in defense in the ROK as well as other U.S. interests in Northeast Asia.

Turning to the efforts of our ally, the ROK Government has embarked on a second 5-year force improvement plan (FIP-II). The FIP is the ROK military investment program, a portion of which is devoted to support of U.S. Forces through the combined defense improvement program (CDIP). During the past year, the program has resulted in improved armor and air defenses, continued aircraft coproduction and missile assembly, aircraft and radar purchases, and continued the building of frigate and high-speed naval craft. Current initiatives include a ROK Army reorganization which will add one battalion to each infantry regiment and upgrade tank companies to battalions. The net result will be an overall increase in maneuver and firepower capabilities. While this has provided substantial improvements to ROK Forces, it will not have significant near term impact on the force imbalance currently favoring North Korea.

It is clear the ROK Government is making a major effort for its own defense. Their CY83 defense budget is set at $4.4 billion, equating to 6 percent of their GNP and 32.8 percent of their national budget. Approximately one-third of their defense budget has been programmed to support their force improvement plan. They have asked the U.S. for a higher level of FMS credit loans during the fiscal year 1982–86 period to assist in funding this plan. Unfortunately, the amount actually provided by the United States last year was much less than what was anticipated and required. To keep their plan from falling behind schedule, your support is needed to fully fund the fiscal year 1984 FMS credit level for Korea proposed by the administration, and to provide the additional funds mentioned for fiscal year 1983. A lengthening of the repayment period and/or a reduced interest rate would also greatly assist their effort.

Some type of concession to assist their sagging defense industries also seems warranted. In response to the increased threat from the North, the prospect of a large U.S. troop withdrawal, and upon our encouragement, the ROK Government set a course in the 1970s to achieve self-reliance by building up their defense industries. They have succeeded admirably with U.S. technology and assistance and are now capable of producing a full line of defense products. However, they now have excess capacity in many plants which threatens the solvency of a number of companies. We should find ways to permit them to increase sales of military equipment to third countries within the current statutory regulations and without harming U.S. companies involved in the production of defense materiel. Moreover, in my opinion, it is in the best interest of the U.S. to assist the ROK Government in maintaining a warm production base on critical items which could be used to provide a surge capability in case of a conflict.

In a related area, we agreed to identify certain types of equipment for repair by Korean industry without degrading the U.S. industrial base. A substantial cost avoidance can be realized with a negligible impact on the U.S. depot workload and industrial base, by having the ROK defense industry perform maintenance on our equipment. For example, there is now a 5-year program underway to modernize and refurbish 496 M113 armored personnel carriers with an estimated cost avoidance of $16.6 million. Placing projects such as these in Korean industry, aids the ROK in maintaining a production base, enhances the sustainability of U.S.-made items in the event of a contingency, and improves the combat readiness of U.S. forces in Korea.

Let me stress again the value of CDIP to our defense effort. ROK Government support of U.S. forces sets an example that other allies may follow. I am confident their extensive support will continue to the maximum extent possible. ROK CDIP expenditures since 1980 have gone for such essential projects as petroleum distribution and storage, ammunition storage, command and control facilities and force stationing improvements. Construction of 1,085 family housing units has been completed, and these are being leased for U.S. personnel.

The development of ROK combat support/combat service support offsets to U.S. wartime shortfalls is one of the highest CDIP priorities. Overall, offsets obviate the need to deploy 39,700 U.S. support personnel. This equates to 255 C–141 personnel airlift sorties and sealift of 64,000 short tons of unit equipment and allows critically short strategic air and sealift resources to be allocated to other priority combat requirements.

Before concluding, it is important to highlight our quality-of-life actions. For years our personnel have lived and worked in conditions that are well below the minimum Department of Defense standards. A renovation/construction program is underway to overcome the deteriorated Korean War-era and older structures that house our people. Continued support for our quality-of-life programs is needed. These programs include the renovation of the make-do facilities that we have used for years and the replacement of older structures with new construction, all designed to bolster combat effectiveness and personal commitment.

In summary, I see nothing that leads me to believe the North will moderate their bellicose and belligerent attitude. On the contrary, the trends in their offensively oriented force modernization programs and exercises cause me continued concern.

To meet this threat, I need your continued support for the initiatives we have undertaken to improve our force structure, command, control and communication systems, sustainability, and quality-of-life programs. Similarly, your support of FMS levels and terms will permit the Republic of Korea to continue their substantial force modernizations efforts. I know of no other ally who so willingly shoulders its share of the burden of maintaining peace, and none which provides such support to our forward deployed forces.

The Korean War was never concluded by a peace treaty. Only an armistice agreement signed by the military commanders, and enforced by United Nations command, keeps the fragile peace along the DMZ today. The North has built, and continues to expand, a modern military force clearly capable of initiating a major attack on short notice. The quantitative, and in some cases, qualitative military edge the North enjoys continues to grow at an unfavorable rate. To insure peace and avoid the possibility of a grave miscalculation by the North, we must continue to send strong signals of our intention to maintain a ready deterrent force, and of our resolve to support the Republic of Korea under the terms of our security treaty.

I believe there is no greater payback on our own defense investment, in terms of maintaining peace and stability in an area critical to our national interest. That investment has deterred war in a critical region of the world for 30 years, and will continue to do so if the current rate and level of improvements for our Korean based military forces are maintained.

Finally, and most importantly, you can be justifiably pleased with the splendid soldiers, sailors, airmen, and marines manning their stations in and around Korea. They proudly, and without complaint, do a superb, tough, hazardous job in a country far from their own. On their behalf, permit me to thank you for your support.

Statement by the Secretary of Defense (Weinberger), Seoul, October 13, 1983 [5]

Homage to Korean Public Servants Killed on a Mission of Peace

We have paid homage today to brave and distinguished public servants who lost their lives on a mission of peace and international good will. [6] We came here also to affirm that we share the ideals which they represented so honorably and well, and to pledge the determination of the United States to stand resolutely with you in defense of these ideals. Because we are vital to each other's security, we have a mutually reinforcing alliance.

A Korean proverb refers to "thunder out of a clear sky." You, and we, have heard the thunder more than once in the recent past. But no tribulations, however unexpected or painful, can deter us from pursuing our shared objectives of peace and security for our peoples, prosperity, and friendship among nations. We will recall those objectives as we think of the fine men who died in their behalf. And we will continue to work with you, in a strong and enduring partnership, toward those noble goals.

Statement by the Department of State Acting Spokesman (Romberg), October 17, 1983 [7]

New Korean Cabinet

One announcement regarding the naming of a new Cabinet in Korea. We note the appointment on October 14 of a new Cabinet in the Republic of Korea. This Cabinet change came in the wake of the tragic assassination of several key Korean officials in the October 9 Rangoon terrorist attack. [8]

We have previously expressed our shock and sorrow concerning the Rangoon tragedy, and our own sense of loss over the deaths of the admirable public servants who lost their lives in that attack, men known to us both as professional colleagues and friends.

We wish to extend our best wishes to the new members of the Korean Government as they take up their heavy responsibilities. We have had the privilege of working with many of them in the past, and look forward to continued close cooperation in the future.

Korean Restraint Despite Provocations

Q. This is my once-in-a-lifetime opportunity. Thank you very much.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the timing of your visit to Korea couldn't be more timely and appropriate to witness the anger and sorrow of the Korean people. What significance do you give to your forthcoming visit to Korea?

THE PRESIDENT. Hopefully, to talk over any problems we may have, although they would be very few because of the strong relationship that we have there. Certainly, my visit was not planned with these tragedies in mind that have taken place. But the very fact that they have and the two great tragedies that have befallen your own country, the airplane massacre [10] and then the terrible deeds in Rangoon make it even more imperative that we continue to strengthen the bonds between our two countries. So, I'm looking forward to this trip.

President Chun visited us here and I'm happy to have the opportunity to make a return visit over there to—well, I guess it could be summed up in that I think it's important that people talk to each other instead of about each other.

Q. Last week, the Burmese Government announced officially that the North Koreans were fully responsible for the recent murder of 17 Korean Government officials and journalists. Yet the Government of Korea was very restrained in its response to this senseless provocation in Burma. America also has had a similar experience, terrorist acts, most recently in Beirut. [11] How, Mr. President, can we prevent such uncivilized acts in the future?

THE PRESIDENT. Let me say, first of all, that I admire your government's restraint under this extreme provocation. It's very easy and I know it's only human to want to strike out in retaliation. I had those same feelings about the tragedy in Beirut. But getting the people directly responsible and doing something to indicate that terrorism does have its punishment is a little different than just blindly striking out and that's why, as I say, I admire the restraint that your government has shown.

The main thing that we must do about terrorism, though, is show the terrorists that it doesn't work. We know that the terrorism against our own people in Beirut was designed to make us retreat, to make us say, "Well, we'll take our men out of there. We'll abandon the mission that they were sent to perform." We're going to prove to them that terrorist acts are not going to drive us away.

And, in the meantime, I think that all of us must recognize the savagery of those who are responsible for these things and, thus, make sure that we've taken every step we can for the protection of our people and our personnel.

And beyond that, we just have to, as we have an expression, "stay the course."

Q. Next question is about the Pacific Basin community evolution. A close cooperation among Pacific Basin nations is necessary to take a full advantage of the region's potential. In this context, President Chun of Korea has proposed a summit conference to discuss a closer cooperation. My question is: What future role is the United States playing in the Pacific region?

THE PRESIDENT. I think a very close role because the United States is a Pacific nation also. I was Governor of California for 8 years and I came to realize, with our 1,100-mile frontage on the Pacific Ocean, that we are a nation of the Pacific Basin. So, I foresee much greater and closer cooperation and relationship between the United States and the nations of East Asia and look forward to it because I think that is the new frontier in the world.

Q. Korea is among America's top ten—to be exact, ninth—trading partners in terms of trade volume. However, complaints of protectionism have been heard by both sides. Mr. President, how can we best ensure that our trading relationship grows and prospers without any friction?

THE PRESIDENT. I think, again, that this is one of the things to be talked about, because we know from history and experience that protectionism might have a short-term advantage. But in the long range, it destroys prosperity. It doesn't create it. And since we are such close trading partners—in fact, we import more from Korea than any other country in the world. And I think that, where there are friction points with regard to trade restrictions, tariffs or whatever, we must study every one of those and make sure that we do not drift into protectionism, but have the ultimate in free trade between us.

Q. Prior to your taking office, the withdrawal of American troops from Korea was proposed by a previous administration. I understand you have no plan either to reduce or withdraw American troops from Korea. My question is: Do you think, however, that one division of combat troops is enough in size to deter a North Korean attack?

THE PRESIDENT. Right now, yes. I believe that it is, and with the knowledge of other forces that we have within range. And part of that is because of the great development of the Republic of Korea's own military forces and the great progress that has been made there. At the same time, we continue to watch this. When it was advocated that we withdraw those troops, before I was President—just as a citizen and a candidate—I objected and disapproved of that suggestion. So, I think it is imperative that, while we see no need now for a change, we continue to observe closely. And if ever we feel the tensions have reached a point where that would be necessary that we augment those troops, that we do so.

We are allied with South Korea. We have been now—as a matter of fact, we're observing the 100th year of a relationship with your country. So I feel what is there is adequate mainly because of the strength of the Korean forces, themselves. Adequate now, but we'll do whatever is necessary.

Q. The Republic of Korea and the PRC, that's China, currently have no diplomatic relations. While the PRC continues to support North Korea, their attitude toward Korea considerably seems to have softened since the normalization of the diplomatic relation with the United States. My question is, what do you feel are the prospects for normal relations between the PRC and the Republic of Korea?

THE PRESIDENT. I would think that it would be stabilizing to the entire area and that, while care be exercised, both countries should seriously look at the possibilities and the prospects for a better relationship.

Q. You have visited [Korea] when you were Governor of California. What impression did you have about Korea and its people, sir?

THE PRESIDENT. From all that I have known of an earlier Korea and what I saw there on that visit made me think that I was living in the presence of a miracle. The great development of Korea, the modernization that had taken place, it was a thriving, energetic, industrial, and very productive society that I saw and I came away greatly impressed.

Q. In recent weeks, U.S. economy has shown a good sign of turn after the long recession. What is, Mr. President, your assessment for the outlook of the world's economy in the coming months?

THE PRESIDENT. I'm convinced that we are, here in our country, on the road to a solid recovery. We have brought inflation down to a fraction of what it was, we've cut our interest rates in half—we have much further to go in that—and our unemployment is dropping rapidly. As a matter of fact, just last month, our unemployment reached a point that in our most optimistic predictions, we had thought we wouldn't reach for another year or more, and I believe that the United States recovering that much can have an effect worldwide in the other countries where recession has prevailed. So that, I'm optimistic that we are on our way to a solid recovery and it will be worldwide.

Q. Thank you, Mr. President, and please have a nice trip.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much. I'm looking forward to it.

Address by President Reagan Before the South Korean National Assembly, Seoul, November 12, 1983 [12]

U.S. Support and Friendship for South Korea

Speaker Chae, Vice Speaker Yun, Vice Speaker Ko, distinguished Members of the National Assembly and honored guests, I'm privileged to be among such friends. I stand in your Assembly as Presidents Eisenhower and Johnson have stood before me. And I reaffirm, as they did, America's support and friendship for the Republic of Korea and its people. (Applause.)

Not long after the war on this peninsula, your President paid a visit to Washington. In his remarks at the state dinner, President Eisenhower spoke of the Korean people's courage, stamina and self-sacrifice. He spoke of America's pride in joining with the Korean people to prevent their enslavement by the North. In response, your first President expressed his country's deep, deep appreciation for what America had done. He concluded by saying, "I tell you, my friends, if I live hundreds of years, we will never be able to do enough to pay our debt of gratitude to you."

Well, I have come today to tell the people of this great nation: your debt has long been repaid; your loyalty, your friendship, your progress, your determination to build something better for your people has proven many times over the depth of your gratitude. In these days of turmoil and testing, the American people are very thankful for such a constant and devoted ally. Today, America is grateful to you. (Applause.)

And we have long been friends. Over a hundred years ago when American ships first approached Korea, our people knew almost nothing of each other. Yet, the first words from the kingdom of Chosun to the emissaries from America were words of welcome and hope. I would like to read part of that greeting to the Americans, because it tells much of the Korean people's character.

> "Of what country are you? Are you well after your journey of 10,000 (Lee) through winds and waves? Is it your plan to barter merchandise? Or do you, rather, wish to pass by to other places and to return to your native land? All under heaven are under one original nature. Clothes and hats are very different. And language is not the same. Yet, they can treat each other with mutual friendship. What your wish is, please make it known."

The journey from America is, now, swift. The winds and waves no longer endanger our way. But the rules of conduct which assist travelers are the same today as they were over a century ago, or even in ancient times. The weary are restored, the sick healed, the lost sheltered and returned safely to their way. This is so on all continents among civilized nations.

Our world is sadder today, because these ancient and honorable practices could not protect the lives of some recent travelers. Instead of offering assistance to a lost civilian airliner, the Soviet Union attacked. Instead of offering condolences, it issued denials. Instead of offering reassurances, it repeated its threats. Even in the search for our dead, the Soviet Union barred the way. This behavior chilled the entire world. The people of Korea and the United States shared a special grief and anger. My nation's prayers went out to the Korean families who lost loved ones even as we prayed for our own. May I ask you, today, to pause for a moment of silence for those who perished. Please join me in this tribute in which the spirit of our two peoples will be as one. Amen.

In recent weeks, our grief deepened. The despicable North Korean attack in Rangoon deprived us of trusted advisors and friends. So many of those who died had won admirers in America as they studied with us or guided us with their counsel. I personally recall the wisdom and composure of Foreign Minister Lee, with whom I met in Washington just a few short months ago. [13] To the families and countrymen of all those who were lost America expresses its deep sorrow.

We also pledge to work with your government and others in the international community to censure North Korea for its uncivilized behavior. (Applause.) Let every aggressor hear our words because Americans and Koreans speak with one voice. People who are free will not be slaves and freedom will not be lost in the Republic of Korea. (Applause.)

We in the United States have suffered a similar savage act of terrorism in recent weeks. Our Marines in Lebanon were murdered by madmen who cannot comprehend words like "reason" or "decency." They seek to destroy not only peace, but those who search for peace. We bear the pain of our losses just as you bear the pain of yours. As we share friendship, we also share grief.

I know citizens of both our countries as well as those of other nations do not understand the meaning of such tragedies. They wonder why there must be such hate. Of course, regrettably there is no easy answer. We can place greater value on our true friends and allies. We can stand more firmly by those principles that give us strength and guidance and we can remember that some attack us because we symbolize what they do not: Hope, promise, the future. Nothing exemplifies this better than the progress of Korea. Korea is proof that people's lives can be better. And I want my presence today to draw attention to a great contrast. I'm talking about the contrast between your economic miracle in the south and their economic failure in the north. (Applause.)

In the early years following World War II, the future of Korea, and of all Asia, was very much in doubt. Against the hopes of Korea and other new nations for prosperity and freedom stood the legacies of war, poverty and colonial rule.

In the background of this struggle, the great ideological issues of our era were heard: Would the future of the region be democratic or totalitarian? Communism, at that time, seemed to offer rapid industrialization. The notion that the people of the region should govern their own lives seemed to some an impractical and undue luxury. But Americans and the people of Korea shared a different vision of the future. (Applause.) Then North Korea burst across the border intent on destroying this country. We were a world weary of war, but we did not hesitate. The United States, as well as other nations of the world came to your aid against the aggression, and tens of thousands of Americans gave their lives in defense of freedom.

As heavy as this price was, the Korean people paid an even heavier one. Civilian deaths mounted to the hundreds of thousands. President Johnson said before this very assembly, "Who will ever know how many children starved? How many refugees lie in unmarked graves along the roads south? There is hardly a Korean family which did not lose a loved one in the assault from the North."

In 1951 in the midst of the war, General Douglas MacArthur addressed a joint session of our Congress. He spoke of you saying, "The magnificence of the courage and fortitude of the Korean people defies description." As he spoke those words, our Congress interrupted him with applause for you and your people. (Applause.)

After the war, Koreans displayed that same fortitude. Korea faced every conceivable difficulty. Cities were in ruins; millions were homeless and without jobs; factories were idle or destroyed; hunger was widespread; the transportation system was dismembered; and the economy was devastated as a result of all these plagues.

And what did the Korean people do? You rebuilt your lives, your families, your homes, your towns, your businesses, your country. And today the world speaks of the Korean economic miracle. The progress of the Korean economy is virtually without precedent. With few natural resources other than the intelligence and energy of your people, in one generation you have transformed this country from the devastation of war to the threshold of full development.

Per capita income has risen from about $80 in 1961 to more than 20 times—$1,700 today. Korea has become an industrial power, a major trading nation, and an economic model for developing nations throughout the world. (Applause.)

And you have earned the growing respect of the international community. This is recognized in your expanding role as host to numerous international events, including the 1986 Asian games and the 1988 Olympics. (Applause.)

Now as the years have passed, we know our vision was the proper one. North Korea is one of the most repressive societies on earth. It does not prosper, it arms. The rapid progress of your economy and the stagnation of the North has demonstrated perhaps more clearly here than anywhere else the value of a free economic system. Let the world look long and hard at both sides of the 38th Parallel, and then ask: "Which side enjoys a better life?"

The other side claims to be the wave of the future. Well, if that is true, why do they need barriers, troops, and bullets to keep their people in? The tide of history is a freedom tide, and communism cannot and will not hold it back. (Applause.)

The United States knows what you've accomplished here. In the 25 years following the war, America provided almost five and a half billion dollars in economic aid. Today, that amounts to less than six months' trade between us. That trade is virtually in balance. We are at once Korea's largest market and largest source of supplies. We're a leading source of the investment and technology needed to fuel further development. Korea is our ninth largest trading partner and our trade is growing.

Korea's rapid development benefited greatly from the free flow of trade which characterized the 1960's and 1970's. Today, in many countries, the call for protectionism is raised. I ask Korea to join with the United States in rejecting those protectionist pressures to ensure that the growth you have enjoyed is not endangered by a maze of restrictive practices. (Applause.)

And just as we work together toward prosperity, we work toward security. Let me make one thing very plain. You are not alone, people of Korea. America is your friend and we are with you. (Applause.) This year marks the 30th anniversary of the Mutual Defense treaty between the United States and the Republic of Korea. [14] The preamble to that treaty affirms the determination of our two countries to oppose aggression and to strengthen peace in the Pacific. We remain firmly committed to that treaty. We seek peace on the peninsula. (Applause.)

And that is why United States soldiers serve side by side with Korean soldiers along your demilitarized zone. They symbolize the United States' commitment to your security and the security of the region. The United States will stand resolutely by you, just as we stand with our allies in Europe and around the world. (Applause.)

In Korea, especially, we have learned the painful consequences of weakness. I am fully aware of the threats you face only a few miles from here. North Korea is waging a campaign of intimidation. Their country is on a war footing, with some 50 divisions and brigades and 750 combat aircraft. The North has dug tunnels under the demilitarized zone in their preparations for war. They are perched and primed for conflict. They attacked you in Rangoon, and yet, in spite of such constant threats from the North, you have progressed.

Our most heartfelt wish is that one day the vigil will no longer be needed. America shares your belief that confrontation between North and South is not inevitable. Even as we stand with you to resist aggression from the North, we will work with you to strengthen the peace on this peninsula. (Applause.)

Korea today remains the most firmly divided of the states whose division stemmed from World War II. Austrian unity was reestablished peacefully 10 years after the war. Germany remains divided, but some of the pain of that division has been eased by the Inner-German Agreement of a decade ago. I know the Korean people also long for reconciliation. We believe that it must be for the people of this peninsula to work toward that reconciliation and we applaud the efforts you've made to begin a dialogue. For our part, we would, as we've often stressed, be willing to participate in discussions with North Korea in any forum in which the Republic of Korea was equally represented. The essential way forward is through direct discussions between South and North.

Americans have watched with a mixture of sadness and joy your campaign to reunite families separated by war. We have followed the stories of sisters torn apart at the moment of their parents' deaths; of small children swept away in the tides of war; of people who have grown old not knowing whether their families live or have perished.

I have heard about the program that uses television to reunite families that have been torn apart. Today, I urge North Korea: It is time to participate in this television reunification program, and to allow your people to appear. (Applause.) I would say to them whatever your political differences with the South, what harm can be done by letting the innocent families from North and South know of their loved ones' health and welfare? Full reunification of families and peoples is a most basic human right.

Until that day arrives, the United States, like the Republic of Korea, accepts the existing reality of two Korean states and supports steps leading to improved relations among those states and their allies.

We have also joined with you over the past 2 years in proposing measures which, if accepted, would reduce the risk of miscalculation and the likelihood of violence on the peninsula. The proposals we have made, such as mutual notification and observation of military exercises, are similar to ones negotiated in Europe, and observed by NATO and the Warsaw Pact. These proposals are not intended to address fundamental political issues, but simply to make this heavily armed peninsula a safer place. For we must not forget that on the peninsula today there are several times more men under arms and vastly more firepower than in June of 1950. We will continue to support efforts to reduce tensions and the risks of war. (Applause.)

I have spoken of the need for vigilance and strength to deter aggression and preserve peace and economic progress. But there is another source of strength and it is well represented in this Assembly. The development of democratic political institutions is the surest means to build the national consensus that is the foundation of true security. (Applause.)

The United States realizes how difficult political development is when, even as we speak, a shell from the North could destroy this Assembly. My nation realizes the complexities of keeping a peace so that the economic miracle can continue to increase the standard of living of your people. The U.S. welcomes the goals that you have set for political development and increased respect for human rights for democratic practices. We welcome President Chun's farsighted plans for a constitutional transfer of power in 1988. Other measures for further development of Korean political life will be equally important and will have our warm support. (Applause.)

This will not be a simple process because of the ever-present threat from the North. But I wish to assure you once again of America's unwavering support and the high regard of democratic peoples everywhere as you take the bold and necessary steps toward political development.

Over 100 years ago you asked earlier American travellers to make their wishes known. I come today to you with our answer: Our wish is for peace and prosperity and freedom for an old and valued ally. (Applause.)

In Washington several weeks ago, a memorial service was held for those who had perished on Flight 007. During that service, a prayer was read. I would like to read you that prayer because it is a prayer for all mankind.

"O God . . .

Look with compassion on the whole human family;

Take away the arrogance and hatred which infect our hearts;

Break down the walls that separate us;

Unite us in bonds of love;

And work through our struggle and confusion to accomplish your purposes on earth;

That, in your good time, all nations and races may serve you in harmony. . . ."

That, too, is our wish and prayer. (Stay in peace.) (Applause.) Thank you and God bless you. (Applause.)

Remarks by President Reagan, Seoul, November 12, 1983 [15]

Democracy in Korea

Ladies and gentlemen, good evening. Nancy and I are honored to be so warmly greeted by your distinguished group.

We've come to Korea to demonstrate the deep and affectionate concern that the American people have for your country. Our hearts went out to you in the wake of the two murderous attacks on your citizens, and we came today to say that we'll continue to steadfastly stand by you. We hope our presence in your country will show the world our firm support for Korea.

Probably the most important contribution we can make here is to continue helping protect your national security. Our shared commitment to your defense is symbolized by the presence of American soldiers standing with Koreans along the demilitarized zone. This is the shield that enables you to pursue your bold economic and political objectives.

We also support your development of a democratic political system. As you know, the United States pays close attention to political developments in Korea, particularly those that are affecting democratic rights—a matter very important to Americans. We do this not because we believe our security commitment gives us a right to intervene in your internal affairs, but simply because such issues are at the center of our own political ideology and, we feel, are reflected, then, in our foreign policy.

But in approaching such internal matters, I believe it's important to adhere to the discipline of diplomacy, rather than indulging in public posturing. This has been the policy of our administration throughout the world. Where we feel strongly about a particular situation, we make our views known, often quite candidly, to the appropriate level of the government concerned.

I have faith in the Korean people's ability to find a political system meeting their democratic aspirations, even in the face of the heavy security challenge presented by the North. You have accomplished so much already in the face of that threat. Who would have predicted a mere 20 years ago that an impoverished Korea would become one of the world's legendary economic success legends?

This was a Korean accomplishment. Your friends offered help and guidance as these were needed, but they didn't seek to dictate your course. Political development may, in some respects, be a more difficult process, but it, too, is one in which you alone must control.

I respect and strongly support President Chun's pledge to turn over power constitutionally in 1988. This will be an invaluable political legacy to the Korean people. And I believe in the will and ability of the Korean people to develop the foundations required for viable democratic institutions. The shared democratic aspirations of our two peoples are important to our relationship, and continued progress toward the broadening of democracy in Korea strengthens the ties between our two countries. As you continue along this path of political evolution, you do so with our deep support, our affection, and our prayers.

And, again, we thank you from the bottom of our hearts for your warm and very gracious welcome from the first moment that we arrived here today. We are deeply grateful. God bless you.

Joint Statement Issued by the United States and South Korean Governments, Seoul, November 14, 1983 [16]

U.S.-Korean Relations

1. At the invitation of President Chun Doo Hwan, the President of the United States and Mrs. Ronald W. Reagan paid a state visit to the Republic of Korea from November 12 to 14, 1983. The two Presidents met at the Blue House on November 12 and again on November 13 for discussions of both bilateral and world affairs. The talks were held in a most cordial and open atmosphere.

President Reagan addressed the National Assembly, visited field installations of both the Korean and the United States Armed Forces, and also met with senior Korean officials, other Korean citizens, and a group of American businessmen.

2. President Chun expressed his appreciation to President Reagan for America's steadfast support in the wake of the tragedies which the people of Korea have endured so recently: the September 1 Soviet attack on a Korean civil airliner, and the October 9 North Korean terrorist attack in Burma which tragically claimed the lives of 17 innocent Koreans, among them many of the nation's most important leaders in economics, diplomacy, and politics.

Both Presidents noted the thorough and conclusive investigation by the Government of Burma of the Rangoon bomb atrocity, which has produced unequivocal evidence that the North Korean regime perpetrated this deliberate act of state terrorism. They agreed that such acts cannot be tolerated, and called for effective international sanctions against North Korea. President Reagan affirmed his admiration for the resolution and courage of the Korean people and their leaders in the face of these barbaric acts.

President Chun expressed his condolences to President Reagan and the American people on the tragic loss of life caused by the October 23 attack on the United States Marine Barracks in Beirut. President Chun and President Reagan joined in declaring the unswerving opposition of the Korean and American peoples to such acts of terrorism, and pledged continued efforts to remove the scourge of terrorism from the earth.

3. The two Heads of State exchanged views on a variety of international issues of mutual concern. President Reagan outlined United States determination to strengthen the defenses of the United States and its allies around the world, to bring about a reduction of tensions in volatile regions such as the Middle East, and to reach an agreement with the Soviet Union to reduce the global deployment of strategic weapons.

President Chun explained in detail the overall security situation on the Korean peninsula with particular reference to the continuing threat from North Korea, reflected in its military buildup and aggravated by its domestic problems.

Both Presidents reaffirmed the importance of maintaining deterrence and stability on the Korean peninsula, thereby ensuring peace there and in Northeast Asia, a region of critical strategic significance.

President Reagan stated that the United States would continue to fulfill its role and responsibilities as a Pacific power, dedicated to maintaining peace and stability in the region. President Chun avowed his full support for these efforts.

4. In particular, President Reagan, noting that the security of the Republic of Korea is pivotal to the peace and stability of Northeast Asia and in turn, vital to the security of the United States, reaffirmed the continuing strong commitment of the United States to the security of the Republic of Korea. The two Presidents pledged to uphold the obligations embodied in the Republic of Korea–United States Mutual Defense Treaty signed in 1953, noting the success of that alliance in deterring aggression for more than thirty years.

President Reagan stressed that the United States would continue to maintain United States forces in Korea and to strengthen their capabilities. President Chun reaffirmed his support for the presence in Korea of American military forces as part of the United Nations and Combined Forces Commands.

President Reagan noted that Korea spends six percent of its GNP on defense and further noted the efforts of the Republic of Korea to modernize and upgrade its defense capabilities. The two Presidents concurred that this program is essential if peace is to be maintained. President Reagan reconfirmed that the United States will continue to make available the weapons systems and technology necessary to enhance the strength of Korea's armed forces.

5. President Chun explained the Korean government's continuing efforts for the resumption of dialogue between South and North Korea and its policy for peaceful reunification with a view to easing tensions on the Korean peninsula, and achieving the Korean people's long-cherished aspiration for peaceful reunification. Expressing support of the United States for the sincere and patient efforts of the Republic of Korea, President Reagan especially noted President Chun's comprehensive Proposal for Democratic Reunification through National Reconciliation put forth on January 22, 1982.

President Reagan reconfirmed that the United States would not undertake talks with North Korea without full and equal participation of the Republic of Korea. The two Presidents reaffirmed that any unilateral steps toward North Korea which are not reciprocated toward the Republic of Korea by North Korea's principal allies would not be conducive to promoting stability or peace in the area.

6. President Reagan expressed his admiration and support for the expanding and increasingly active international diplomacy of the Republic of Korea, and took note of the determination of the Republic of Korea to pursue an open door policy of dialogue with all nations.

The two Presidents noted the significance of their respective nation's role as the hosts to important global gatherings and events, including the Los Angeles Olympics of 1984 and the Seoul Olympics of 1988. Both countries will abide by their commitments to admit representatives of all nations to participate in these international events.

7 Recognizing the growing importance of the Asia-Pacific region and also the growing sense of community among the Pacific rim countries, the two Presidents agreed that frequent exchanges at all levels among the nations of the Pacific are necessary to enhance regional cohesion. They also agreed that multilateral relations among the countries in the region should be further strengthened in the fields of trade, finance, science, technology, culture, and tourism.

8. The two Presidents expressed their belief that the Republic of Korea should be accepted in the United Nations pursuant to the principle of universality of the U.N. and that the entry of the Republic of Korea to the U.N. would contribute both to the reduction of tensions on the Korean peninsula and the maintenance of international peace. President Reagan promised continuing support for the entry of the Republic of Korea into the U.N.

9. The two Presidents affirmed the importance of defending and strengthening freedom and the institutions that serve freedom, openness, and political stability.

10. President Chun and President Reagan exchanged views on a range of economic issues. They noted the importance of ensuring that global economic recovery not be hindered by reversion to protectionism. In particular, President Reagan welcomed the trade liberalization measures being undertaken and planned by the Korean government, despite its continuing deficit in foreign trade and the global trend of protectionism. Both Presidents agreed that such steps are an example of the positive actions all trading nations must take to defend the world trade system against protectionist attacks and recognized an urgent need for concerted international efforts in this direction.

Both Presidents noted with satisfaction the continued expansion of bilateral trade, which totaled over $11 billion in 1982, making the Republic of Korea one of the United States' most important trading partners and fifth largest market for United States agricultural products, and the United States the Republic of Korea's largest trading partner in exports as well as imports. They agreed that this continued growth of bilateral trade attests to the vitality of U.S.-Korean economic relations.

President Chun also expressed his appreciation for President Reagan's strong commitment to free trade and hoped that the Republic of Korea's major export commodities will be given greater access to the United States market with the continuation of the Republic of Korea's eligibility for GSP benefits on a non-discriminatory basis. President Reagan took note of President Chun's views on these issues. In this regard, both Presidents recognized the necessity of coordinated actions by their respective governments to reduce various tariff and non-tariff barriers.

11. President Chun explained the recent efforts by the Korean government to create a more favorable environment for foreign investment in the Republic of Korea and invited the United States to take advantage of such improved opportunities. Both Presidents noted that a hospitable climate for foreign investors in both countries will continue to contribute to the flow of technology and to an expansion of employment opportunities in the Republic of Korea and the United States. Both Presidents also noted that the continued participation of American firms in the Republic of Korea's major development projects by providing competitively priced and high-quality goods and services is another indication of the strong and cooperative economic ties that link the Republic of Korea and the United States.

12. Presidents Chun and President Reagan discussed prospects for further broadening cooperation in the fields of technology and energy. They agreed to further promote programs for scientific and technological cooperation.

President Reagan assured President Chun that the United States will remain a reliable supplier of energy resources and energy technology, and in particular, that the United States will seek to assist the Republic of Korea to obtain stable energy supplies in the event of a security emergency. In this regard, President Reagan noted positively the Korean government's efforts to build up energy reserves for economic emergencies. President Chun expressed his appreciation for the United States' pledge, and the Republic of Korea's interest in the purchase and development of energy resources in the United States.

13. President Chun and President Reagan took note of the strong and myriad bonds of friendship and cooperation that have linked the United States and the Republic of Korea in the post-war era, and judged those ties to be in excellent condition. As one reflection of the expanding scope and importance of those relationships, President Reagan informed President Chun of the intention of the United States to establish in the near future a consulate in Pusan, Korea's second greatest city and a focal point of the U.S.-Korean economic intercourse. President Chun welcomed that decision.

President Chun and President Reagan pledged to carry forward the full range of security, political, economic, scientific and cultural meetings and consultations on our joint agenda, in order to maintain and deepen our already excellent relations in those diverse fields.

14. The two Presidents underscored the necessity for the promotion of mutual understanding and exchanges between the Korean and American peoples, and agreed to work toward expanded cultural and educational exchanges. The two Presidents expressed their satisfaction with the promotion of American studies in the Republic of Korea as well as of Korean studies in the United States.

15. President and Mrs. Reagan expressed their deep appreciation to President and Mrs. Chun for the warm welcome they received in the Republic of Korea, and their heartfelt thanks to the people of the Republic of Korea for the hospitality, graciousness and good will they had been shown.

The two Presidents agreed that exchanges of visits between the two Presidents have contributed to the further development of the existing friendly relations between the two countries. In that context, President Reagan asked President Chun to visit Washington again at a mutually convenient time, and President Chun accepted that invitation with appreciation.

Remarks by the Secretary of State (Shultz), Seoul, November 14, 1983 (Extract) [17]

U.S. Defense of South Korea

. . . . . .

MR. KALB. If we could switch to South Korea, Mr. Secretary, have there been assurances given, as reported here, that the United States will resort to nuclear retaliation if the Republic of Korea is attacked?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. No, that's not any way to put it. We certainly will stand with the South Koreans in the event of any attack and we have found both way back in the Korean War days and we find now that the deterrence we have here is very strong and powerful as it is.

MR. KALB. Briefly, are we planning to beef up the U.S. military strength in South Korea?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. We don't have any immediate plan to do that. On the other hand, we have forces nearby in Japan, in Okinawa, and in the event of some outbreak here, we could rapidly increase the size of our force.

MR. KALB. Do you see anything like that on the horizon?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. No, I don't.

Security Assistance for the Philippines

Mr. Chairman, again I thank you for this opportunity to offer comments from a defense perspective on the administration's foreign assistance requests—this time the requests for the Republic of the Philippines and the Republic of Indonesia. [2]

PHILIPPINES

In April 1983, the United States and the Philippines will begin the first bilateral review of the Military Bases Agreement (MBA) since the conclusion of the 1979 amendments [3] to the original 1947 agreement. [4] The FY 1984 request for military assistance represents the final year of the 5-year pledge given by President Carter at the conclusion of the 1979 negotiations. [5] The Philippines will look to us to honor our 1979 "best effort" security assistance pledge. The Philippines will evaluate the strength of the U.S.-Philippine mutual security relationship by our continued willingness to supply military assistance for its ongoing program for modernizing the Philippine Armed Forces.

The United States and the Philippines share a long and distinguished history of cooperation and mutual assistance. Philippine and American troops fought together to resist the Japanese invasion in 1941–1942 and to liberate the Archipelago in 1944–1945. Throughout the post-World War II era, the United States and the Philippines have maintained a comprehensive mutual security relationship under three formal agreements: the Military Bases Agreement (MBA) of 1947; the Mutual Defense Treaty (MDT) of 1952; [6] and the Mutual Defense Agreement of 1953. [7] As a result of these mutual security agreements, for more than 35 years the United States has been able to utilize the strategically important military facilities at Clark Air Base, Subic Naval Base, and elsewhere in the Philippines. These facilities allow us to protect the Western Pacific sea and air lanes, project U.S. power into the Indian Ocean and beyond, and fulfill our obligation to defend the Philippines under our 1952 Mutual Defense Treaty. Over the last several years the U.S. presence in the Philippines has assumed heightened importance because of the Soviet naval buildup which includes the use of military facilities at Danang and Cam Ranh Bay in Vietnam. Furthermore, the role played by the Soviet Union in the continuing Vietnamese occupation of Kampuchea has magnified ASEAN-wide interest in tangible indications that the United States will retain its presence in the Southeast Asian area.

Security assistance to the Philippines demonstrates continued U.S. concern for peace and stability in Asia. It contributes directly to regional stability by assisting the Philippines in meeting its defense needs and advancing toward its stated goal of military modernization at a time when the Philippines has been especially hard-hit by the world recession. Budgetary constraints have caused serious problems for the Armed Forces of the Philippines (AFP) in sustaining force and equipment levels and carrying out modernization programs. At the same time our security assistance program allows the Government of the Philippines (GOP) to devote more of its scarce resources to economic and social development. It also provides tangible evidence of the value the U.S. places on strong and lasting ties with this ally.

Regarding the proposed FY 1984 security assistance program for the Philippines, I want to concentrate upon International Military Education and Training (IMET) and Foreign Military Sales (FMS) financing.

IMET—$1.3 Million

The proposed program would place its heaviest emphasis on professional training for selected junior and mid-level officers. It would also provide operational training in a variety of fields including communication and electronics, maintenance, logistics, and administration. The IMET program promotes U.S. rapport with AFP, helps develop AFP training capabilities, provides better understanding of the United States and its political institutions and policies, and develops skills for the effective operation and maintenance of U.S.-procured equipment and for the management of the Philippine defense establishment.

FMS Financing—$50 Million

At present the Government of the Philippines has not made its final decisions concerning utilization of FMS credits; however, it has approached us for planning data on a variety of items needed to modernize its armed forces including fixed and rotary wing aircraft, patrol craft, ground vehicles, engineering equipment, communications gear, computer equipment, and other defense articles. Given the complexity of the task of modernizing the armed forces, Philippine authorities have been moving deliberately before committing scarce resources. We expect final decisions on FMS utilization in the near future.

In closing my remarks about the Philippines, Mr. Chairman, I would emphasize the combination of improved Philippine self-defense capabilities, which result in part from our military assistance, and our continuing unhampered use of the base facilities in the Philippines. By maintaining U.S. military assistance and continuing the U.S. military presence at Clark and Subic, the United States enhances its own national security interests in the Western Pacific and simultaneously serves the interests of its ally, the Republic of the Philippines.

Letter From President Reagan to Philippine President Marcos, May 31, 1983 [8]

"This Review Underlines the Close and Historic Ties Linking Our Two Countries and Further Strengthens the Peace and Security of the Western Pacific Region"

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I was pleased to learn that our representatives have completed the review of the Military Bases Agreement [9] which was agreed to during your state visit to the United States last year. [10]

In light of this development, I wish to state that the Executive Branch of the United States Government will, during the five fiscal years beginning on October 1, 1984, make its best efforts to obtain appropriation of security assistance for the Philippines in the following amounts:

Military Assistance	$125,000,000
Foreign Military Sales Credits	$300,000,000
Economic Support Fund Assistance	$475,000,000

In this connection the United States Government will seek to provide the Foreign Military Sales Credit on the basis of a grace period of ten years and a repayment period of twenty years. As you are aware, under our constitutional system, the Congress has sole authority to appropriate funds.

I was also pleased to note that the Military Bases Agreement review confirmed that the Agreement continues to meet our mutual needs and interests. I believe that this review has again underlined the close and historic ties linking our two countries and will contribute to further strengthening the peace and security of the western Pacific region.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN

Joint Statement by the Governments of the United States and the Republic of the Philippines, June 1, 1983 [11]

Summary of U.S.–Philippines Military Bases Agreement

The Governments of the United States and the Republic of the Philippines have completed the scheduled fifth anniversary review of the 1947 Military Bases Agreement as called for in the 1979 amendment. Ambassador of the Philippines to the United States, Benjamin T. Romualdez, and Ambassador of the United States to the Philippines, Michael H. Armacost, headed the two panels which, in a spirit of close and friendly cooperation, conducted discussions in Manila from April 11, 1983, to June 1, 1983.

Accordingly, a complete and thorough reassessment of the Military Bases Agreement and the manner of its implementation was accomplished to ensure that the agreement continues to serve the interests of both parties. The review resulted in the signing of a Memorandum of Agreement [12] between the two governments amending the Military Bases Agreement.

The Memorandum of Agreement contains provisions on:

A. Procedures for access of the Philippine Base Commander to the U.S. facilities and for the submission of information regarding U.S. force levels and their equipment and weapons systems in the Philippines;

B. The obligation of the U.S. Armed Forces personnel to respect Philippine law and to abstain from any political activity;

C. The U.S. pledge to cooperate with the Philippine Government in improving economic and social conditions in Angeles City and Olongapo City and surrounding areas;

D. The procurement of Philippine goods and services by the U.S. forces to the maximum extent feasible;

E. The modification of criminal jurisdiction arrangements in the event of war;

F. The review of the Base Labor Agreement within 6 months;

G. The withholding of income tax from Filipino employees working for the U.S. Armed Forces at U.S. facilities;

H. Procedures for securing exemption of U.S. Armed Forces personnel from Philippine travel tax and modification of automobile registration fees;

I. The establishment of a joint committee to facilitate more effective implementation of the Military Bases Agreement on a continuing basis. In addition, the joint committee will have the authority to review base areas that might be returned to the Philippines; study social, health, and other problems with a view to recommending programs and activities to improve conditions and enhance cordial relations between American personnel in the U.S. facilities and the surrounding Filipino communities; and address other topics relating to the implementation of the agreement.

The United States will allow the Armed Forces of the Philippines to procure fuel from the pipeline between Subic Bay Naval Base and Clark Air Base in accordance with existing U.S. procedures and policies regarding the acquisition of military items.

During the review, both parties took note of the importance of the Military Bases Agreement in serving the security interests of the United States and the Philippines and in furthering the strong traditional ties between the two countries. In the light of the satisfactory conclusion of the review of the Military Bases Agreement and with the view toward enhancing the Philippine contribution to regional peace and stability, President Reagan has conveyed in a letter to President Marcos the intent of the executive branch of the U.S. Government to make its best effort to obtain appropriations for the Philippines of $900 million in security assistance, including economic support funds. The appropriations, which are subject to U.S. congressional approval, will be sought over a 5-year period beginning in U.S. FY 1985 in the following amounts: grant economic support funds $475 million; foreign military sales credits $300 million; and grant military assistance $125 million.

Memorandum of Agreement Between the United States and the Republic of the Philippines, June 1, 1983 [13]

1983 Military Bases Agreement

The exchange of notes between the Government of the Philippines and the Government of the United States amending the Military Bases Agreement,[14] dated January 7, 1979, provides: "In every fifth anniversary year from the date of this modification and until the termination of the Military Bases Agreement, there shall be begun and completed a complete and thorough review and reassessment of the agreement, including its objectives, its provisions, its duration, and the manner of implementation, to assure that the agreement continues to serve the mutual interests of both parties."[15]

Accordingly, discussions between representatives of the Government of the Philippines and the Government of the United States were conducted in Manila from April 11, 1983, to June 1, 1983. Pursuant to the understanding reached during the review, the Government of the Philippines and the Government of the United States agree to the following:

I. Operational Use of the Bases

Within the context of Philippine sovereignty, the operational use of the bases for military combat operations other than those conducted in accordance with the Philippines-United States Mutual Defense Treaty and the Southeast Asia Collective Defense Treaty (Manila Pact),[16] or the establishment by the Government of the United States of long-range missiles in the bases, shall be the subject of prior consultation with the Government of the Republic of the Philippines, notwithstanding the provision of the 1979 amendment to the Military Bases Agreement assuring the United States of unhampered military operations involving its forces in the Philippines.

II. Access and Information

With a view to keeping the Government of the Philippines fully informed about the activities of the United States forces in the Philippines, the following shall be established:

(1) The Base Commander and his designated representative shall have access to all areas of the United States facilities except cryptographic areas and areas where classified equipment or information is located. Access to areas where classified equipment or information is located shall be in accordance with mutually agreed procedures.

(2) The Government of the United States shall, within a reasonable period, inform the Government of the Philippines of the current level of the United States forces permanently stationed in the Philippines, and their equipment and weapons systems. Thereafter, the United States Government shall notify the Government of the Philippines of any major change in United States forces permanently stationed in the Philippines, and major changes in their equipment and weapons systems.

III. Respect for Philippine Law

It is the duty of members of the United States forces, the civilian component, and their dependents, to respect the laws of the Republic of the Philippines and to abstain from any activity inconsistent with the spirit of the Military Bases Agreement and, in particular, from any political activity in the Philippines. The United States shall take all measures within its authority to ensure that this is done.

The appropriate authorities of the Government of the Philippines and the Government of the United States shall cooperate in taking such steps as are necessary to prevent abuse of importation privileges granted to the United States personnel and their dependents pursuant to the Military Bases Agreement.

In this connection, the two Governments wish to reaffirm existing arrangements established in the prior agreements which provide for cooperation between the United States Armed Forces and Philippine authorities.

IV. Economic and Social Improvement of Areas Surrounding the Bases

The Government of the United States reaffirms the statements made by Secretary of State Cyrus Vance in his letter of January 6, 1979, to Minister for Foreign Affairs Carlos P. Romulo to the effect that the two Governments shall take steps to promote suitable projects in the base Moreover, the United States Forces shall procure goods and services in the Philippines to the maximum extent feasible.

V. Criminal Jurisdiction

Paragraph 6 of the agreed official minutes regarding Article XIII of the Military Bases Agreement as revised by the Mendez-Blair agreement of August 10, 1965, [17] is amended to read:

"In the event of hostilities to which the provisions of Article V of the Mutual Defense Treaty apply, either the Government of the Philippines or the Government of the United States shall have the right, by giving sixty days notice to the other, to suspend the application of any provision of Article XIII of the Military Bases Agreement. If such notice is given, the two Governments shall immediately consult with a view to agreeing on suitable arrangements to replace the provisions suspended. Until new arrangements are concluded, the provisions of Article XIII shall continue to apply in full."

VI. Labor and Taxation

Representatives of the Government of the Philippines and the Government of the United States shall meet to discuss possible revisions of or alterations in the Agreement of May 27, 1968, [18] concerning the employment of Philippine nationals by the United States Forces in the Philippines in light of the critical contribution made by the Philippine national work force to the effective operation of the United States facilities and with a view to ensuring that labor relations involving the Philippine national work force remain harmonious and productive. These discussions shall begin within six months after the conclusion of the 1983 review of the Military Bases Agreement or on another date agreed upon. The discussions shall be conducted on the basis of the principles of equality of treatment, the right to organize and bargain collectively, and respect for the sovereignty of the Republic of the Philippines.

The Government of the United States shall make arrangements for the withholding, beginning October 1, 1983, of Philippine income tax from the salaries of Philippine nationals employed by the Armed Forces of the United States in connection with the construction, maintenance, and operation of the United States facilities, in accordance with applicable Philippine laws and regulations, except employees whose income is exempt from Philippine income taxation or who are members of the United States Armed Forces. The Government of the Philippines shall notify such employees of the United States that withholding has been initiated at the request of the Government of the Philippines and that the Government of the United States, in complying with that request, incurs no obligation with respect to any reduction in net compensation or payment which may result.

The Government of the Philippines shall adopt a simplified procedure to facilitate the travel of members of the United States Armed Forces, the civilian component, and their dependents, who shall continue to be exempt from the payment of the travel tax imposed under Presidential Decree No. 1183 of August 21, 1977.

With regard to automobiles imported into the Philippines under the Military Bases Agreement by members of the United States Armed Forces, the civilian component, and their dependents, charges imposed for the registration of those automobiles shall include only the actual registration and license plate fees.

VII. Joint Committee

A Military Bases Agreement Joint Committee shall be established as a means of consultation between the two Governments on matters regarding the implementation of the Military Bases Agreement which cannot be resolved between the Philippine Base Commander and the United States Facilities Commanders or any other matter regarding implementation of the Military Bases Agreement which either side wishes to bring before the Committee. The Military Bases Agreement Joint Committee will assume responsibility for matters relating to that agreement referred to in paragraph 4A of Annex A of the exchange of notes of May 15, 1958, establishing the Philippine-United States Mutual Defense Board. [19] In view of its special character and composition, the Criminal Jurisdiction Implementation Committee will remain as presently constituted.

The Military Bases Agreement Joint Committee shall be composed of a representative of the Government of the Philippines and a representative of the Government of the United States, each of whom shall have one or more deputies and staff. The Committee shall determine its own procedures and arrange for such auxiliary organs and administrative services as may be required. The Committee shall be so organized that it may meet at any time at the request of the representative of either Government.

If the military Bases Agreement Joint Committee is unable to resolve any matter, it shall refer that matter to the respective Governments for further consideration.

This agreement shall enter into force upon signature. In witness whereof, the undersigned, being duly authorized by their respective Governments, have signed this agreement.

Remarks by the Secretary of State (Shultz), Manila, June 25, 1983 [20]

The United States and the Philippines: A Very Special Relationship

President Marcos, Mrs. Marcos and all of those who you so graciously recognized at the beginning of your toast: You gave everybody an eloquent description of some of my various roles in life and I do recall I ran into one of the people I knew in Stanford who is sitting right down here. It reminds me when I went from the Government to business some years ago, I got asked a lot by students from Stanford, who said, "You've administered in business, what's the difference?" And I said, "Well, it's really very simple. I quickly learned when I went into business that you had to be very careful when you tell somebody who's working for you to do something because the chances were very high, he'd do it, whereas in government, you didn't have to worry, and in the university you weren't supposed to tell anybody to do anything in the first place." I had a longer answer, too.

But, Mr. President, I remember greeting you on the Monument Grounds when you came to Washington last September, you and Mrs. Marcos. I remember very well that visit in Washington and around the country, and I think throughout that visit you felt and you brought forth a warmth and enthusiasm from the American people for you and the people of the Philippines. I felt that warmth here when I arrived and Mrs. Marcos was so gracious to meet me and in this talk that we've had in this luncheon and these wonderful, talented young people who entertained us here. I might say it's the first time I've ever seen a fashion show. I hope it isn't the last. But it was a warm and wonderful performance and it does show the touch that there is between the people of the Philippines and the people of the United States.

I thought you might just dwell for a moment on what it is that accounts for this very special relationship. I think it is first of all a question of people who for decades have worked together, fought together, laughed together, and cried together. My wife sits beside you. She fought beside you when she returned with General MacArthur to the Philippines. There are close to 1 million American citizens who are of Filipino heritage. There is an extensive two-way traffic of people so that we see each other frequently and I think that in part accounts for this relationship.

We talked a bit earlier today about economic matters and, of course, there is a very considerable commercial relationship between our countries. I think the two-way trade more or less comes to about $4 billion in a year. The amount of U.S. investment in the Philippines is on the order of a billion and a half dollars. So these are very large sums and they represent a very considerable economic relationship. You were kind enough earlier to refer to a talk that I made a month or so ago having to do with the so-called North-South issues.[21] In that talk, you remarked that in so far as our economies are concerned, we are all in one boat, and we sail together and we have a stake together in how that boat operates. I think that we can take some comfort from the fact that there does seem to be a rise now in the tide of the world economy and it will help us all as our trade expands and, of course, it will help our whole set of financial problems.

I can't help but call attention to the courageous moves that you have taken, President Marcos, here recently. It seems to me that those moves and with the rise in the world economy that we're seeing, we're bound to see a very healthy Philippine economy as well as our own.

I might say that when we fought together, we fought in defense of freedom and democracy. Those are values that are cherished by both our peoples and we must continue to defend those values when they are challenged and work to promote and strengthen the institutions that embody them. So I welcome this opportunity to visit just after the successful conclusion of the review of our military bases agreement because it stands for the security element of our relationship and represents a further strengthening of military cooperation that goes back over 40 years. It has served our countries well and I think we can say that is has added stability to this region. We must also say that the framework of our relationship is a large one. It is not simply two countries that have a bilateral relationship but we share concern for this region and the setting of the ASEAN countries and I support, the President supports, the United States supports the efforts which you and the other ASEAN countries have been making to see if we can't give the country of Kampuchea back to its own residents and free them from the indignity of foreign occupation.

As I raise my glass to you, Mr. President, let me propose a toast: to your continued good health, to the preservation of friendship between our two countries, and to the success of our diplomats in their endeavor to bring peace to southeast Asia. To President Marcos and Mrs. Marcos.

Prepared Statement by the Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs (Wolfowitz) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, July 17, 1983[22]

U.S.-Philippine Relations and the Military Bases Agreement Review

I am pleased to address today our overall relations with the Philippines, and the recently concluded 5-year review of our 1947 Military Bases Agreement. This review, completed in the relatively short period of 7 weeks, reflects the excellent state of our bilateral relations, and the important role Subic Bay Naval Base and Clark Air Base play in furthering our mutual security interests.

The Long Term Bilateral Relationship

The close ties between the United States and the Philippines span the twentieth century. It is a long and deep relationship. The United States influence in the Philippines has been a strong and positive one. And our own culture and society have been enriched in turn by our relationship with the Philippines and by the presence of the roughly 1,000,000 Filipino-Americans and Filipinos who live in the United States. Our longstanding economic ties are healthy also. The United States is still the largest market for Philippine goods, and the primary source of its foreign investment.

In addition to these shared personal and economic interests, our countries have been partners for decades in the effort to promote our common interest in regional stability and security. We were comrades-in-arms during World War II, and we have continued a close security partnership after the Philippines became independent in 1946. The treaty covering our bases dates back to 1947, our Mutual Defense Treaty to 1952.

The Role of the U.S. Military Presence

U.S. military forces in the Philippines are evidence of our abiding commitment to the Philippines under our Mutual Defense Treaty. This security relationship is in turn a key element of our policies toward Southeast Asia, which have contributed significantly to the peace, security and remarkable economic growth and political stability of the entire region.

Our facilities at Subic Bay and Clark Air Field play a crucial role in furthering our efforts:

—to provide an effective counterbalance in the area to the growing military power of the Soviet Union and its surrogates;

—to support our treaty commitments in East Asia;

—to support ASEAN and strengthen U.S. ties to ASEAN countries;

—to protect the sea and air lanes in and around an area that occupies an important place in world trade; and —to provide the logistic support for U.S. forces in the Indian Ocean and Southwest Asia that help to maintain peace and stability and to protect vital interests of the United States—and of U.S. allies—in that important part of the world.

As President Marcos stated recently, all the countries in the region friendly to the United States approve of U.S. naval and air facilities in the Philippines, because they ensure the balance of power in Southeast Asia. A U.S. military withdrawal would only benefit those who wish to fill the resultant power vacuum.

Political Situation in the Philippines

Both teams of negotiators were well aware of these benefits as we entered the recent review of our bases agreement. But security factors were not the only concerns on our agenda.

Major military facilities, such as those we have in the Philippines, can only be effectively operated with the support of the host country's government and people. Maintaining needed support and warm relations between our countries, through due regard for Philippine sensitivities, was thus a major concern in our discussions on basing arrangements. Unfortunately, some criticism of the U.S. military presence has been an ingredient of Philippine politics for many years. In gauging the extent of such opposition, however, it is worth noting that, despite the considerable public scrutiny recently focused on the bases, our continued role does not appear to have been a major matter of contention. We believe the support we have enjoyed through various Philippine governments since WW II will continue.

Given our long-term security relationship with the Philippines, we also pay close attention to other domestic political developments, including human rights issues. The ending of martial law in 1981 brought with it some improvements in the civil liberties situation. However, progress has been uneven. In recent months the Marcos government has again introduced constraints. Controls on public assembly and the press have been eased, although at times controls on the press were reasserted. For example, the leading opposition newspaper was shut down, but another opposition newspaper recently started publishing. There is criticism of the government and of government policies in the media, but it is subdued. One respected moderate opposition leader, the mayor of a large city in Mindanao, has been jailed. On balance, however, it is fair to say that in some respects the situation is improved over 1978, when we last discussed our military presence with the Philippine Government.

The increase in armed insurgent actions, however, has caused a serious problem of military excesses against civilians. The government knows that this is a problem, and has attempted to remedy it, but so far with little success. Recently, however, in the first action of its kind, two high ranking officers were convicted of abuses.

Human rights and church groups regularly bring these problems to the government's attention. The Catholic Church's recent pastoral letter on this and other problems was met with a declaration of the government's intent to engage in dialogue.

The United States, for its part, welcomes any efforts on the part of the government and concerned groups of Filipinos to address their problems through dialogue. We look toward the scheduled parliamentary elections in 1984, in which it is our expectation that all legitimate groups will have a fair chance to participate. These elections promise significant progress toward a more open political system. Meanwhile, we will continue to deal with human rights issues and problems in the Philippines through a policy of quiet dialogue with the government and extensive contact with a wide spectrum of Philippine society, including the legitimate opposition. This active policy is a fundamental part of our overall approach in the Philippines.

Terms of the 1983 MBA Review

Against this background of concerns, we conducted the recent 5-year review of the MBA. The key U.S. objectives were to enhance our two nations' mutual security; to ensure the continuation of unhampered use of the U.S. facilities, consistent with the respect due to Philippine sovereignty; and to facilitate resolution of practical problems—all with an eye to limited U.S. resources. I am pleased to report that we were able to accomplish these objectives. For its part, the Philippine Government stressed as did we its continuing sovereignty over the U.S. facilities.

While maintaining the essential structure of our current agreement, the review resulted in a series of new procedures and administrative arrangements to deal with the practical problems which inevitably arise in a close bilateral undertaking of this sort. The most important new provision is the establishment of a joint committee, similar to the ones we have with Japan and Korea, to facilitate implementation of the MBA. In addition, other noteworthy points included:

—Procedures for access of the Philippine Base Commander to the U.S. facilities.

—Procedures for the submission of information on U.S. force levels and their equipment and weapons systems.

—Procedures for securing exemption of U.S. Armed Forces personnel from Philippine travel tax and modification of automobile registration fees.

At the conclusion of the review, President Reagan transmitted a letter to President Marcos conveying the pledge of the executive branch to make its best efforts to provide $900 million in security assistance during the 5 fiscal years beginning October 1, 1984. The figure of $900 million was reached after consideration of the Philippine Government's economic development needs, its defense modernization goals, our current assistance efforts in the Philippines, and the decline in the real purchasing power of our assistance levels since the time of the last base review in 1979. Subject to the authorization and appropriation of funds by the Congress, the intention of the executive branch is to provide more than half of the package, $475,000,000, in Economic Support Funds. We shall soon begin planning with the Philippine Government on ESF projects and programs. These will be submitted to the Congress for approval during the normal budgetary process. We expect that some of the funds will be used to improve the social and economic conditions of areas adjacent to the bases, while most of the funds will be used on a nationwide basis in support of Philippine economic development priorities.

The rest of the proposed 5-year security assistance is military: $125,000,000 in MAP and $300,000,000 in Foreign Military Sales Credit guarantees. This assistance would enable the Philippine military to begin to address seriously its modernization efforts, which in recent years have been affected adversely by Philippine Government budgetary constraints. We are committed to request the Congress for FMS credits having a 10-year grace period, and repayment over 20 years. Although we have not discussed specific Philippine military needs in connection with this assistance package, we would expect it, on the basis of past practice, to be used to purchase aircraft, helicopters, ground vehicles, engineering equipment, surface vessels, communications equipment and other defense articles.

To summarize, Mr. Chairman, the U.S.-Philippine relationship has over the years benefited the Philippines, the entire Southeast Asian region, and—by no means least—ourselves. We can take great pride in the contributions we have made to the area, and the positive role we have played. I would hope that we will continue to be an active player in this important part of the world for a long time to come. That is also the wish of leaders and people of the Philippines and of the peace-loving countries of the entire region.

Statement Issued by the Department of State, August 21, 1983 [23]

The Death of Senator Benigno S. Aquino

The murder of Senator Benigno S. Aquino, Jr. [24] in Manila on August 21 is a cowardly and despicable act which the U.S. Government condemns in the strongest possible terms. The U.S. Government trusts that the Government of the Philippines will swiftly and vigorously track down the perpetrators of this political assassination, bring them to justice, and punish them to the fullest extent of the law. We extend our condolences to Senator Aquino's wife and children in Massachusetts and to his family, friends, and supporters in the Philippines.

Aquino Assassination

. . . . . .

Q. Can you tell us about the Philippines, and what it is that you can share with us?

A. We really don't have anything significantly new that hasn't already been reported in the various media reports from Manila. We still don't know the identity of the dead gunman who was dressed in the garb of an airport mechanic.

Our Embassy in Manila has been in close touch with all of the appropriate Philippine Government authorities on this political assassination. The Embassy will continue to maintain close contact with the Philippine Government. As we stated yesterday, we expect their investigation to be as objective and thorough as possible.

I might note that Embassy reporting indicates that the report alleging that Mr. Aquino was killed by shots from several security personnel using rifles is erroneous, and most likely the result of confused impressions from passengers who were inside the plane.

Q. How can you say with such certainty that those reports are erroneous?

A. Again, I'm basing this on the Embassy reporting. I don't know specifically what information they had, but that is what our information is.

[24] Benigno S. Aquino, Jr. was the principal leader of the democratic opposition to the Marcos regime. Following a 3-year, self-imposed exile in the United States, on August 21, 1983, Aquino returned to the Philippines and was shot to death in a Manila airport as he was stepping off the plane.

[25] Source: Office of Press Relations, Department of State. Alan Romberg, Department of State Acting Spokesman, conducted the briefing which began at 12:20 p.m.

Q. Meaning that you believe that Marcos has no responsibility for the killing at all?

A. I prefer to stick with what I've said. I'm not suggesting otherwise, but it's a little early to talk about specifically what happened. As I say, our reporting from our Embassy, which has looked into this and has been in touch with various people, indicates that the reports which were in the news yesterday that the security guards, several security guards shot Mr. Aquino, that reporting seems to be erroneous. I can only share with you what I've got. I don't think that I can really go beyond that. I think you have the text of what we said yesterday, [26] so I don't need to repeat it.

Q. Were you aware of threats to his life?

A. I think Mr. Aquino talked about being aware of threats to his life.

Q. Did you have any independent view?

A. I'm not going to go into what information we may or may not have had. The point is, that was hardly something that he was unaware of.

Q. Were there contacts between the Government of the United States and Mr. Aquino immediately before or in the weeks before his departure for his homeland?

A. I don't know whether there were contacts at that point. He certainly has been around quite a bit.

Q. Do you know whether the U.S. Government tried to dissuade him from returning to the Philippines?

A. I don't know the answer to that.

Q. Two related questions. First of all, does the Administration have any plans to send any kind of a delegation there either to involve itself in the investigation or to assist in the investigation in the Philippines, or is there any coordination of investigating with authorities here in the United States, perhaps dealing with events immediately prior to his departure?

A. I think it's premature to talk about what might happen as an investigation unfolds. I'm not aware of any plans at this point to send anybody. We indicated yesterday that we trusted that the Government of the Philippines would swiftly and vigorously track down the perpetrators of this political assassination, and bring them to justice and punish them.

I would note that President Marcos has stated that all the resources and powers of his government will be employed in the quickest possible time to find the perpetrators.

Q. Does your government put great trust in that statement?

A. We have expressed our feeling that, our trust that, that will be done; the President has said it will be done.

. . . . . .

Q. What is the status of the President's trip? Does he still plan to go to the Philippines? [27]

A. I think that the White House indicated yesterday that there's no current plan to change that trip.

Q. And also, can you tell us what sort of contacts the U.S. Government has had with the Philippines Government? Is our Ambassador there?

A. Yes, he is. I'm sorry.

Q. Has our Ambassador in the Philippines spoken to officials of the Philippine Government? What sort of contact has there been?

A. I can't detail it for you. As I said before, there has been communication with various parts of the Government of the Philippines, but I cannot detail it. I don't have that kind of detail. Ambassador Armacost is there, and certainly is actively attending to this.

Q. But obviously you have said that we expect a fair and impartial investigation. Surely, that is part of what has been passed on; we don't just make public statements like that, do we? We also tell them privately that that's our desire?

[26] See supra.

[27] The President planned to visit Indonesia, Japan, Korea, the Philippines, and Thailand in early November 1983.

A. I guess that you put me in a position where I have to say we don't get into the details of our diplomatic exchanges. Our views on this subject are contained in our statement of yesterday and what I've said today.

I think it's fair to assume that the Government of the Philippines knows what our views are, but I just don't want to get into the exchanges.

. . . . . .

Q. Two Philippine-related questions, please. Is our government concerned that this assassination is going to fuel the insurgency that Mr. Marcos has said has been the reason for his continued, very strong authoritative rule?

A. I don't have a view to offer you on that.

Q. The opposition, the moderate opposition of the Philippines has seemed to have been coalescing in an anti-U.S. base philosophy. It's been getting harder and harder in the last year.

Is there concern on the part of our government that the assassination will fuel that?

A. Again, I don't have anything to offer you in a way of that sort of assessment today.

. . . . . .

A. Again, I don't have that information, and I think it probably gets us back into the area of communications between the governments which we are reluctant to comment on.

Again, as I answered Roberto before, Mr. Aquino certainly was talking about, aware of threats on his life and the fact that such threats existed was hardly a secret.

Q. The point is, did the U.S. Government know about these plots, and did the U.S. Government pass this information on by way of confirmation to Aquino before he left?

A. I'm not going to get into the kinds of conversations we may have had. The fact that there were reports of threats was well known to Mr. Aquino, and he talked about it to the press. I'm not sure what our conversations with him particularly would contribute—in talking about that here—would contribute to that. He knew he was going back to a situation in which people had talked about threats to his life. I think that's—in terms of judging his return—that's the salient point.

Q. It would help to understand whether the U.S. Government tried to dissuade him from going back.

A. I understand, but I think that it is not—I will check and see if anybody wants to talk further about those conversations, but I'm rather doubtful that I could get anything further for you on that.

Q. Is the information that you passed on to us before, in a flat-out statement that the reports were erroneous, and that comes from the Embassy, the Embassy talked to Philippine officials; is that where that information comes from? You're basing it all on what they told you?

A. I'm basing it on what the Embassy reported. As I indicated before, I do not have the backup to their judgment as reported to us.

Prepared Statement by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs (Monjo) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, September 13, 1983 [29]

U.S.-Philippine Relations After the Aquino Assassination

I am pleased to address today the situation in the Philippines and the state of U.S.-Philippine relations following the assassination of Senator and opposition leader Benigno S. Aquino, Jr. in Manila on August 21 which has shocked the American people as it has Filipinos of all political persuasions. I realize, of course, Mr. Chairman, that you were personally acquainted with Mr. Aquino and returned to Manila after the assassination to express condolences to his family.

I intend to cover today the assassination and its impact on public opinion, the investigation, U.S. policy in the wake of the assassination, the President's planned visit to the Philippines in November, the stability of the Marcos Government, the U.S. military facilities and the economic situation. I will be joined by Mr. James Kelly, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, who will deal with military aspects of your questions.

No discussion of the Philippines and U.S.-Philippine relations can begin without reference to the unique, long-term bilateral relationship of our two countries. It is vital that we underline the need for a policy that looks to the long-term in our relationship. Close ties between the U.S. and the Philippines go back to the turn of the century, and those ties include the shared suffering of World War II as well as that exhilarating moment of Philippine independence on July 4, 1946. Strong bilateral economic relations that still exist are a key element—the U.S. is still both the primary source of foreign investment in the Philippines and the largest market for Philippine goods. Both the U.S. Government and the private sector have played an important role in the economic development of the Philippines.

Perhaps because of our shared history, the United States and the Philippines have tended to view international security and political problems and issues in much the same way. In good times and bad the Philippines has often stood by our side. A key element in our bilateral relationship has been our common interest in security and regional stability, as manifested in our 1947 Military Bases Agreement, our 1952 Mutual Defense Treaty, and continuing close cooperation in defense and security matters. Just recently we rapidly and amicably concluded a review of our Military Base Agreement. The two military facilities in the Philippines fulfill a vital function in maintaining regional security and stability—a role that has been noted positively by virtually all of the countries of East Asia—and that stability in turn contributes to the remarkable economic growth of the entire area.

Another essential element of the relationship, of course, is people: those American teachers and government officials who introduced English and new institutions in the early days, the comrades in arms in World War II, those members of Philippine governments from President Roxas to President Marcos with whom a series of U.S. administrations, both Republican and Democratic, have dealt ami-

This report said that the sending of a new Philippine defense attaché team to the Philippine Embassy in the United States would "undoubtedly report on and possibly operate against anti-Marcos Philippine activists in the United States." cably and productively over the years, the 1,000,000 or so Filipino Americans and Filipinos who live in the U.S. today and enrich our culture and society. Until last August that number included Senator Benigno Aquino, who three years earlier was released from a Philippine military prison for a heart operation in the United States, and his family.

THE ASSASSINATION

The Aquino assassination has rocked the Philippines. It was a tragic event that has beclouded the reputation of the Philippine Government. Many Filipinos, and not all of them opposed to the current government, suspect the complicity of elements of the Government in the crime. It raises very disturbing questions that demand answers. It puts into grave doubt the competence of the airport security forces, who themselves are suspect of at best gross negligence in their duties. We do not have the answers to those questions yet. As we have stated, we look to the Government of the Philippines to provide them.

This is a matter, first and foremost, that concerns the Philippine Government and the Philippine people. But the United States Government has made clear to the Government of the Philippines both publicly and privately that, in view of our close relationship, the United States also has and continues to have the deepest concern over the assassination of Senator Aquino. We fully expect the Philippine Government to act swiftly and vigorously to track down the perpetrators of this crime, as President Marcos promised in his statement on the day of the murder.

At this point we still know very little about the assassination that is not already a matter of public record. Not enough evidence has yet been found to substantiate or to rule out any of the several possible explanations which have been mentioned so far. The circumstances of the murder and the identity of the alleged assassin, whom the GOP describes as "a notorious killer, a gun for hire," make us doubt that one man alone could have been responsible for this clearly political assassination.

THE INVESTIGATION

The United States welcomed the idea of naming a high level panel to investigate the assassination. The members of the Commission as it is presently constituted, headed by the current Chief Justice, are former members of the Philippine Supreme Court. Opposition leaders and others have expressed concern that certain of the members are too closely identified with the Government.

Despite the international interest in the investigation, it will necessarily be a domestic Philippine matter which the Philippine authorities must carry out to its conclusion. The Commission, of course, must be judged ultimately by its work. It is clearly too early now to make any judgements when the investigation has barely begun.

U.S. participation in the investigation has been limited to the FBI providing, in response to a Philippine request, technical assistance in tracing the alleged murder weapon and in a fingerprint check. For our part, we have not offered any other assistance.

THE ASSASSINATION AND U.S. POLICY

In the public statement issued on the day of the assassination, the U.S. Government went on record in denouncing the assassination as a "cowardly and despicable act which the United States Government condemns in the strongest terms." We stated that "the United States Government trusts that the Government of the Philippines will swiftly and vigorously track down the perpetrators of this political assassination, bring them to justice, and punish them to the fullest extent of the law." We also expressed our condolences to Senator Aquino's wife and children and to his family, friends, and supporters in the Philippines. Ambassador Armacost represented the United States at the funeral.

The United States is closely following the investigation of the Philippine authorities. We have asked the Philippine Government to keep us informed as the investigation, which has just begun, develops. To supplement our public statements, we have privately told senior officials of the Philippine Government of our strong concern that the investigation be thorough and impartial. The Philippine Government has reacted positively to this expression of U.S. interest.

Other aspects of our bilateral relationship are continuing. There are several economic and trade problems that need attention. We are also moving ahead with the Philippine Government to implement provisions of our recently concluded review of the Military Bases Agreement.

The Aquino assassination does not appear to have changed pre-existing Philippine attitudes about the United States military presence in the Philippines or about our economic and security assistance programs. There were no anti-American manifestations during the funeral or when hundreds of thousands of mourners accompanied the Aquino cortege right past the Embassy. Our Embassy in Manila is also in touch with broad elements of the Philippine body politic in an effort to keep abreast of developments and to make our views known.

Following the assassination much media attention has been directed to the President's planned visit to the Philippines, a stop on his trip to East Asia, this November. The White House responds to all questions about the President's travel. What I can say to you at this time is that there are no current plans to change the President's announced itinerary. Naturally any new developments would be carefully weighed.

STABILITY AND ELECTIONS

With the assassination of Senator Aquino, the opposition has lost its most charismatic leader. Senator Aquino had hoped to return home to persuade the Marcos Government and his fellow members of the opposition to find electoral solutions to the Philippines' political problems. Now that Senator Aquino is gone, the leaders of the moderate opposition must decide what they will do. The Marcos Government, for its part, will also have to decide on how to deal with the new political situation as it prepares for the 1984 parliamentary election.

We cannot foretell how the political events will play out. For our part, we hope that both the government and the moderate opposition will deal with this new political reality in a way that contributes to political stability, the strengthening of democratic institutions, and respect for human rights. In this regard it is more important than ever that the May 1984 parliamentary election be one in which the legitimate opposition will have a free and fair opportunity to participate. If the ground rules for the election permit the legitimate opposition to participate, then it could be the most significant electoral exercise in the Philippines since the declaration of martial law in 1972.

Elections widely seen as fair and equitable can contribute significantly to stability and the avoidance of political polarization. It is no accident that the communists, and their armed force, the New Peoples' Army, do not want such elections, just as they are the ones who gain the most from the political turmoil caused by the Aquino assassination. Some moderate members of the opposition, frustrated by the murder, could become more willing to throw in their political lot with the extreme left in their desire to bring about political change. The manner in which the Philippine Government and the moderate opposition leaders ultimately respond to the new political reality and, in particular, how they will deal with the 1984 election, will go a long way toward determining whether political polarization will, in fact, take place.

U.S. MILITARY FACILITIES AND PHILIPPINE POLITICS

Over the years, the presence of U.S. military facilities and how best to deal with the United States on bases issues have been an integral part of Philippine political life. Some Philippine nationalists have traditionally viewed the bases as remnants of the colonial past. Others have taken ambivalent stands on the bases, which, with the Mutual Defense Treaty, have constituted the country's guarantee against foreign attack since independence in 1946. All administrations in the Philippines have favored the presence of the bases, while their political opponents have tended to be critical of the incumbents' handling of the bases issue.

We fully understand that our vital military facilities in the Philippines—as such facilities in other countries—cannot be effectively operated without at least the tacit support of the host government and the host peoples. Fortunately, we believe that the U.S. facilities continue to enjoy substantial support in the Philippines—and indeed throughout the East Asia region.

The administration intends to continue with its plans to ask the Congess for the security assistance it pledged to seek in connection with this year's Military Bases Agreement review. We believe the Agreement reflects U.S. and Philippine interests.

PHILIPPINE ECONOMY

My statement would not be complete without some comments on the Philippine economy, which has also received considerable attention lately. In the decade of the 70's the Philippine economy, under the guidance of an able team of technocrats backed by President Marcos, made solid strides with growth rates averaging six percent. Then, in this decade, growth dropped off sharply, largely as a result of the world wide recession which reduced the demand for the country's traditional exports. Most recently, with the upturn in the world economy, there have been some favorable developments, including higher prices for Philippine products.

The Aquino assassination had initially led to concerns about possible adverse effects on the economy. However, we have not seen indications that this event has seriously affected lending and investing attitudes. In any event, the medium and long-term outlook is favorable because of the underlying factors such as the availability of trained and capable manpower, resources, and geographic location.

CONCLUSION

Benigno Aquino's murder is a tragedy for the Philippines. Filipino political leaders in both the Government and the opposition recognize the gravity of their political problems. How they work out their differences is, of course, their responsibility. We continue to believe that a free and fair electoral process in which Filipinos can place their confidence is the key to the resolution of the political problems left in the wake of the Aquino assassination. We trust that all the responsible political leaders of the Philippines share this view.

Statement Read by the President's Principal Deputy Press Secretary (Speakes), October 3, 1983 [30]

Postponement of President Reagan's Visits to the Philippines, Indonesia, and Thailand

The President has most reluctantly and with regret decided to postpone visits planned for this November to the Republic of the Philippines, Indonesia, and Thailand. On Friday, September 30th, the Deputy Chief of Staff and Assistant to the President, Michael K. Deaver, departed Washington to visit each of these countries, to express the President's regret, and to deliver personal messages from the President to the heads of state of the three countries, explaining the need for postponement.

These discussions were completed this morning. In view of the fact that Congress will be in session, that key appropriations bills have not yet been enacted, and that a continuing resolution has been enacted, but will expire November 10th, it is clear that the first 2 weeks of November will be particularly demanding legislative weeks.

The President made the decision to postpone this portion of his planned trip after careful review of the 17-day itinerary, and an assessment of legislative issues with which he must deal. Our relations with the Philippines, Indonesia, and Thailand are excellent, and we expect them to remain so. The President is disappointed that his original plans had to be changed, but the fact does not alter in any way the fundamental, positive relationship between the United States and the ASEAN countries.

The President still plans to visit Japan and the Republic of Korea in November. This morning I spoke to Mike Deaver in Bangkok, and he had just completed his third visit, and he indicated to me that there was an understanding of the need and the reasons for postponing the trip on the part of the leadership of the three countries with whom he had visited.

He is continuing his trip that will take him to Seoul and to Tokyo and return here by the end of the week.

Prepared Statement by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs (O'Donohue) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, March 14, 1983 [1]

U.S. Aid to Thailand

Mr. Chairman, I am delighted at this opportunity to appear before you to discuss our assistance requests for Thailand, one of our closest East Asian allies.

Policy Objectives and Interests

Mr. Wolfowitz, in his testimony before this subcommittee, [2] set forth our basic objectives and interests in East Asia. All of our Thai programs are in direct support of the objectives he outlined:

—Thailand is a long time security treaty ally and is the ASEAN frontline state facing a direct threat from Soviet-supported Vietnamese forces in Kampuchea.

—Thailand is a key member of ASEAN which has emerged as the major force for stability in Southeast Asia and a subregional grouping of central importance to U.S. interests.

—Thailand is in strategic proximity to the key sealanes of communication linking East Asia to the Indian Ocean and Middle East.

—Thailand has borne the heaviest burden of refugees in Southeast Asia and is central to maintaining the first asylum principle and the continuation of the major international efforts which have allowed us to cope with this immense human problem.

—Thailand's cooperation is essential in our efforts to stem the flow of narcotics out of the Golden Triangle.

Program Summary

In the FY 83 supplemental we have asked for $9 million in FMS guaranteed credits and $16 million in FMS MAP. These sums would bring our FY 83 level up to the amount requested by the administration originally, which was supported by this Committee.

In FY 84 the administration is requesting:

—FMS: $94 million in FMS guaranteed credits and $5 million in MAP. This is a 9 percent increase over our FY 82 request.

—Military Training (IMET): $2.4 million in military training funds, a moderate increase over the 1983 CR amount of $1.7 million.

—ESF: $5 million in ESF, the same as FY 83, to be used to assist the Thai directly affected by the heavy refugee inflow and border fighting.

—Development Assistance: And $29 million in Development Assistance, $1 million over this year's level.

Policy Justification

These programs directly support U.S. interests in Thailand and contribute to its security and economic development. They also support security, economic, political and humanitarian interests of regional and global as well as bilateral importance.

The security assistance levels we have requested for FY 83 and FY 84 reflect the administration's determination to strengthen the defense capabilities of a close treaty ally manning the frontlines against a threat to the region as a whole. The program is not only an essential signal of our commitment to Thailand and its ASEAN policies but also demonstrates our determination to play an appropriate security role in the area.

ASEAN has emerged as a dynamic force for peace and progress in Southeast Asia and deserves our full support. The Thai and their ASEAN partners have been defending the region's continued stability by resolutely opposing the Vietnamese occupation of Kampuchea and by determinedly pursuing a political solution to this problem. A strong, confident Thailand, around which the other ASEAN states and most of the international community have rallied, is central to this task. Our assistance to Thailand consequently contributes significantly to the overall ASEAN efforts to bring about a comprehensive political solution to the Kampuchea problem.

FMS/MAP: Unfortunately, as a result of the FY 83 reduction not only have we been unable to increase the Thai FMS program, as we had hoped, but in fact the overall level is $13.2 million less than that provided in FY 82. This undercuts our whole approach, creating an erroneous impression of diminishing U.S. interest at a time when the Vietnamese threat remains unchanged. Consequently, we have, as a matter of high priority, requested that the Congress in the supplemental restore the FMS and MAP funds which we have requested.

In looking at our FY 84 program levels, we are projecting a measured increase in the FMS/MAP program. This program is the most visible and concrete manifestation of our security relationship and of our readiness to play an appropriate security role with Thailand. The Thai have indicated they believe they can manage their own security problems without U.S. military involvement, but have stressed their hope that we would provide the security assistance needed to allow them to meet the Vietnamese challenge. Our program does that.

Mr. Armitage will be touching on FMS program specifics, [3] but I would note that the funds we have requested will enable the Thai to proceed with their force modernization program as well as build an inventory of badly needed spare parts for existing weaponry.

IMET: Our military training program will be devoted to expanding space allocations for training of officers and enlisted men in use of modern weapons, management of logistics and technical fields such as intelligence and communications. The Thai are making a genuine effort to improve their logistics system, which will be a great step forward in their overall defense effectiveness. In FY 83, we have projected training for about 369 military personnel, and a larger total in FY 84.

ESF: The large number of refugees and displaced persons which remain on Thai soil constitute a serious humanitarian problem as well as a threat to the region's stability. It is an international problem which requires an international solution. The United States is firmly committed to helping alleviate this burden by providing relief and resettlement within the framework of an international program. Tangible expression of our continued support is necessary to maintain the momentum of the international effort and the principle of first asylum.

As part of this cooperation, we and other countries provide assistance to Thai villages affected by border fighting and the influx of refugees. We believe these Economic Support Funds (ESF) will be needed in FY 84 at about the same levels as FY 83. The recent Vietnamese attacks in the area of Nong Chan, on the Kampuchea border, have added to the number of refugees in Thailand, and caused new losses of Thai lives and property. In addition, ESF funds are being directed to areas of the Thai-Lao border, also affected by refugee flows, where many of the nation's poorest people live. These programs will fund improvements in basic services in the villages, assist in improving agricultural productivity, and help bind these areas into the economic and political mainstream of the country. Most importantly, they encourage the Thai to maintain first-asylum policies and to facilitate international relief and resettlement efforts.

Development Assistance: Thailand has suffered from the world recession and spiraling energy costs over the past several years along with most Third World countries. Yet due to favorable harvests, Thailand has managed to retain relatively high growth rates in both its agricultural and industrial sectors. Agricultural productivity, however, remains low relative to its potential. Significant disparities of income persist both between regions and between different occupational groups. Our development assistance to Thailand is part of a much larger international effort to assist this important developing country, which has proven its determination to put such resources to effective use. Besides our bilateral assistance, the U.S. contributes significantly to the international effort through the IBRD and ADB.

U.S. development assistance for Thailand will increase slightly over 1983 if the FY 84 program is approved at the requested level. This program supports current RTG efforts to redirect public and private investment toward rural growth and development. Other projects will seek to enhance efficiency of the private sector in Thailand in meeting overall development objectives. Finally, the program is designed to aid the Thai Government in directing economic growth toward increased equity for the poorest sectors of its population.

Conclusion

I have outlined a balanced assistance program for Thailand reflecting the strengths and diversity of our relationship. There is a proper emphasis on security assistance given the threat Thailand faces from Vietnam and our own security treaty commitment. The President, Secretary Shultz, and Secretary Weinberger have all reaffirmed our clear commitment to Thailand embodied in the Manila Pact.[4] Our military assistance and the signal it sends of U.S. constancy and support are essential elements in strengthening Thai security.

At the same time, we recognize that economic development is equally important in enhancing domestic stability and social development. Through Development Assistance, we remain determined to contribute along with other donors such as the IBRD and Japan, to help Thailand maintain its priorities for education, economic development, and more equitable income distribution.

Both of these programs also help us secure Thai cooperation on refugees and narcotics matters. In the broader context, the ASEAN countries look first to our security relationship with Thailand and our assistance program as the measure of our support to their efforts to reach a comprehensive political settlement in Kampuchea.

Mr. Chairman, the levels we have requested reflect the severe budgetary constraints we are working under. They are necessary if we are to demonstrate our continued support for Thailand—a treaty ally and the ASEAN frontline state.

U.S. Security Interests in Thailand

Mr. Chairman, again I thank you for the opportunity to offer comments from a Defense perspective on the administration's foreign assistance requests—this time the requests for Thailand. The levels we seek in the FY 1983 supplemental request and in the FY 1984 budget request are needed for both programmatic and highly important symbolic reasons. Not only Thailand, but the other ASEAN states and, undoubtedly, Vietnam and the Soviet Union as well, look to our security assistance for Thailand—the ASEAN frontline state—as a major indicator of U.S. security interests in the region.

Mr. Chairman, some of the questions you asked that I address in my statement are more appropriately addressed by others, for example, those which deal with our economic aid and the Thai balance of payments. On those, I will defer to my colleagues. In my remarks, I will address those questions which are of particular concern to Defense.

The increased threat to Thai security brought about by the December 1978 Vietnamese invasion of Kampuchea is responsible for the greater Thai requirement for security assistance. Today, 17 Vietnamese Divisions remain at their work attempting to "pacify" Kampuchea. In fact, there are more Vietnamese troops in Kampuchea than Thailand has in its entire army. The fighting between the Vietnamese and the Khmer resistance groups along the Thai/Kampuchean border remains intense. The tragic by-product of this upheaval, the flow of refugees out of Indochina, continues. We estimate there are about 80,000 Khmer refugees in Thailand and another 210,000 in border camps controlled by various non-Communist elements.

The military situation shows every sign of continuing as it is; essentially a cyclical pattern of fighting adding up to a stalemate for some time to come. The Vietnamese have by no means wiped out the resistance; these groups seem as determined as ever not to acquiesce in the Vietnamese dominance of Kampuchea. Indeed, the seeds of Khmer nationalism have proved very resistant to eradication. The anti-Vietnam coalition of resistance forces (Khmer Rouge, KPNLF, Moulinaka) still has some problems, but it is a focus for resistance against Vietnamese hegemony and the rallying point for Khmer nationalism.

Were it not for its price in human suffering, the situation in which the Vietnamese find themselves could almost be considered poetic justice. It is now they in the capitol, trying to deal with guerrilla forces who ambush their convoys and challenge their ability to pacify the countryside. But we can take little comfort in thoughts of their discomfort when their presence in Kampuchea has increased the threat to our Southeast Asia ally, Thailand, and when the cost of their Kampuchean occupation has permitted the Soviet Union to buy its way into virtually every aspect of Indo-China's economy, government, and military structure. For example:

—USSR and Eastern bloc military and economic aid, 40% military, has amounted to billions of dollars since 1978. Soviet aid is currently estimated at $6 million per day.

—In return, Vietnam exports a large proportion of its meager agricultural and industrial output to the USSR, provides Vietnamese laborers at low wages to work in the Soviet Union, and provides the Soviets increased access to its ports and airfields.

—The establishment of a Vietnamese/Soviet oil exploration operation at Vung Tau has been reported. It has been suggested that the Soviet population of Vung Tau could reach several thousand over the next 2 or 3 years.

—The Soviets also have advisors and technicians active in Laos and Kampuchea and have recently completed a new communications satellite facility just outside Vientiane.

—We are convinced that the Soviets are providing chemical weapons for use in Laos and Kampuchea.

—And, there is the increasing Soviet presence at Cam Ranh and Danang.

That portion of the Vietnamese occupation force in Kampuchea which is of greatest concern to Thailand is the several divisions in the proximity of the Thai border. The some 80,000 Vietnamese troops poised just inside Kampuchea are the most important threat the Thai currently face. Although the threat of an all-out invasion is relatively low, continued Vietnamese incursions into Thailand—both deliberate and accidental such as during hot pursuit—probably will continue as long as Vietnamese forces occupy Kampuchea. Such incursions into sovereign Thai territory are made no less serious by becoming more common. Each carries the risk of a clash which could escalate into a larger Vietnamese punitive attack or lead to other unforeseen consequences.

The Communist insurgent threat in Thailand has declined significantly in recent years—reflecting, at least in part, the effectiveness of the substantial economic and security assistance provided by the United States over the past two decades. But the insurgency has not lost its potential to disrupt internal security and tie down government forces. Thai soldiers still die fighting guerrillas and, while paramilitary forces have assumed the bulk of the effort, regular forces must still be devoted to suppress insurgent activity. Nevertheless, the more serious current threat to Thai security is that which arises from Vietnamese activity in Kampuchea.

Thailand's substantial force modernization requirements stem from having to change the focus of its armed forces after the Vietnamese invasion of Kampuchea from suppression of internal threats to defense against possible external aggression. The threat posed by substantial Vietnamese conventional forces on the border equipped with tanks and armored vehicles and supported with tactical air capabilities has made the acquisition of anti-tank and antiair capabilities especially critical to the Thai armed forces.

The Thai have done well since December 1978 in upgrading their military capabilities against the external threat. They have made significant qualitative and quantitative improvements in their weapons inventory. Moreover, with their heavy emphasis on training, they have improved the professionalism and technical proficiency of their forces.

Thailand does not seek to become a military match for the Soviet-supported Vietnamese who, after all, have the fourth largest military force in the world. But the Thai have sought to acquire the ability to respond to limited Vietnamese incursions into their territory in order to deter the threat of invasion. With our assistance, they can strengthen further their capability to defend their borders.

The need to improve its conventional military capabilities rapidly has prompted Thailand to more than double its annual FMS purchases from the U.S. During FY 79–82, Thailand spent over $900M on new military purchases from the United States. We assisted Thai growth by increasing our security assistance each year, providing a total of almost $200 million in military assistance over the same time period ($194 million in FMS credits, $4.5 million in MAP grants). We also expedited delivery of some critically needed equipment and supplies.

Thailand spends 4% of its GNP on defense—almost 20% of its budget. It spends 8% on development. This proportion is appropriate for a developing country which still faces an insurgency. However, it limits the extent to which Thailand can purchase the hardware it needs for military modernization without credit. The Thai calculate that they need to spend approximately $350 million per year for capital purchases to replace attrition and carry out their most important modernization programs. The Thai budget can only support capital expenditures of approximately $200 million, leaving a $150 million annual shortfall.

Credits underwrite only part of the total Thai procurement from the United States. Therefore, we cannot be sure which specific programs would be cancelled or delayed if requested FMS credit and MAP levels are not restored for FY 83 and maintained for FY 84. However, it is apparent that since we have already restrained our requests to a minimum level well short of the $150 million needed by Thailand, further reductions are not possible without serious delays in some or all of the important modernization programs. Procurements which may have to be delayed or cancelled might include attack aircraft, tactical mobility and logistics aircraft, antitank and antiair munitions, tanks and howitzers, and naval patrol craft.

The U.S. commitment to the security of Thailand under the Manila Pact was reaffirmed by President Reagan in his 1981 meeting with the Thai Prime Minister.[6] It was again reaffirmed by Secretary Weinberger during his 1982 visit to Thailand.[7] While for Korea American troop presence is a major symbol of our commitment, for Thailand the most important symbol is our willingness to provide security assistance support. Reduction of Thai security assistance in FY 1983 and 1984 to less than either of the two previous years could not but be perceived, despite our rhetoric to the contrary, as a retrenchment from our commitment to peace and security in Southeast Asia and a serious reduction in the importance we attach to ASEAN.

U.S. Military Aid to Thailand

I have a statement on U.S. military assistance to Thailand: Over the next 10 days three shipments of American-built military equipment are due to arrive in Thailand in response to Thai requests for speeded up delivery. [9] The initial delivery will take place this weekend, when a U.S. military plane is due to unload a number of Redeye ground-to-air missiles at Don Muang Royal Thai Air Force Base. That will be midday, Saturday, April 9.

On Monday, April 11, a special airlift of two American C–5 transports will deliver 155mm extended-range howitzers, along with ammunition. These new model-198 howitzers were made available from America's inventory for its own forces to underline U.S. support for Thailand. On April 19, additional extended-range howitzers will arive in Thailand aboard the merchant ship SS Benjamin Harrison. The procurement of these weapons for delivery to Thailand was also accelerated as a result of a Thai request.

These weapons have been purchased by Thailand under the U.S. Foreign Military Sales Program. Thailand annually purchases military equipment averaging between $150 and $200 million in value. In addition, last year (Fiscal Year 1982) the United States allocated to Thailand $80 million in credits and grants for this purpose. So far this year, $66 million has been made available, and the administration is requesting a supplemental appropriation of an additional $25 million.

In addition to speeding delivery of military supplies, the United States has responded to the situation created by Vietnamese attacks along the Thai-Kampuchean border by an immediate grant of $1.5 million to the International Committee of the Red Cross for emergency medical care and other humanitarian assistance to victims of the fighting. Our Ambassador there, John Gunther Dean, also recently presented $3 million to aid Thai villagers affected by the continuing conflict in Kampuchea and the influx of refugees.

That's all I have.

Q. Is this the announcement made by Wolfowitz [10] out there this morning?

A. I don't know whether it is the identical announcement made by Wolfowitz, Jim; but in substance, it is the same.

Q. Can we get copies of that, John?

A. Sure.

Q. To follow up, John, will there be more personnel needed to go along to deliver this equipment or—

A. Not to my knowledge, at this stage.

Q. Did you say the first shipment would have surface-to-air?

A. Yes. Ground-air.

Q. Why is that being sent, given the nature of the conflict?

A. I presume the Thais feel that there is a need for that kind of equipment.

Q. What is your reading of the military situation in the area?

A. On the border? I don't have anything up-to-date for you on that.

Q. What are the Secretary's plans for this weekend?

A. Why don't I chat with you about that after this session.

Q. Let's stay on Thailand a minute more.

A. Sure.

---

[8] Source: Office of Press Relations, Department of State. The briefing was conducted by Department of State Spokesman John Hughes, beginning at 12:17 p.m.

[9] Requests came in response to Vietnamese attacks on Cambodian refugee camps.

[10] Assistant Secretary Wolfowitz was in Thailand, April 5–7, 1983, during a trip which took him to several Southeast Asian countries from March 29 to April 16, 1983.

Q. In addition to this speeded up stuff that you're sending them in the next few days, is there any consideration being given to additional assistance of any kind to Thailand, beyond giving more of what they have already ordered?

A. No decision has been taken, and nothing has been sent. What is being sent is matériel that was earmarked for them, that was in the pipeline, is going faster at this stage. Obviously, should events change or should there be a need for more, I'm sure we would consider that.

Q. These are all things they have already paid for or ordered, and it is just the question of making delivery faster?

A. Yes.

Q. If events change, the United States will send more?

A. No, I didn't say that. I was asked whether there was any consideration of additional aid. As you know, the Thais have asked for assistance in various spheres. I wouldn't rule out consideration of other measures if such requests were made. But I'm not misleading you: what we have done up to now is send matériel that they would otherwise have had. And that's where we stand. But I don't want to draw the line there, and say the United States would never do anything else.

Q. The "other issues" is military equipment. Period.

A. Yes.

Q. How serious is the situation? Is Thailand in danger in some way?

A. I think I would let our friends at the Pentagon give you a characterization of the military situation.

Q. Mr. Woltowitz, in some of his remarks quoted from Thailand, was quoted as saying, "The Vietnamese are responsible and that the Soviets are, to some degree, responsible for this situation."

A. I think we're all aware of Soviet involvement in Kampuchea.

Q. I guess the question I was getting to is, has the United States done anything, or is it doing anything diplomatically in addition to sending these missiles and howitzers over there, regarding the Soviet Union or the Vietnamese?

A. Yes, I think we have made clear our views to the Vietnamese, and I think a number of other countries have made very clear their views about this, too.

Q. How about with the Soviets?

A. I'm sure that the Soviets are well aware of our viewpoint.

Address by President Reagan Before the National League of Families of American Prisoners and Missing in Southeast Asia, Crystal City, Virginia, January 28, 1983 [1]

"I Pledge To You, We Will Take Decisive Action on Any Live Sighting Report [of POW/MIA's] That Can Be Confirmed"

Thank you. (Applause) You've done that already. George Brooks, Ann Griffiths, members of the Board and family members and members of Congress, I think most of you know that during the course of any given day, we meet with an assortment of groups who represent a cross section of interests and causes.

None of those meetings are routine, but I must tell you that this meeting today is more than special. The anguish you've suffered, the families of brave men of listed prisoners of war or missing in action, the misery of anguish is unspeakable, something the rest of us can really never know even in a partial measure. Twelve years ago, I said something to a group of you in California that I believe is even more true today. If they could be here today, millions of Americans, from every corner of this land, who have only a glimmer of your pain, would say to you, "We want with all our hearts to share your burden."

And what a burden you've had to bear. You watched as we disengaged from Vietnam and many of our prisoners of war returned for an emotional homecoming. You've seen task forces and committees hold hearings and issue reports that attempted to foreclose hope. But as the tragic flow of refugees from Indochina began a few years ago, those columns of humanity who had suffered hunger and thirst and disease and piracy, brought with them firsthand, "live sighting" reports of American prisoners held captive after 1973. As this information was investigated, respected figures in the intelligence community reached personal conclusions that these reports were credible, even though the circumstances of the sightings prevented confirmation.

But with these refugees and the news they brought, another tragedy was unfolding here at home. You, the families of our missing men, were trying to be heard, and yet, you were sometimes unfairly and cruelly branded as emotionally distraught groups that ignored reality and simply hoped against hope.

Government and public attention began to wane. And instead of being a full partner with your government in attempts to learn the fates of loved ones, you were confronted with legal rulings that presumed the loved ones were dead. You found yourselves quite literally on the outside, driven in some cases to demonstrate for attention in front of the White House gates.

Well, today I want you to know that your vigil is over. Your government is attentive and intelligence assets of the United States are fully focused on this issue. (Applause) Furthermore, I pledge to you, we will take decisive action on any live sighting report that can be confirmed.

We're also working to achieve the accounting of our missing men. I'm sure you understand that some of these approaches must be done quietly. As Judge Clark told you yesterday, despite the differences between our governments, we have followed up encouraging Lao response to the recent visit by the League's delegation. We are fully prepared to take additional, concrete steps with the Lao government to improve relations. I pledge to you that the progress on the POW/MIA issue will be the principal measure of their sincerity. I wish to recognize publicly their positive steps to date, and call upon them to continue with us in this humanitarian effort to end the years of uncertainty that you have endured.

I, also, called on the government in Hanoi to honor their pledges to the American people on the POW/MIA issue. Not for me, not for our government, but for our missing men and those of you that did nothing to deserve the terrible emotional ordeal that you have endured.

Now, these steps are an indication of how things are changing for the better, and how the work of those of you in the National League of Families has helped bring about this change.

You are the ones who have forged a partnership to realize our common quest—the return of all POWs, the fullest possible accounting for the still missing, and the repatriation of the remains of those who died serving our nation. The myth that this effort is partisan or needlessly raises your hopes has now been dashed.

The government bureaucracy now understands that these goals are the highest national priority. And there is strong, bipartisan support in the Congress. (Applause) Those Americans who attempted to discharge government responsibilities through private efforts should now understand that the full resources of our government are now committed to these goals.

Today is a time for remembering many—the private donors, the congressmen, and the government employees—all those who are dedicated to organizing and supporting a variety of projects to achieve our goals. Because of the very nature of the work, they must shun publicity. But I want them to know that their quiet and responsible efforts represent the highest patriotic humanitarian values. I urge them to continue on with their work, regardless of the obstacles and frustrations, for the return home of only one of our men will be a personal reward of far greater value than any words spoken here today.

But beyond all this, I have mentioned that there are, of course, those of you here today. Today, this is room of heroes who kept a vigil of unprecedented faith and devotion. Through all the years of heartbreak and mistrust, you have been the ones who have cared. You are the ones who asked for justice—for deeds, not words.

The membership of the National League of Families, past and present board members, and your national office staff deserve the gratitude and accolades of this nation. And I think I should mention other individuals who share our goals such as Fred Travelena, a returned POW Captain Jerry Coffee—who have, also, given without regard to personal gain.

So all of us can be gratified that progress is being made, but never satisfied. We need greater public awareness from the American people. So I ask each American who hears or reads of this to find a way to help. No matter how small each individual effort may seem, it is needed.

I ask too that you continue to provide us with positive suggestions through your Washington office. We welcome and solicit your help and cooperation as well as the criticism when you feel we deserve it. It's possible there will be differences from time to time on tactics and strategy, but I repeat: We are heartfelt allies and friends. Our goals are the same.

The government is large. It's possible sometimes you'll hear voices that will sound contradictory or insensitive, but we're doing what we can to eliminate that. So, please, don't let it shake our larger faith. Only if we're united, only if we have faith in each other, can we finally hope to end the tragic ordeal that you've endured with such steadfast and wondrous courage.

I know I've spoken before and told of when the POWs did return immediately after the agreement. Nancy and I were fortunate enough—I was Governor then in Sacramento—to have several hundred of them, not all at once, of course—couldn't get them in—but in groups, in our home. One who is here at this table this morning was one of those. We heard such stories. We saw then such courage. And one night afterward, I said to Nancy, "Where did we find such men?" And the answer came almost as quickly as I'd asked it. We found them where we've always found them—on the farms, in the shops, in the offices, on the streets, in towns and cities in America and farms. They're just the product of the greatest, freest system man has ever known. (Applause)

Speaking for Nancy and myself, you and they will be in our prayers. God bless you all. (Applause)

U.S. Denunciation of Indiscriminate Vietnamese Attacks on a Khmer Civilian Border Settlement

. . . . . .

Finally a statement regarding the Vietnamese attack on Nong Chan. Vietnamese forces attacked January 31 the Khmer refugee encampments near the Thai border opposite the Thai village of Nong Chan. While details are not entirely clear, we are appalled that Vietnamese forces would attack indiscriminately a settlement containing thousands of civilian Khmer who fled to the border area from Vietnam's 1978 invasion and continued occupation of Kampuchea. We understand that the Vietnamese destroyed the refugee camps, burned the huts and rudimentary medical facilities and schools of people who have suffered enormously and who have been living with only minimal essentials. We equally deplore that innocent Thai villagers have also been victims in the attack.

We also note the statement by the Government of Thailand which describes accurately that the Vietnamese attack constitutes a flagrant violation of the principle of humanitarianism and the U.N. Charter. We join the Thai Government in calling for Hanoi to respect Thai territory and to cease its use of force.

O.K. That's all on the announcements.

Q. May we have a copy of that?

A. Sure.

I'll be happy to take your questions.

Q. Do you have any idea how many people became casualties as a result of this?

A. I don't have figures at this point. As I say, the details are not entirely clear, but apparently the attack was fairly severe. I just don't know. I don't have casualty figures for you.

Prepared Statement by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs (O'Donohue) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, March 22, 1983 [3]

Americans Missing in Southeast Asia

Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to have the opportunity to discuss this afternoon the issue of Americans missing in Southeast Asia.

This Administration is fully committed to the goal of accounting for Americans missing in Southeast Asia. President Reagan in his address a few weeks ago to the National League of Families of American Prisoners and Missing in Southeast Asia, emphasized the importance which this Administration places on this goal. [4] He stated the goals of the return of all POWs, the fullest possible accounting for the still missing, and the repatriation of the remains of those who died serving our nation are "the highest national priority," and pledged that "the full resources of our government are now committed to these goals."

In support of these goals, the Department of State has been engaged in a variety of activities which I would like to describe. Mr. Armitage will describe the efforts of the Department of Defense and Admiral Paulson those of the Defense Intelligence Agency.

—For our part, we are continuing to press this issue with the Lao and Vietnamese Governments. As you are aware, Mr. Chairman, we have serious policy differences with Vietnam, especially on Kampuchea. Despite these differences, we have maintained bilateral dialogue with the Vietnamese government on the POW/MIA issue—but only on this issue because of its great humanitarian importance. We are engaged with Laos in mutual efforts to improve relations through concrete steps and both governments have already taken positive steps forward. President Reagan told the National League of Families meeting in January that "progress on the POW/MIA issue will be the principle measure" of Lao sincerity in improving relations.

—We are continuing to seek the assistance of other governments in conveying to the Lao and Vietnamese the importance we attach to progress on this issue. We do not want it to be forgotten by others.

—We regularly assist the Defense Intelligence Agency in its investigation of live sighting reports through contacts with other governments.

—We are continuing to seek the cooperation of the Government of Thailand in permitting access to Lao and Vietnamese refugees in "austere" camps who may have information about missing Americans. Individual visits have been authorized as well as the posting of notices about our interest in POW/MIA information. This is an area in which we are making slow but steady progress and ultimately we believe we will have an opportunity to talk with all refugees who can help us.

—Our Southeast Asian posts have reviewed procedures for debriefing refugees. At our request, the Department of Health and Human Services sent almost 500 letters to refugee mutual assistance associations in the United States requesting that they contact their members for information regarding POW/MIAs. Our Bureau for Refugee Programs also made a similar request to the American Council of Voluntary Agencies.

—We have supported the League of Families' private efforts by briefings and through the actions of our Embassy in Vientiane to facilitate the League's visit to Laos last September.

Investigations of live sighting reports are assigned, and will continue to be assigned, highest priority and necessary resources, based on the assumption that some Americans are still being held captive. While we do not have hard evidence of live POWs, we continue to actively solicit and evaluate information from all sources.

The progress towards resolution of the POW/MIA issue is far slower than we all would like. Approximately 2,500 Americans killed or missing during the Indochina War have not been fully accounted for. Of this number, about 1,150 are known to have been killed in action, but their remains have not been recovered. Between February and April 1973, the Hanoi government released 591 American prisoners. An additional 68 Americans stranded in Vietnam in April 1975 left in the following year. To date, the Vietnamese have returned 79 sets of remains. The most recent repatriation of remains from Vietnam, in October 1982, involved those of four U.S. military personnel. To emphasize the importance the U.S. Government attaches to this issue, Deputy Assistant Secretary Armitage visited Hanoi in February 1982. The Vietnamese last fall accepted our proposal for regular, technical meetings and agreed to four a year. These meetings, two of which have already occurred, provide opportunities for exchanges of information and, we hope, will lead to further progress in identification and recovery of remains.

With respect to the Lao, although they have returned only two sets of U.S. remains in past years, the League of Families' visit to Laos in September was helpful in encouraging the Lao Government to be more cooperative on MIA matters and in its relationship with the United States. For the first time since 1975, in February of this year, the Lao permitted a team from the Joint Casualty Resolution Center and the Central Identification Laboratory to visit Vientiane for talks with Lao counterparts about POW/MIA matters.

It is important to keep foremost in mind that when private Americans try to force their own solutions, our government-to-government efforts are jeopardized. We do not support or condone illegal forays by private Americans to search for remains or prisoners. They seriously complicate our efforts, involve personal risks for those involved and possible arrest for violating the laws of the countries which they leave and enter. In fact, as Judge Clark stated to the National League of Families in January, "We are resolutely opposed to private cross-border forays. Such actions interfere with and damage legitimate efforts on a number of fronts." I can not emphasize this point too strongly. For our part, we accept POW/MIA information from any source. Any information or material which is turned over receives thorough examination and analysis.

In closing I would stress that we care deeply about our missing men and are devoting our resources on a highest priority basis to the fullest possible accounting of those still missing and the repatriation of the remains of those who died serving our nation.

Statement Read by the Department of State Acting Spokesman (Romberg), March 31, 1983 [5]

More Vietnamese Attacks on Civilian Border Settlements

Good afternoon. I have one statement for you concerning Vietnamese attacks on refugee settlements.

We are appalled that Vietnamese forces March 31 attacked indiscriminately settlements containing thousands of civilian Khmer who fled to the border from Vietnam's 1978 invasion and occupation of Kampuchea.

We strongly condemn these attacks which are a consequence of Vietnam's actions in Kampuchea in violation of the U.N. Charter and U.N. General Assembly resolutions.

While details are not entirely clear, thousands of civilians have been forced to flee for survival from the March 31 attacks.

Just 2 months ago the Vietnamese attacked a Khmer refugee camp near the Thai border village of Nong Chan, putting to flight some 40,000 civilians and destroying their settlement. [6]

We noted the Royal Thai Government statement of March 31 about the attacks and join the Royal Thai Government in calling on Hanoi to respect Thai territory and in condemning the attack on peaceful civilian inhabitants of the border area.

We applaud the prompt efforts of the Thai Government and international organizations to render humanitarian assistance to the unfortunate victims who have fled into Thailand and will lend our own support to these efforts.

"We . . . Join ASEAN in Condemning Unprovoked and Indiscriminate Attacks by Vietnamese Armed Forces Against Khmer Civilians and Threats to Thai Territory"

. . . . . .

Since our statement of March 31 [8] condemning attacks by Vietnamese forces on Khmer civilian refugee settlements, we have seen reports that indiscriminate attacks on refugee camps have continued along the Thai-Kampuchean border.

We condemn Vietnamese actions which defy humanitarian principles and which have increased still further the suffering of Khmer who fled to the border to escape Vietnam's occupation of their country.

We note the joint ASEAN statement of April 1 about the attacks [9] and join ASEAN in condemning unprovoked and indiscriminate attacks by Vietnamese armed forces against Khmer civilians and threats to Thai territory.

I'll be happy to take your questions.

Q. Copy of that, please?

A. Yes.

Q. Can I just follow that up? Do you have any comment on a report that Thai aircraft attacked Vietnamese positions inside Cambodia?

A. I don't have confirmation of that. I've also seen reports that I can't confirm that Vietnamese forces made some incursions across the border, too.

All I could say is that we are concerned about the escalating level of violence which has been instigated by Vietnam.

Q. In light of that, have the Thais asked for any additional military assistance or is such a thing under consideration?

A. The Thai Government has not asked for further U.S. assistance, but we will consult closely with the Thai Government on how we can be of assistance.

Q. So we might initiate a proposal?

A. I think we're in consultations with them on this issue in general, and as a general matter of how we can be of assistance. I'm not sure that we're going to propose something specifically in terms of further assistance—that is, military aid—but it's a question of talking with them to see how we could be of help in general.

Q. Is our military assistance agreement with Thailand invoked in this in any way?

A. I don't think there's been any formal invoking of any agreements here, but, obviously, we're concerned with what's going on, and we're following it very closely.

Prepared Statement by the Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs (Wolfowitz) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, July 14, 1983 [10]

POW–MIA's and U.S. Policy Toward Southeast Asia

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to appear before the Asian and Pacific Affairs Subcommittee and the POW/MIA Task Force today to discuss the POW/MIA issue.

Some 2,500 Americans are missing and unaccounted for as a result of the war in Indochina; some 1,800 in Vietnam, nearly 600 in Laos and almost 100 in Kampuchea. For more than 10 years their families have been attempting to learn of their fate. This long period of hoping and waiting has been a heavy burden to bear for these families. We owe it to the missing, and to those who will fight in future wars, to make every effort for the fullest accounting possible.

President Reagan has made clear his deep concern and commitment to obtain the fullest possible accounting for Americans missing in Southeast Asia. This administration actively and consistently pursues such an accounting.

Last January the President reaffirmed in his remarks to the National League of Families that we share a "common quest—the return of POW's, the fullest possible accounting for the still missing, and the repatriation of the remains of those who died serving our Nation." [11]

This Presidential commitment is shared personally by Secretary Shultz and actively pursued by the Department of State. We know that this is also an issue of serious concern to this subcommittee and this task force and we are deeply appreciative of your support for our efforts. Today I would like to discuss some developments on the POW/MIA issue in the context of our policy toward the region.

I have given a statement to your staff answering the specific questions you addressed in your letter, although my statement goes in a somewhat different order.

The United States seeks to play a constructive and positive role in maintaining peace and security in Southeast Asia. We believe, along with the ASEAN nations, that Vietnam's continued occupation of Kampuchea is the main threat to stability in the region.

It is our policy to strongly support ASEAN in its efforts to obtain a comprehensive, political settlement in Kampuchea based on the principles in the declaration of the International Conference on Kampuchea. These principles include the complete withdrawal of Vietnamese forces from Kampuchea and the restoration of Khmer independence and self-determination. Vietnam, however, is still determined to maintain its domination of Kampuchea by military occupation. We have made it clear that we will not consider normalization of relations with Vietnam as long as it continues to occupy Kampuchea and to play a destabilizing role in the region.

At the same time, the POW/MIA issue is a humanitarian issue of the highest priority on which we believe progress should be made now. Indeed, our Government sees it as the most important bilateral issue between our countries.

In his January 28 address to the League of Families, President Reagan said that he had called on the government in Hanoi to honor their pledges to the American people on the POW/MIA issue. During the past year we have acted to encourage the Vietnamese to meet their humanitarian obligations.

We have also made efforts to encourage cooperation from the Government of Laos in the context of our bilateral relations. Additionally, we have kept this important humanitarian issue before the international community.

The highlights of the administration's efforts with the Vietnamese include the following:

In February 1982, a delegation led by then Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense Armitage traveled to Hanoi to impress on the Vietnamese the importance that this administration attaches to the POW/MIA issue.

Last August, Vietnamese POW/MIA specialists visited the Joint Casualty Resolution Center and the Central Identification Laboratory in Hawaii.

In September, the Vietnamese Foreign Minister announced agreement to our longstanding proposal that POW/MIA specialists on both sides meet regularly. Four meetings a year have been agreed upon and three have taken place. The Vietnamese used the occasion of the last meeting to return the remains of nine individuals and identification materials of three others.

We expect these meetings to continue. We have proposed the next meeting for September. We believe that they are useful in themselves for exchange of information and to remind the Vietnamese of the importance we attach to this issue. Their real value, however, would be in leading to more extensive cooperation on the part of the Vietnamese Government than anything we have unfortunately so far seen.

Unfortunately, progress on this issue has been disappointing because the Vietnamese Government still seems to want to use this humanitarian issue for political purposes.

We have also continued to seek the cooperation of Laos, and welcome the cooperative gestures which the Lao Government has made in the past year.

This administration supported the League of Families' visit to Laos last September. The visit was helpful in encouraging the Lao Government to be more cooperative on MIA matters. During the league visit, new ground was broken by permitting broader U.S. Government contact within the Lao Government and some U.S. Government travel outside Vientiane. This followed earlier U.S. Government actions, such as emergency medical assistance and visits by several congressional figures, to demonstrate our interest in an improved relationship.

We followed up the Lao Government discussions with the league during a series of talks with Lao officials by Deputy Assistant Secretary O'Donohue, former Senator Havakawa in his capacity as a special advisor to the Secretary of State on Asian and Pacific Relations, and the chargé at the American Embassy in Vientiane.

We have made it clear to the Lao in our discussions that an improvement in our overall bilateral relationship depends on both sides taking concrete steps to demonstrate progress.

Last January, President Reagan stated before the League of Families that progress on the POW/MIA issue will be a principal measure of Lao sincerity in improving relations.

This past February, the Lao permitted a team from the Joint Casualty Resolution Center and the Central Identification Laboratory to visit Vientiane for talks with Lao counterparts about specific cases and joint searches of crash sites. This was the first such visit since 1975.

We have indicated to the Lao Government that a pattern of Lao cooperation on the POW/MIA issue would be important in securing congressional support for lifting the legislative ban on aid to Laos. Depending on how our relations develop, other steps, such as upgrading diplomatic relations, could also be considered.

Finally, we have stated at the highest levels of government that we are strongly opposed to private cross-border forays in search of prisoners or remains. Such forays are counterproductive and hurt our government-to-government efforts. We believe that such forays may have delayed the Lao in responding to our interest on joint crash site searches by causing uncertainty about U.S. intentions toward Laos.

In addition to our efforts on the POW/MIA issue with the Vietnamese and the Lao, this administration has kept this issue before the international community. Our actions include the following:

At his meetings in Bangkok last month, Secretary Shultz asked the ASEAN Foreign Ministers to help us in resolving the MIA issue. [12]

If I might digress for a moment, I would like to read you the words that he included in his opening statement to the ASEAN Foreign Ministers. This was part of a general review of U.S. policy in Southeast Asia, and the meeting opened in front of the television cameras. So this particular statement was on the record, and I am now reading what Secretary Shultz said at the time:

> "On one particularly painful matter we ask your help, accounting for the Americans missing in Indochina is a matter of highest national priority for President Reagan and for the American people. We urge both Hanoi and Vientiane to cooperate in resolving this humanitarian issue. The United States greatly values any assistance the ASEAN countries can provide us in seeking the fullest possible accounting of our missing men.
> "As for Laos, the United States has shown readiness to improve relations based on concrete steps by both sides. We remain committed to this process."

It was striking, Mr. Chairman, when we went into closed sessions immediately after that, that one of the points that the ASEAN Foreign Ministers picked up on most immediately in the Secretary's rather long remarks was this specific appeal on the POW/MIA issue. And the Foreign Ministers present asked us to tell them in as much detail as possible how they could help us to pursue this issue in any contacts they had with Vietnam and with Laos.

We also regularly request senior officials from the ASEAN countries and other selected countries to meet with the Lao or Vietnamese to impress upon them the importance that we attach to this issue. Such approaches bring home to the Lao and Vietnamese that the POW/MIA issue can affect their broader foreign policy interests.

American Embassies in Asia and Europe are aware of the importance of this issue and are prepared to make full use of opportunities to seek the help of friendly countries.

The Thai Government has granted special access for Joint Casualty Resolution Center liaison staff to the Lao, Vietnamese, and Cambodian refugee camps normally closed to outside groups. We greatly appreciate the Thai Government's forthcoming cooperation.

Another area in which the administration has been active is in taking steps to improve on the information that we are getting from refugees.

Our embassies in Southeast Asia reviewed procedures for debriefing refugees recently to assure that we are getting all of the information available.

Over 500 letters were sent from the Department of Health and Human Services to refugee mutual assistance associations in the United States requesting that they contact their members for information regarding POW/MIA's.

At the suggestion of the National League of Families, a Department of Health and Human Services pilot project is under way in Texas to locate Indochinese refugee public assistance recipients in Texas to send them leaflets inquiring if they have information on MIA's. If the results of this project are promising, it could be expanded to other States.

The same leaflet will also be made available to private voluntary organizations involved in the resettlement of refugees in the United States.

The agencies primarily concerned with this issue, the Departments of State, Defense, the Defense Intelligence Agency, and the National Security Council are working closely with the executive director of the National League of Families in the framework of the Interagency Group on POW/MIA's.

Interagency group members cooperate in assisting the league's efforts to stimulate public awareness on this issue and implementing the Government's public awareness program.

Interagency group members work together in a common effort to investigate reports bearing on the POW/MIA issue. Investigations of live sighting reports are assigned highest priority based on the assumption that some Americans are still being held captive. Although hard evidence of live POW's has not yet been obtained, information from all sources is actively solicited and evaluated.

Interagency group members work together in developing new approaches to make progress on this issue and have especially valued the working relationship with the league.

The league initiative to visit Laos last September made a definite contribution to moving forward on the POW/MIA issue.

The league's institutional knowledge has been of immense help to us in implementing our accounting efforts.

Our responsible partnership with the league has shown that there can be a variety of approaches to resolving this issue and the governments can work together effectively to achieve our common goal.

I would like to conclude with a word about the role of Congress, Mr. Chairman.

We particularly appreciate the support of the Congress for our efforts to make progress on this issue, both with Vietnam and with Laos.

With regard to Laos, the visits of former Senator Hayakawa, who is here with us today, and of former Congressmen Hendon and LeBoutillier were very helpful in encouraging a change in the Lao Government's attitudes on cooperation with regard to the POW/MIA issue.

We appreciate the resolutions passed in Congress last December encouraging both the Laos and United States Government to act with dispatch to make progress on resolving the POW/MIA issue. Particularly useful was your statement, Mr. Chairman, that if a pattern of cooperation should develop between the United States and Laos Governments, especially on the POW/MIA issue, you would support efforts to remove the aid prohibition on Laos.

Further, the POW/MIA Task Force has helped to focus attention on this issue. We welcome the interest of Congressman Gilman and others in this group. Additionally, several staff members of Congress have regularly and constructively participated in the meetings of the Interagency Group in POW/MIA affairs. We look forward to more cooperation of this kind and regard it as a positive asset in our efforts to make progress on the POW/MIA issue.

I would add, Mr. Chairman, I think your point about the importance of the bipartisanship of this effort is central to the long-term success, because I think the key to success lies in persuading the Vietnamese that we are a united country and united people on this crucial issue.

The record of progress on the POW/MIA issue remains painfully disappointing and frustrating. Our efforts over the past year demonstrate the high priority that this administration and the American people attach to the POW/MIA issue and our determination to pursue actively our efforts. At the same time, it is clear that the problem of Americans unaccounted for in Indochina cannot be resolved without the cooperation of the Governments of Vietnam and Laos.

The Vietnamese and Laos Governments have admitted that this is a humanitarian issue. They have an obligation to cooperate. The Vietnamese Government has been unwilling to cooperate fully and cooperation by the Laos Government is in the initial stage.

For our part, I can assure you that over the next year we will work closely with the Congress, the league, and concerned citizens to meet our obligations to our missing men and their families. As the President has said, this is our highest national priority. And I can assure you of my own determination and that of the Department of State to support this truly national effort.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Vietnamese Pledge To Turn Over Information Regarding the Search For POW–MIA's in Indochina

On Vietnam: We note Vietnamese Foreign Minister Nguyen Co Thach's statement that he had some information on the search for American servicemen listed as missing as a result of the Vietnam war. He said he would turn the information over to the U.S. Government.

We welcome Mr. Thach's statement which is in the spirit of the Vietnamese memorandum of August 16, 1983. This memorandum stated that they would continue the search for missing Americans in keeping with the humanitarian nature of the accounting issue.

We especially welcome Mr. Thach's pledge to turn over this information directly to the U.S. Government since the only way to achieve the fullest possible accounting is through government-to-government channels.

We hope the Vietnamese will be contacting us shortly regarding this matter.

Letter From President Reagan to the President of the African Development Bank (Mung'Omba), February 8, 1983 [1]

U.S. Acceptance of Membership in the African Development Bank

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: On behalf of the United States of America, it gives me great pleasure to accept membership in the African Development Bank in accordance with Board of Governors resolutions 05–79, 06–79, and 07–79.

In accepting membership, I also wish to inform you of the following:

1. The United States of America has completed all steps necessary in accordance with its laws and is prepared to fulfill all the obligations of membership under the Agreement Establishing the Bank. [2]

2. On January 31, 1983, a duly authorized representative of the United States of America signed the Agreement Establishing the Bank and deposited our instrument of acceptance with the United Nations.

3. The United States of America hereby subscribes to 1,491 shares of the paid-up capital stock of the African Development Bank ("Bank"), and 4,473 shares of the callable capital stock of the Bank (inasmuch as pertinent budgetary appropriations have already been obtained); and subscribes, subject to obtaining budgetary appropriations, to an additional 5,964 shares of the paid-up capital stock of the Bank and an additional 17,892 shares of the callable capital stock of the Bank in accordance with the provisions of the General Rules Governing Admission of Non-regional Countries to Membership in the Bank.

4. I have nominated Donald T. Regan, Secretary of the Treasury, to be Governor of the Bank and W. Allen Wallis, Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, to be Alternate Governor of the Bank. The Senate is now in the process of confirming those nominations. We will notify you when they have been confirmed.

5. Pursuant to Article 40 of the Agreement Establishing the African Development Bank, the United States of America designates the Department of the Treasury for purposes of communication with the Bank on matters connected with the Agreement, and the Federal Reserve Bank of New York as the depository in which the Bank may keep its holdings of the currency of the United States of America or other assets.

6. The United States of America has fulfilled all the legal requirements necessary to make the subscription to the capital stock and to assure that the currency received by the Bank thereunder shall be freely convertible into the currencies of other countries for the purposes of the Bank's operations.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN

U.S. Security Assistance Programs in Africa

. . . . . .

Most of the country programs in Africa relate to our strategic access and for resisting Soviet surrogates. We need to continue programs with Sudan, Somalia, and Kenya to provide for access to air and port facilities which support our peacetime presence in the Indian Ocean and our conventional deterrence strategy in the Arabian Gulf/Indian Ocean area. The programs are small, however, and we give due regard to a country's ability to absorb equipment and pay back loans.

Failure to provide such minimal defense capability to Somalia could undermine its pro-Western regime and encourage further Soviet, Libyan, and Cuban expansion in the region. The Sudan has been a strong supporter of the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty. It is strategically located and militarily and economically vulnerable. Failure to continue or to increase the levels, or to improve the terms of Sudan's assistance, will jeopardize the new F-5 program and weaken the Sudan's ability to maintain U.S. equipment previously delivered. It will also create opportunities for Libyan intervention that would threaten Egypt's security.

Similar requirements for Kenya's F-5 program, e.g., the need to revamp its infrastructure and to acquire a modest radar system and associated command and control facilities, are equally essential. On the West Coast of Africa, the President's request for Liberia is designed mostly to continue the military housing program underway, success of which is tied to President Doe's determination to return the country to civilian rule. Other programs in Zaire, Niger, and in Botswana sustain long-term or newly developed military relationships. These will help provide critical national infrastructure with African states and help terminate Soviet supported adventurism.

Prepared Statement by the Assistant Administrator for Africa, Agency for International Development (Ruddy), Before a Subcommittee of the Senate Appropriations Committee, March 3, 1983 [4]

Objectives of the U.S. Aid Program for Africa

I am here today to outline the objectives of the U.S. aid program to Africa. The budget presented to you is an integrated foreign assistance budget. We intend to use Development Assistance, Economic Support Funds, and PL 480 [5] food resources to combat hunger, disease, and poverty while at the same time assisting African nations achieve equitable economic growth.

These programs seek to reach these objectives by supporting:

(1) the adoption of national policies which encourage Africans to expand agricultural production, especially food crops;

[4] Source: Foreign Assistance and Related Programs Appropriations for Fiscal Year 1984: Hearings Before a Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session (Washington, 1983), Part 1, pp. 339–344. Ruddy's statement was submitted to the Subcommittee on Foreign Assistance and Related Programs.

[5] Title I of P.L. 480 authorizes the President to arrange for the sale of agricultural commodities to friendly governments in exchange for local currencies. Title III authorizes him to permit certain needy countries to use local currencies from P.L. 480 sales to develop their food production and distribution capabilities as part of a Food for Development Program. For texts of Titles I and III, as amended, see 7 U.S.C. 1701 et seq. and 1725 et seq.

(2) the development of self-sustaining institutions that respond to the agricultural, health, and educational requirements of African nations; and

(3) the development of self-sustaining private sectors in these countries.

There are no easy answers. African economic performance has seriously deteriorated. Seventy percent of the people in Africa depend on agricultural products for their livelihood. Agricultural production has grown by less than 2 percent per year, a rate that is .8 percent less than the population growth rate. Africa also has the highest infant and child mortality rates and the lowest life expectancy of any region in the world. But there is cause for optimism. Africa does have the capacity to produce food at home. Africa has tremendous economic potential. Millions of acres of land can be brought under irrigation. Women provide the major share of agricultural labor in Africa, and effective integration of women into economic and social development can increase agricultural productivity. School enrollment that now includes 63 percent of primary school age children and an increased life expectancy from 39 to 47 years in the last 20 years are indicative of a potentially more productive human resources base. Maintaining and expanding these gains in health and education will require expansion of the directly productive sector and tax bases of the African economies. We and the Africans know this. More importantly, increased food production is not only our priority, it is a priority for the Africans themselves, and that gives us an unprecedented opportunity to work together for a common goal.

Internal problems such as underdeveloped African infrastructure, a lack of institutions and an untrained work force to some degree explain low income levels in Africa. External and uncontrollable forces such as the global recession are another part of the explanation. But the number one cause of Africa's inability to grow is unrealistic government economic policies. These are policies like overvalued exchange rates that encourage imports and discourage domestic production; agricultural pricing policies that undervalue agricultural products; artificial controls on agricultural necessities like fertilizer or seeds by inefficient marketing boards, and restrictions on the sale of farm products. These kinds of policies shackle productive energies, dry up incentives, and slow the pace of technical change in what should be the most dynamic growth sector throughout much of Africa and, unaltered, will continue the economic stagnation and decline in Africa. The need for policy reform is emphasized by projections of the World Bank that even with substantial global economic recovery, Africa will struggle to maintain current living standards during the 1980s.

That is why the Africa Bureau is giving increasing emphasis to policy change. Improved agricutural, administrative, and pricing policies emphasing incentives will stimulate production. They will also facilitate the adoption of improved production techniques which make traditional assistance programs more effective. For example, AID has always managed projects in agricultural research, extension, and credit. We found that although high yielding seeds might provide the technical basis for increased production, actual increases depend upon the availability of fertilizer and price levels which make use of fertilizer and improved seed economically sensible for the farmer.

The Economic Support Fund (ESF) has been effective in the policy dialogue. The dialogue demands discretion and realism about the resources and length of time required to bring about changes. It is important to remember that policy change questions must be considered in the political context of each country. Even so, policy improvement and greater reliance on market mechanisms, particularly in agriculture, are occurring with increasing frequency. By way of example, in Zimbabwe, the Government is effecting reforms to encourage the creation of private rural savings organizations which will mobilize resources for rural businesses and small farmers. In Somalia, the authorities of the state trading monopoly have been trimmed. Private importers are now allowed to import basic goods. The state agency is left to import goods only for the public sector entities such as the military and schools. The Government has reduced the role of its marketing monopoly. Farmers may now sell to private traders at open market prices and are receiving two to three times the official price for their crops. The Government has closed down four state enterprises, including those handling livestock, building materials, textiles, and fish. Both of these ESF program countries are experiencing substantial development benefits as a result of these changes.

PL 480 assistance is important in dealing with Africa's growing food crisis and increasing inability to finance additional commercial food imports. Title I and Title III [6] programs provide a good mechanism for encouraging policy change, as long as we make sure these programs do not become disincentives to production.

The development problems and fiscal crises on the continent demand close coordination among the more than 50 donors currently in Africa to avoid duplication and conflict. AID coordinates its efforts on three levels: with other donors, with African country groupings, and with other U.S. Government agencies.

The CDA (Cooperation for Development in Africa) and the Club du Sahel are representative of donor coordinating efforts. During 1982 AID, working with Britain, Belgium, France, Canada, Germany, and Italy, reoriented agricultural research to focus on small holder farming systems. We know that small farms produce more per acre than large farms. Our research, therefore, stresses productive technology for the small farm holders. This year programs will be developed to strengthen national research systems in five separate ecological zones. The CDA health sector committee, chaired by the United States, is now implementing an Africa-wide project to combat childhood communicable diseases which are responsible for much of the mortality among Africa's children. AID continues to work closely with African groups such as CILSS (the Permanent Institute [Interstate] Committee for Drought Control in the Sahel), ECOWAS (the Economic Community of West African States), and SADCC (the Southern African Development Coordination Cooperative). With the other Club du Sahel donors, we are supporting the establishment of a CILSS organization to collect, analyze, and disseminate weather and hydrological data for the Sahel. Much improved land-use and environmental decisions for increasing production will ultimately result from the effort.

On the subject of the Sahel program, we have taken action to improve program and financial management. In the past year we have reviewed accounting systems, trained personnel in financial management, and carefully monitored the program. I am keenly aware of the Congress' concern about the Sahel program, and I want to reassure this Committee that I take the need to continue improving program management very seriously. I have, for example, determined that we must expand the AID Inspector General's audit staff in West Africa to enable more rapid and thorough coverage of the Sahel program. In one case, e.g., Mali, I have cancelled an ongoing project because of deficiencies in administration of the activity. We are continuing to review our own staff capabilities to determine where additional personnel are required to improve financial management and we are undertaking efforts such as the Sahel Financial Management project to increase the capacity in the host government institutions themselves.

The Africa Bureau and its counterparts in the State Department and Treasury, and the U.S. Governors at the IMF and IBRD, have formed a working group to analyze the economic crises affecting several key countries in Africa so that the U.S. Government speaks with one voice on these important issues. This has already led to substantive improvement in assistance in Sudan, and we are optimistic about Kenya and Zambia.

We believe that reinforcing the traditional assistance program with improvements in macroeconomic and sector policies of the African countries along with improved donor coordination can accelerate the development of Africa's considerable resources. This effort can also lead to higher levels of growth and a lasting improvement in the quality of life of African populations.

In FY 1984 we are proposing that the United States provide $963.7 million in assistance to Africa for development and country assistance and PL 480.

The $350.3 million in Development Assistance includes:

—$149.6 million for agriculture and rural development;

—$30.2 million for health activities;

[6] Title II of P.L. 480 authorizes the President to use U.S. agricultural commodities as emergency aid to combat famine and malnutrition abroad. For text of Title II, as amended, see 7 U.S.C. 1721 et seq.

—$33.2 million for education and human resources development;

—$23.7 million to address selected development problems, primarily energy and the private sector;

—$10.6 million for population planning; and

—$103.0 million for the Sahel, primarily for agriculture (food production and environmental reclamation), health, population, and related training.

In addition to Development Assistance we are requesting $409 million in Economic Supporting Funds, primarily for programs in Southern Africa and the Horn of Africa.

In PL 480 we are requesting $204.4 million in PL 480 with $132.5 [million] in Title I and $ 71.9 million for Title II. [7]

Prepared Statement by the Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs (Crocker) Before a Subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, March 8, 1983 [8]

Security and Development Assistance Proposals for Africa

I appreciate this opportunity to discuss with you publicly and for the record our proposals for Africa for 1984. I am most concerned that those of us who are truly committed to a positive future for Africa carefully examine the role of foreign assistance in achieving that future.

American interests in Africa are varied, complex and growing rapidly. They include such obvious material and strategic interests as access to vital minerals and the importance of maintaining partnership with friendly nations flanking the transportation lanes to the Persian Gulf. They include our deep concern for the economic development and growth of Africa, without which the continent cannot realize its great potential.

Americans are tied to Africa by bonds of ancestry and culture. We remain committed to helping Africans suffering the effects of famine and civil strife, all too common in the world's most recently independent continent. We are actively seeking peaceful solutions to the conflicts and problems in southern Africa. We remain equally determined to prevent Soviet, Cuban and Libyan adversaries from taking advantage of Africa's current weaknesses to pursue strategies of destabilization, which could further delay Africa's progress toward economic and political well being.

Above all I believe that the United States, by virtue of our technical skills, economic strength, and humanitarian concern, has the wherewithal to forge a growing and mutually advantageous partnership with Africa. And we know that increasing numbers of African leaders look to the West for help.

The request for economic and military assistance now under consideration is certainly not the only means to help us achieve a more effective partnership with Africa—much can be done by private individuals and organizations—but there can be no doubt that aid is of critical importance. The request is the minimum that is needed to do the job, based on full awareness of budgetary constraints and the sacrifices that cuts in domestic programs are imposing on many Americans.

We are not alone in this effort. Our allies, particularly the Europeans, bear a major share of the burden. Our own contribution of bilateral economic aid ranks third behind France and Germany. The United States is taking the lead in only a few countries, such as Liberia and Sudan,

[7] As of January 1984, the P.L. 480 program for Africa in fiscal year 1984 totaled $211.8 million and was increasing because of the famine in Africa. It included a fiscal year 1984 emergency food aid contribution of $74.2 million (185,000 metric tons). which are of special importance to us. While we welcome the key role of our allies, it is nonetheless clear that further erosion of our assistance levels will threaten our ability to promote U.S. interests or even to cooperate effectively with our allies. In this connection, it must be a matter of concern that although our interests in Africa are steadily increasing, American aid is barely keeping pace with inflation. A recent GAO study notes that in the early 1960's the United States contributed 60 percent of total economic aid, worldwide. Today the level of U.S. bilateral aid is down to 16 percent of worldwide official aid flows. In Africa, U.S. bilateral economic aid is less than 10 percent of official aid from all sources.

ECONOMIC CRISIS: THE THREAT TO AFRICA'S POLITICAL VIABILITY

In the past year we have witnessed growing desperation among African countries, most of which are dependent on one or two primary products for their income, as they have had to suffer the painful consequences of continued low commodity prices. For these countries, declining food production, mushrooming population and skyrocketing international indebtedness are not descriptive terms, but threats to the lives of their people and to their very existence as nations. The impact of today's world recession has been aggravated substantially by the growth-inhibiting economic policies pursued by many African countries over the past generation.

In the last year some two dozen African countries have sought the assistance of the IMF in dealing with their economic difficulties. A dozen or so of these nations have also had to reschedule their external government debt. And still the great majority of African nations face extremely limited short-run prospects for improvement in their financial situations.

The unprecedented economic crisis in Africa threatens U.S. interests on several levels. Unless it is alleviated, African leaders will be increasingly attracted by authoritarian or repressive political strategies with destructive consequences. Although Africa does not have debt problems on the scale of Latin America, default by one or more major African countries would certainly increase present strains on the international financial system. Unchecked economic crisis will in time generate a further burden of famine, refugees and civil strife, deplorable in itself and demanding expensive international relief efforts in response. Finally I would remind you that one out of five U.S. jobs depends in some way on international trade, and that 40 percent of our cropland is devoted to production for export. Weak performance in Africa reduces the growth in our export sales, depresses our economic growth, and slows job creation in the United States.

The successful uses of assistance: ESF and DA

We must not conclude, however, that all is doom and gloom. There are bright spots on the African horizon, and our aid programs have had a significant role in some of them. In Senegal, for example, USAID has been instrumental in improving health conditions, in bringing to rural villages the results of agricultural research and new technological developments, and in increasing crop yields significantly. Our aid has been equally successful in Zimbabwe, where despite political problems, the government has clearly demonstrated its ability to absorb and use effectively our assistance in support of pragmatic economic policies. An ESF-funded commodity import program has provided badly needed direct support for the private sector, among other things enabling a major American firm, Caterpillar, to continue a program which trains black employees in a wide range of skills.

For many countries in Africa, the present crisis requires a two-phased response. The first phase is usually an IMF supported stabilization program which emphasizes short-term balance of payments adjustment. IMF programs often demand painful reform measures, including adjustment of overvalued exchange rates, reduction in domestic budgets, and elimination of subsidies. Relief from unmanageable debt burdens through rescheduling may be a necessary adjunct to an IMF program. If successful, the stabilization phase will eliminate major disincentives to exporters and other domestic producers and set the stage for renewed growth. The second phase is typically an investment program whereby the World Bank and other donors encourage and help finance growth-producing development activities. Our leadership over the past 6 months has been instrumental in organizing such a multifaceted response to Sudan's economic crisis. Within the past month, donors have agreed to support a World Bank approved investment program, the IMF has approved a new stabilization program for Sudan, and official creditors have provided needed debt relief.

Our aid is essential in both phases. Fast disbursing balance of payments assistance, often provided in the form of ESF, may be required to help close the balance of payments gap in conjunction with the IMF and other donors. Our balance-of-payments support is directly keyed to economic reform efforts being urged by the IBRD and IMF. Later in the investment phase, both project and nonproject aid funded with Development Assistance, ESF and Public Law 480, can be provided with accompanying technical assistance to help get the growth process going again. It is essential that the two phases—stabilization and growth—be presented together, because unless African leaders perceive and understand and can reasonably count on the relationship between austerity and growth, they will hardly be willing to take the political risks which this process demands of them.

Our ESF programs provide much appreciated, fast-acting assistance to key countries like Kenya and Sudan precisely when they are undertaking painful and expensive reform measures. These programs also have high developmental content. One common means of disbursing such aid is the commodity import program, or CIP. This mechanism has the added advantage of stimulating American exports to promising African markets. CIP's enable us to provide capital goods and spare parts without which local American firms, often squeezed by severe foreign exchange shortages, might go under. The result is a boost to the private sector, frequently to firms which are training Africans, contributing to agricultural development, and serving as agents of technology, as in Zimbabwe. A significant component of our CIP programs in Africa consists of inputs of importance to the local agricultural sector: fertilizer and farm machinery are two examples which spring to mind. Without our programs these countries could not afford such imports, leading to even further declines in their food production. Finally, when CIP-financed goods are sold they generate local currencies which are jointly administered by AID and the host government to fund development activities.

Africa's crisis demands a balanced and flexible mixture of project and nonproject economic assistance designed to help meet a combination of short, medium and long-term requirements. The growth in nonproject aid in recent years, delivered primarily through ESF and Title I Public Law 480, reflects the depth of the current crisis and the consequent emphasis on successful economic stabilization. The need for such assistance is recognized by virtually all development experts, and was endorsed by the World Bank's 1981 study, "Accelerated Development in Sub-Saharan Africa: an Agenda for Action," [9] which noted that "quick disbursing balance of payments assistance is critically needed in some countries to permit fuller operation and maintenance of existing productive capacity and infrastructure."

Our project aid continues to support programs in the important fields of agriculture, health, population and manpower development. The effectiveness of these projects and their long range impact on economic development is obviously strengthened if they are carried out in the context of sound national economic policies. Many of these projects have been instrumental in helping the Africans to manage essential, but often drastic, policy changes and programs devoted to serving the "basic human needs" concept.

ADDRESSING AFRICA'S SECURITY AND DEVELOPMENT NEEDS

Whatever we and the Africans themselves may wish, the politics of survival dictate that for the majority of African countries security and development are inseparable. In Africa, the security problem is particularly difficult because not only are the economies weak and vulnerable, but the means of legitimate self-defense are expensive and draw on scarce resources. Our answer to Africa must include a response to legitimate needs, both for self-defense and for development. In shaping our response we have focused most heavily on the economic requirement, but we have not and must not neglect the defense needs of our friends in Africa who face direct threats from abroad.

Terms of partnership

In undertaking a response to Africa's several problems, we cannot force on Africa solutions that we would reject for [9] The study was prepared by Elliot J. Berg.

READEX FICHE

ourselves as untenable and unrealistic. Instead, in his speech this past November in Kenya, Vice President Bush spoke explicitly of the kind of partnership with Africa that this administration views as possible and desirable:

> "Because we believe that Africa has the capacity and will to be master of her own destiny, President Reagan has, over the past 20 months, worked to forge a new and mature partnership with the nations and people of Africa. We speak of a partnership that begins with mutual respect. We speak of a partnership that includes honest discussions. We speak of a partnership which recognizes that each nation must do its part if the goals we share are to be achieved. Partnership is a two way street based on shared goals, common principles and mutual interests." [10]

What we envision and propose for Africa is a program of security and developmental assistance that takes into consideration African needs and realities as well as our own interests and capabilities. Because we are so convinced of the importance of the undertakings and the commitment we are asking the Congress to make on behalf of the American people, I want to make clear to you the process by which we arrived at the request levels we are placing before you today.

Security assistance to Africa: Myths and realities

I believe we need to begin by dealing with the pernicious misconception that this administration's goal is to arm Africa and in so doing contribute to both the diversion of funds that could be used for development and the increase of Africa's debt burden. In 1981, all of Africa, with the exception of Egypt, accounted for less than 1 percent of the total value of U.S. exports of defense articles and services. The foremost supplier of military equipment in Africa continues to be the Soviet Union; the United States is fourth or fifth on the list. African nations themselves have asked us for assistance in assuring their security.

Madam Chairwoman, [11] the administration is often criticized for requesting funds for large, expensive military assistance programs that wind up in ruins and that detract from the critical need for economic development. I would like to take a moment to set the record straight. The United States can point with pride to the fact that the great majority of our programs in Africa are successful. These programs, ranging from armored cars in Botswana to helicopters in Kenya to housing construction in Liberia, are effective, operating programs. Additionally, a great many of these programs have had direct beneficial civilian spin-offs in terms of infrastructure improvements and trained manpower.

We have successful ongoing programs in Botswana, Gabon, Kenya, Liberia, Senegal, Sudan, and Somalia. These programs run the gamut from engineering in Liberia, Senegal, and Sudan to aviation in Kenya and mechanized infantry and armor in Botswana, Gabon, and Somalia. These programs have not only added to the capabilities of the host military but have introduced senior officials to the concepts of planning, budgeting, and logistics that are vital to the success of any military organization. I would also like to point out that all of the United States FMS programs in Africa have come in at, or under, the projected cost.

These programs also provide direct civilian benefits. The engineering and construction programs in Kenya, Liberia, Senegal, and Sudan have made direct contributions in the form of new facility and housing construction and of building and improving roads in both urban and rural areas. Communications programs in Somalia and Sudan allow the units in remote areas to communicate with population centers, not only for military purposes but also to get needed attention to civilian requirements and emergencies. Through both our IMET and FMS training programs we have trained large numbers of managers and technicians who are now providing much needed skills in their own countries. These skills range from finance, to administration, to engineering, to avionics, to electronics, and vehicle maintenance to name a few.

Finally, I must once again bring to your attention the tremendous success of our International Military Education and Training (IMET) program. Without exception, each of our Ambassadors reports that IMET is one of the most valuable programs we have to offer. Each of our missions would like to have more IMET to offer to the host country. We are beginning to see remarkable improvements in military management and equipment operation and maintenance in those countries where we have these programs. I cannot overemphasize the importance and value of our IMET program in Africa.

The vetting process

With regard to requests from African nations themselves for security assistance, let me point out that the close scrutiny the American people rightfully demand of such assistance requires that the administration employ a very careful screening process to assess the validity of a country's declaration of need. In the case of FMS/MAP, for example, the Department of Defense is often asked to lend its expertise and undertake a survey of needs. When the survey indicates that a need does exist, a stringent vetting process within the administration as a whole measures individual country requirements against other policy demands, both foreign and domestic. The bulk of our FMS/MAP program is concentrated in a few key countries such as Sudan, Somalia, Niger and Kenya.

I submit that a careful review by the Congress of the kind of security assistance we are requesting for Africa will clearly demonstrate that we are not ignoring developmental goals in favor of military sales. Instead, I have tried to make clear how critically key African countries need ESF assistance if they are to bridge the gap between economic and political survival created by the demands of economic reform programs, as you can see by our request of $963.7M in economic assistance against a total of $202.3M for military programs.

PART II—SECURITY ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS IN AFRICA

In seeking to address the issue of security assistance to Africa, we must first understand our own interests in that part of the world and our goal in view of those interests. It is important that we realize that for the most part, our actions in Africa are undertaken in concert with our Western Allies. We in the West see Africa as an important part of the global reality we all face. Africa's size, location, population, the number of governments Sub-Saharan Africa represents in international organizations; Africa's potential in terms of strategic minerals, trade, investment, and the global economic picture; the human needs the continent represents in light of our traditional humanitarian concerns: all of these factors shape the West's interest in Africa's development.

Our interests are best served by political and economic stability, which foster the peaceful development of modern African economic and political institutions that can interact with our own to mutual advantage. As Vice President Bush said in Nairobi last November, our overarching strategic goal in Africa is to help establish a framework for restraint and broad rules of conduct that will limit and discourage the application of outside force in African conflicts. We do not, however, view security assistance as a simple question of military assistance.

We continue to emphasize economic over military assistance at a ratio of better than 4 to 1. Peaceful development is the only way Africa will find solutions to the critical social and economic challenges which threaten security.

Africa is struggling to survive its worst economic crisis since World War II. This explains our emphasis on economic assistance. We recognize that even minimal conditions of security in Africa are impossible unless African states can stabilize their battered economies and regain the path of development. When insecurity is fueled by destabilization from external forces, and when instability is fed by internal economic difficulties, we promote African, as well as our own, interests in helping African friends to resist and overcome these factors. Let me turn now to a discussion of specific programs and concerns that fall under the Security Assistance rubric.

SOUTHERN AFRICA

Perhaps nowhere in Africa have our own security concerns, and our own security policies, coincided with African security needs and been more intensely engaged than in southern Africa. This region, from Zaire to the Cape of Good Hope, contains the bulk of Africa's mineral wealth, its most developed industrial structure, and almost two-thirds of the continent's GNP.

It is also a region threatened with the prospect of heightened violence and polarization that could lead to Great Power confrontation. It is precisely to avoid that possibility of violence and confrontation that we have fashioned a major effort to bring about regional peace and security. We have launched a policy of constructive engagement with all the states of the region who wish the same with us. A major policy objective is to provide an alternative to conflict, not only in Namibia but throughout the region. Vice President Bush summed up our policy in Nairobi last November when he said, "We are determined to help turn the sad tide of growing conflict and tension in southern Africa."

The United States and its Western allies are in a unique position to play a leading role in helping southern Africa reverse the trend of mounting violence and avoid disaster. The material resources we require in support of this regional diplomatic effort are comparatively modest but absolutely essential to its success.

Our Security Assistance request for southern Africa in fiscal year 1984 includes $155 million for ESF, $24 million for FMS/MAP, and $1.975 million IMET, for a total of $180.975 million. Our Supplemental request for 1983 totals $22.0 million in ESF and $21.0 million in FMS/MAP.

In order to elucidate how these requests fit into our strategy for the region, however, I shall address some specific programs.

Zaire

Zaire's size, mineral wealth and the fact that much of its southern border, including the borders of twice-invaded Shaba province, are contiguous with Angola's and Zambia's northern borders make Zaire's continued stability and viability important to our southern African strategy. We are concerned that recurrence of turmoil in Shaba province could have a disquieting effect on both Angola and Zambia that would hamper the West's efforts to engage those two states in the process of resolving southern Africa's regional conflicts.

Zaire faces critical economic problems and we are engaged with other allies, especially Belgium and France, the World Bank and the IMF in a broad based assistance effort. In 1983 France's total assistance to Zaire will be about $60 million and Belgium's about $90 million. Our own fiscal year 1983 assistance level, including DA and the Supplemental, will total about $48.5 million. In fiscal year 1984 we are proposing a total of $43.4 million.

From the FMS/MAP perspective, we have a C-130 program that is an important part of an agreement on our part with our allies and with Zaire to help with military airlift capability for the brigades now being trained by Belgium, France, China and Israel. Since we were able to provide only $2 million MAP and $2 million FMS under the CR for fiscal year 1983,[12] we are requesting an additional $8 million FMS and $8 million MAP in the supplemental for a total of $20 million in 1983, as well as $10 million in fiscal year 1984, in order to restore the C-130 program to a working level.

We are also requesting $7 million in ESF in the fiscal year 1983 Supplemental and $10 million in 1984 to be used for Commodity Import Programs (CIP). We are aware that this Committee indicated last year that it wished us not to expend ESF monies in Zaire until a record of compliance with the IMF is established.[13] We have reason to hope that the current effort being made by the Zairian Government to deal with some of the graver issues of mismanagement and lack of accountability that have proved damaging to its economy will in fact lead to an accord with the IMF in fiscal year 1983. Disbursements of our assistance will depend upon the existence of this record.

Our part in assisting Zaire's economic recovery will be directed toward revitalization of the private sector. Zaire's domestic industry is operating at from 25 to 40 percent of capacity because of shortages of imported equipment, spare parts and raw materials. The $7 million ESF in 1983 would be expended in those areas. The

Zimbabwe

Zimbabwe's emergence 3 years ago as a newly independent nation was a seminal event in the political evolution of southern Africa. The West's decision to assist Zimbabwe was based on our hope that Zimbabwe's development would reflect the best of our own values: commitment to respect for individual rights and freedoms, racial equality and integration, economic productivity and growth leading to a better life for its citizens.

This year, under the Continuing Resolution (CR), we fell $15 million short of the $75 million we requested for 1983 as part of our pledge to provide $75 million for the 3 years 1982–84. I hope this Committee will assist us in keeping that pledge in 1983 and in 1984 by giving Zimbabwe the funds we are requesting.

Recently widely-reported events in Zimbabwe may lead some to question whether we should keep our commitment. I hope this Committee will understand that it is critical that we remain engaged in Zimbabwe's future. Zimbabwe is a new nation whose leadership faces many competing and simultaneous pressures and demands. Its government has committed itself to a pragmatic course of economic policy, to the rule of law and to the path of reconciliation and respect for international frontiers. We take those commitments seriously, and have made our views known in an appropriate manner when we have concerns about developments in that country.

Moreover, we are sensitive to public perception in this country of our relationship with key countries in Africa—such as Zimbabwe and South Africa—just as we are in other regions.

Having said this, we are also deeply aware of the long-term and complex nature of the process of building stability and fostering peaceful change in southern Africa. If we expect to achieve instant results or consistent improvement, we are bound to be disappointed. Our policy recognizes this reality and the importance of this region to the West. To a certain degree, we are exposed to the risk of occasional disappointment. This is because we have assumed an active, positive and conciliatory stance toward the states of southern Africa, not a self-righteous, admonitory one. Africa's political future will hinge in substantial part on the ways in which the deep tensions of southern Africa are resolved.

It is for these reasons that this administration has adopted a policy of constructive engagement in southern Africa. There is no other responsible course for American policy. The goal we seek in southern Africa involves Zimbabwe as well as South Africa, Angola as well as Namibia, Botswana as well as Mozambique. Our reason for not turning our backs on Zimbabwe is the same reason for not turning our backs on South Africa: the price of success may be great, but the price of failure cannot be borne.

Other southern Africa programs

The compelling nature of our interests in southern Africa demands a response that indeed encompasses all of the states of the region. It is for this reason that we are requesting assistance both for specific countries and for a southern Africa regional program.

In Botswana, our objective is to strengthen that country's border security and thus provide a deterrent to destabilizing forces in the region. Past unresponsiveness on the part of the United States to Botswana's security concerns contributed to the formation of a limited military supply relationship with the Soviet Union. We view our FMS and ESF requests for Botswana as important to the continued ability of this moderate, democratic, multiparty state to make an active, positive contribution to the peaceful evolution of the region. We are requesting $10 million in ESF and $11 million in MAP/FMS guarantees in 1984 as well as an additional $2 million FMS in the fiscal year 1983 Supplemental to assist Botswana with building an adequate air defense, while at the same time helping to meet the developmental needs of its people. Our ESF program is focused on the country's agriculture and health sectors.

Our fiscal year 1984 request for $20 million in ESF for Zambia is based on equal concern about the continuing ability of a key player to sustain an important role in the evolution of events in southern Africa. Zambia has undertaken a positive approach to efforts to find a solution to the Namibia problem and other regional issues. The strategic location of Zambia, its mineral wealth in cobalt and copper, and the support it has lent to the concept of peaceful solutions to the conflicts of the region make it important that we contribute to efforts to help that nation survive its current economic difficulties. Our programs in Zambia are principally related to agriculture, and specifically focused on increasing productivity and reducing imports.

The Southern Africa Regional Program for which we are requesting $40 million in ESF in 1984 is designed to complement our country-specific programs in addressing developmental issues that must be resolved if regional stability is to be achieved. The program is specifically directed toward two goals: (1) assisting the regional development efforts of the black-majority ruled countries in the Southern Africa Regional [Development] Coordinating Conference (SADCC) in the fields of transportation, communications and manpower training and (2) educational assistance to South African youth disadvantaged by the practice of apartheid in South Africa's educational system. For example, 116 students are currently studying in the United States and we hope eventually to place over 400 disadvantaged South Africans in U.S. universities.

EAST AFRICA

Our interests in East Africa and the Horn reflect to a great extent the region's considerable strategic significance to the West because of shipping and oil tanker lanes leading to Europe. Somalia and Kenya are critical to our logistical supply systems in the event of a security crisis in the Gulf or Middle East and Sudan plays a key role in containing Libyan aggression in East and Central Africa. The three recipients of a major portion of our total assistance to East Africa are Sudan, Somalia and Kenya, which together account for $498.9 million of the total $520.6 million (including DA, Public Law 480 and SA) we are requesting for East African and Indian Ocean countries.

Sudan

Sudan's greatest needs are economic, but recent events involving Libya make clear the need for traditional military assistance as well. [14] We are asking for $25 million ESF for Sudan in the Supplemental as well as $57.5 million FMS/MAP. This will mean $25 million more in ESF for 1983 than we originally requested for Sudan, but $24.5 million less in FMS/MAP in 1983 than we had originally requested. For 1984 we are requesting $120 million ESF and $60 million MAP monies.

Our emphasis on quick-disbursing ESF money stems from our concern that the most serious threat to stability in Sudan is internal political discontent as a result of poor economic conditions. Over the past 18 months Sudan has implemented a series of politically difficult economic reforms and far-reaching austerity measures. Despite these efforts, and despite increased agricultural productivity, Sudan's balance of payments gap remains close to the 1981 level, when the United States gave $100 million in a worldwide effort that provided $800 million to Sudan. The World Bank's recent reappraisal of Sudan's debt commitments in light of declining world prices for Sudan's principal exports has led the Bank to conclude that Sudan will need continued high levels of assistance for several years. As Sudan's closest Western friend, we are seeking to maintain the level of assistance needed both to help sustain Sudan through this difficult period and to encourage other countries to be as supportive as possible.

Our diplomatic efforts, supported by our significant assistance level, were instrumental in securing about $780 million in new aid commitments from donors at the World Bank sponsored Consultative Group meeting in mid-January. This aid level will enable Sudan to implement the first year of a 3-year, World Bank designed recovery program. It has also, in combination with devaluation and other economic reforms by the Sudanese and with the debt relief provided by Sudan's creditors, made a new IMF economic stabilization program possible.

Somalia

As one of the countries on the Horn with which we have a facilities access agreement, Somalia's stability and independence are important to Western interests in the Horn. Somalia was attacked last year by Ethiopian forces which continue to hold two towns in Somali territory. [15] Somalia's own past history of irredentism has contributed to tensions in the region and raised questions on the part of some about possible provocations by Somalia. In this instance, however, we believe Ethiopia was the aggressor. Ethiopia possesses massive amounts of Soviet arms and has the largest standing army in Sub-Saharan Africa, one much larger and better equipped than the Somali army. It also has a security treaty with Libya and South Yemen. The apparent purpose of this incursion was to try to provoke the downfall of the Somali Government.

The case of Somalia is a vivid illustration of how our military assistance has helped a friendly country cope with hostile acts by a neighboring country. Last summer Soviet and Libyan-backed Ethiopian forces attacked Somalia along the common border and penetrated Somali territory. We responded to Somalia's request for assistance to defend its territory with two emergency airlifts. Our assistance reinforced our commitment to help a friend in protecting its territorial integrity and demonstrated to our adversaries that we will not stand idly by when hostile forces engage in such flagrant acts against our friends.

It is in this context that we are seeking $9 million MAP/FMS for Somalia in the 1983 Supplemental (to bring funds up to the $30 million we originally requested) and $35 million ESF and $40 million MAP in fiscal year 1984. Our military assistance is geared toward enhancing Somalia's ability to deter Ethiopian attacks.

ESF monies will provide short-term balance of payments relief through a CIP directed at providing raw materials, spare parts and the capital equipment necessary to rehabilitate the agricultural sector. Funds will also be used to help finance work on Kilamayo port.

Kenya

The August 1982 coup attempt in Kenya [16] raised critical questions about the viability of a country which has been viewed by the West as one of Africa's success stories and as key to the protection of Western strategic interests in the region. The coup attempt, however, destroyed neither our relations with Kenya nor civilian institutions in that country. What the coup did was to force Kenya and the Western community focus on the interplay between economic and political stability, the need for economic reforms in Kenya and the vulnerability of even the most successful of developing nations when faced with a worldwide economic crisis.

We are asking for $19.5 million FMS/MAP in the Supplemental to reach the $35 million level we had originally requested. For 1984 we are asking for $35 million MAP/FMS and $42 million ESF. The FMS/MAP funds will be used in part to help maintain the F-5 and helicopter programs, as requested by the Kenyan Government. The ESF monies will be used for a Commodity Import Program designed to finance items crucial to the agricultural production process. The purpose is to ensure that the foreign exchange shortages now affecting Kenya do not have a harmful impact on food and export crop production. The counterpart funds generated by the CIP will be used for credit programs, extension services and other activities directed to farm production.

West and Central Africa

Our security interests in West and Central Africa focus on two concerns, the continued stability and viability of Nigeria and the needs of nations facing threats of subversion or outright agression from Libya. Nigeria is one of our country's primary sources of imported oil and is a dominant economic force within the 16-nation Economic Community of West Africa States (ECOWAS). Due to the sharp drop in world oil prices Nigeria faces a precipitous reduction in its budgetary revenues and foreign exchange, which is having a severe impact upon its domestic economy. While we have no economic or security assistance programs for Nigeria, and none are contemplated for fiscal year 1984, we will give sustained attention to Nigeria's economic difficulties in our continuing high level dialogue with this important country in the months to come.

border and occupied two small towns in northeast Somalia. The dissidents belonged to the Somali Democratic Liberation Front, allegedly financed in part by Libya. On July 24, 1982, the Department of State announced that the United States had begun flying weapons and military equipment into Somalia to assist it in repelling the raids.

Chad

Chad is one of two countries in Africa (the other was Uganda under Idi Amin) in which Libyan troops have openly intervened in an attempt to impose a government to Libya's liking, which it did from December 1980 until November 1981, when Libyan forces withdrew under pressure from the OAU. The United States on that occasion allocated $12 million for airlift and support of Zairian and Nigerian contingents in the OAU Peacekeeping Force. We also provided $17.8 million to Chad in fiscal year 1982 for emergency economic assistance, including food aid. Since then we have joined a multidonor effort to revive Chad's war-ravaged economy and central government operations. We plan to provide approximately $10 million for food and humanitarian assistance in fiscal year 1983 and have requested $9 million in DA in fiscal year 1984. Without this help Chad will have difficulty withstanding continuing Libyan subversion and the threat of a second military incursion. Although we look to France and other allies to provide Chad with needed security assistance, we are seeking $50,000 in IMET for fiscal year 1984 and are keeping Chad's needs under regular review in light of the recently heightened Libyan menace.

Niger and Senegal

Niger and Senegal are two moderate states in the Sahel under regular political, economic and security-related subversive pressures from Libya, but which publicly resist them. Niger shares a common border with Libya and stands in the way of Colonel Qadhafi's pan-Saharan expansionist ambitions. Senegalese troops had to help put down a bloody coup attempt by Libyan-inspired revolutionaries in neighboring Gambia, which has led to the formal creation of the Sene-Gambian Federation,[17] in large part because of common security needs caused by Libya's efforts at subversion. To meet Niger's additional requirements, we are requesting $1.3 million in FMS guaranty and $2.5 million in MAP in fiscal year 1983 Supplemental funds and $5 million in ESF in fiscal year 1984. We are also seeking to assist Senegal at this time of particularly urgent need with a fiscal year 1983 Supplemental request for $2.5 million FMS guaranty and $2.5 million MAP; $10 million in ESF in fiscal year 1984 is also requested.

CONCLUSION

At a time when domestic budgetary constraints demand scrupulous examination of any proposed expenditures, we all face difficult decisions with regard to requests for foreign assistance. The amount we are asking for Sub-Saharan Africa, however, comes to about 14 percent of the total foreign assistance budget request. It is the minimum the United States needs to sustain its part of the commitment we have undertaken with our allies to further Africa's development. In asking you to support this request, I also ask you to keep in mind the gravity of Africa's need and the importance to our own future, in terms of export markets, trade and jobs, not to mention meeting humanitarian concerns which are central to the Western tradition, of helping Africa to survive the threat to its political and economic growth and stability that is posed by the current economic crisis.

Letter From the Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs (Crocker) to Representative Clarence D. Long, May 3, 1983 [18]

"A Proper Balance" Between U.S. Economic and Military Assistance to Africa

DEAR MR. LONG: At your April 28 hearing on the Administration's FY 84 foreign assistance request you asked for the percentage increase between what the Congress approved for 1983 and what we requested for 1984.[19] Let me preface my response by saying that I realize from your perspective it appears that the Administration comes back to the Congress every year with requests for sizable increases in our military assistance. Mr. Chairman, that is not the case in the African context. What I am sure you are comparing, and understandably so, is the FY 83 Continuing Resolution level and the next fiscal year's request. However, if you look at the request level from year to year you will see that the military assistance figures show a very slight increase and that the request for economic assistance shows a moderate but we believe adequate increase—especially in light of U.S. domestic budget constraints.

From FY 82 to FY 83 the requested military assistance actually decreased 10%, and from FY 83 to FY 84 the request level shows an increase of a mere 4%. Our economic request levels for this same period clearly show our concern for not only the economic plight in Africa, but also our awareness of the necessity for a proper balance between our military and economic assistance. For these same periods economic assistance requests have seen increases of 6% and 13%, respectively.

Another meaningful statistic, Mr. Chairman, is that in the worldwide context Africa in FY 84 accounts for only 12% of total U.S. bilateral assistance worldwide: 3% of the military and 14% of the economic totals. I hope you will agree with me that we are in fact stretching these modest resources a long way in Africa and in so doing are achieving some notable gains.

I understand also your concern with regard to the FY 83 supplemental request. When the appropriated assistance is less than the requested level, as in FY 83, Africa usually suffers disproportionate cuts. Given the fact that our requests for Africa were modest to begin with, even the smallest cut has significant and potentially disastrous consequences. Under the current CR we would be short $107 out of $219 million of our requested FMS/MAP, and $47 out of $313 million in the ESF amount. For that reason, passage of the supplemental is essential to the success of our African policy.

Let me thank you for the opportunity to appear before your subcommittee; I hope that we can remain in close touch on these issues. I sincerely hope that we will have your support when it comes to appropriating the resources required for Africa.

Sincerely,

CHESTER A. CROCKER

Report by the House Foreign Affairs Committee, May 17, 1983 (Extract) [20]

. . . . . .

The committee is deeply concerned about the lack of sufficient food for the growing populations of sub-Saharan Africa. While Africa's population has been increasing at an annual rate of 2.8 percent, food production has actually declined over the past decade by an estimated minus 1.2 percent annually on a per capita basis. The decrease in agricultural yields per capita has been exacerbated recently by severe drought, particularly in the southern Africa region and Ethiopia.

The committee welcomes the executive branch's provision of emergency food AID for drought victims in Ethiopia and urges a favorable response to the funding appeal of the U.N. Disaster Relief Organization (UNDRO). For the longer term solution to Africa's food crisis, it calls for redoubled efforts by the United States and other donors to help African countries raise their food production. Meanwhile Africa's food aid needs for deficit areas must be given full consideration in allocations under the Public Law 480 program.

With respect to U.S. bilateral population assistance to Africa, the committee believes that AID should expand its bilateral programs, and notes that ESF funds may be used for this developmental purpose in countries receiving ESF, in addition to whatever development assistance funding is available. It also believes that more effective use can be made of development assistance money already allotted to population programs. AID has heavily forward-funded population programs in certain African countries, a practice unnecessarily tying up funds urgently needed elsewhere. Given the importance the committee places also on support for multilateral and nongovernmental programs, which are active in many African countries not receiving bilateral AID population assistance, AID should review its forward-funding policy to see if the money can be used more effectively to meet urgent needs of multilateral and nongovernmental programs. (The committee noted that under sec. 104(f) of the Foreign Assistance Act,[21] no AID funds, including funds made available to multilateral and nongovernmental population organizations, may be used to finance abortion as a method of family planning.)

In a 1982 appearance before the Subcommittee on Africa, AID made a commitment to assign at least six additional population officers in the region.[22] To date, only one additional population officer has been appointed. The committee requests that AID provide a status report by December 1, 1983, on its efforts to assign additional population officers in the African region.

Building Trade With Africa

Mr. Chairman, the title of this hearing is "Building Trade with Africa." The subject implied by the committee's written questions is, however, clearly somewhat broader, involving aid, investment and other aspects of this Administration's policy of emphasizing the private sector in our relationship with Africa. We firmly believe that this broader perspective is correct, and that it would be a mistake to see our export trade relationship with Africa in isolation from other concerns. In the end, our exports to Africa will depend on the growth and development of the African economies. The question is how we can influence this process, and your interest, if we understand correctly, is focussed on the role of African and American entrepreneurs, large and small, in attaining mutual goals.

The subject under discussion is of great concern to us. Virtually every action we have taken in the last 3 years has emphasized the theme of encouraging the private sector as an agent of economic growth and development in Africa. We view such growth and development as a prerequisite for our broader goal of a just, prosperous and stable Africa—a goal which is first and foremost that of the Africans themselves. We have been at pains to emphasize that this policy is not one of "stuffing capitalism down the throats of reluctant socialists," that it is responsive to African aspirations, and that it encompasses small producers and entrepreneurs (including farmers), both in Africa and in the United States, as well as larger, sometimes multinational corporate traders and investors. Ours is a multiple agenda—encouraging small-scale African producers, helping build institutions and policies that will underpin large-scale African enterprise in the future, and supporting our own traders and investors in their efforts to venture into this often unfamiliar world.

One of the purposes of this hearing is to determine how the State Department and other agencies work together to implement this new policy. Briefly, State's role has three aspects, each rooted in our conviction that a stronger private sector relationship with our African partners will be politically and economically advantageous to both sides. First, the State Department in Washington encourages greater attention by our specialized economic agencies—Commerce, OPIC, EXIM, AID, and others—to the problems and opportunities of the world's least developed continent. Second, at our Embassies abroad, State Department commercial officers implement a number of programs and offer a host of services to visiting U.S. businessmen. Third, in cooperation with Commerce and other agencies, we have an active outreach program to acquaint American business here at home, most emphatically including small and minority business, with the challenge of trade and investment in Africa and the relevant U.S. Government support services. . . .

In conclusion, we would like to say a little about the future, and what could be done better. It goes without saying that we have a long way to go. Viewed from the end of a world recession, and bearing in mind that recovery will come last to Africa, the distance sometimes seems infinite. In 1982, according to the latest Commerce Department figures, U.S. imports from sub-Saharan Africa fell by 15%, partly due to sharp decline in oil purchases from Nigeria, while our exports were off by almost seven percent, from $6.6 billion in 1981 to $5.4 billion in 1982.

These figures certainly do not mean that Africa is a hopeless case. They do illustrate something we already know—that commodity dependent LDCs have been particularly hard hit by world recession. They underline the urgency of African economies diversifying and developing a broader range of productive activities, beginning necessarily with the traditionally neglected agricultural sector. They also suggest that our approach to these deeply troubled economies should not, indeed cannot be "business as usual."

First, we can push through to completion the administration's current legislative agenda, including passage of a revised Foreign Corrupt Practices Act [24] to eliminate needless ambiguities in that law. We can press ahead with our agenda of bilateral investment treaties (BITs) to help regularize our private sector relationships in Africa and elsewhere. BIT negotiations are, among other things, a useful vehicle for engaging in dialogue with African governments on means of improving the local investment climate.

We must further refine our ongoing effort to encourage, largely through AID, the kinds of institutions and policies that will support, not stifle, the most productive elements in African society. I would note that AID is pursuing this effort on two tracks. In its agriculture, health and other programs, AID's Africa Bureau engages in constant dialogue with African governments to improve the policy, regulatory and legal framework, with the aim of stimulating indigenous private enterprise and increasing entrepreneurial and managerial skill. AID's programs are also designed to maximize the role of market forces as opposed to the practice (prevalent among many aid donors in the past) of relying exclusively on government bureaucracies and often creating new ones. Meanwhile, the new Private Enterprise Bureau (PRE), as you will no doubt hear in more detail from Elise Dupont, [25] is designing experimental projects in selected countries to develop financial institutions and intermediaries and to assist governments in privatizing state-owned enterprises. PRE is also developing a program of private sector advisory services which will be available to be drawn upon by individual AID missions in Africa and around the world.

It was mentioned earlier that one of the Africa Bureau's functions is to stimulate, wherever possible, adequate allocation of resources to Africa by our specialized economic agencies. A recent study by the Battelle Corporation entitled "Obstacles to Private Sector Activities in Africa" [26] concludes that the State Department should accelerate and formalize this coordinating role. I would note that although the study was sponsored by the State Department, we certainly did not "precook" the results. We, nevertheless, find the conclusions interesting and will be studying it with some care.

One theme that pervades the Battelle Study—and that is echoed by practically anyone with business experience in Africa—is the concerted manner in which the Europeans and Japanese devote resources to their traders and investors. This support is sometimes in the form of subsidization (e.g., the use of mixed credits which, with limited exception in the case of agricultural commodities, are contrary to U.S. policy). Underlying this issue, however, is a totally different relationship between government and business and how they relate to Third World economic policies. Our allies see aid as serving multiple ends, including political objectives, export promotion and facilitation of investment as well as development. Indeed they see these goals as complementary, not conflicting. Their approach is epitomized by the Lomé convention, [27] which wraps aid, trade and technology transfer instruments into one contractual relationship between the European Community and its former colonies.

Our own approach is very different. U.S. business and government have traditionally operated independently, and U.S. Government economic agencies each pursue separate and usually distinct objectives. The American public and indeed the U.S. Congress often perceives aid as a kind of charity, not as a means of enhancing our own self interest. Political and/or commercial objectives are typically regarded as antithetical to the goal of development. In short, our policy does not integrate political, aid, trade and investment goals.

The administration's Caribbean Basin Initiative (CBI) [28] represents a modest step away from our traditional approach, toward the European model. Perhaps we should consider whether the poorest countries, many of which are in Africa, do not also deserve a measure of special treatment. It could take many forms, not necessarily similar to the CBI. But there is no question that we need to give serious thought to this issue—how to make our policy fit the special conditions of Africa and serve our own broadening political and economic objectives.

From our perspective it seems obvious that there is indeed a relationship between our various goals. Surely political stability in Africa is a sine qua non for economic stability. Development in the agricultural sector will create new opportunities for U.S. trade and investment, especially in the field of agribusiness where the United States leads the world. Seen from this point of view, our aid, if it successfully stimulates a better investment climate, is anything but charity, and our commercial concerns can hardly be divorced from our interest in African development.

Message From President Reagan to the Chairman of the Organization of African Unity (Moi), May 25, 1983 [29]

20th Anniversary of the OAU

On the occasion of the Twentieth Anniversary of the Organization of African Unity, it is both a pleasure and an honor for me to express the congratulations and good wishes of the people of the United States to you as Chairman of the OAU and to the member nations of the organization. The United States shares with the OAU its objectives of "freedom, equality, justice, and dignity for all African peoples."

We also support the fundamental principles of the OAU, embodied in Article III of your charter: [30] sovereign equality of all member states; non-interference in the internal affairs of states; territorial integrity; peaceful settlement of disputes; condemnation of political assassination and subversion; dedication to the total emancipation of still dependent African territories; and genuine nonalignment. We believe the OAU has made a positive contribution to stability and progress in Africa over the past 20 years, and that it has the potential for even greater accomplishments in the years to come.

The United States remains supportive of African efforts to seek a cessation of conflict and violence, as well as efforts aimed at meaningful economic progress. And we firmly agree that African problems can best be solved by African solutions. We applaud when your Organization moves forward to meet serious challenges on the African Continent, as was demonstrated by the OAU's peacekeeping force in Chad.

The OAU has experienced a difficult 20th year, perhaps the most difficult year in its history. We are confident, however, as most OAU member states must be, that the Organization can and will continue to provide the unique forum for continental cooperation. We wish the OAU well on this important day marking the Organization's first two decades, and we wish it well in all the years ahead.

Remarks by the Secretary of State (Shultz), May 25, 1983 [31]

Support for OAU Fundamental Principles

This is an important event, the 20th anniversary of the Organization of African Unity. And I am very pleased, enthusiastic for the opportunity to be here on this occasion.

As President Reagan made clear in his message to your chairman, President arap Moi of Kenya, [32] the United States knows well the positive contribution that the OAU has made to stability and progress in Africa over the past 20 years and the potential it has for even greater accomplishments in the years to come. It is clear to us that the fundamental principles of the OAU deserve the support, not only of the members of the OAU, but of all peaceloving nations. They certainly have our support.

Not long after I became Secretary, I met with many of your foreign ministers and permanent representatives in New York at a special OAU luncheon. Africa's prominence in the international community was much on my mind then, and has remained so ever since.

The administration attaches great importance to our relations with Africa. Namibian independence under internationally acceptable terms constitutes one of our principal foreign policy objectives. And, I might say, Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Chester Crocker, here, has been working his heart out on that as have many others of us in the Department, and the President has spent a great deal of time and effort and energy on this. And, as I plan to say to several of your colleagues in New York this week,[33] we remain fully committed to the work of the Contact Group and are hopeful that its negotiations, and those in which we are engaged on related regional issues of peace, will prove successful.

And I might say in connection with southern Africa and in connection with the apartheid system, I would say unambiguously, unequivocally, with no qualifications whatever, that the system of apartheid is unjust and unacceptable.

The OAU has a noble tradition of promoting the peaceful resolution of conflict on the continent. The United States seeks the same objective, whether in southern Africa, the Western Sahara, or the Horn. We are particularly pleased to be able to work together in making a modest contribution to the deployment of the OAU's first peacekeeping force last year. Strengthened regional security is a cardinal objective of U.S. policy in Africa. It has been a cornerstone of the OAU's role and objectives for 20 years. This simple fact explains why we attach importance to the health and vitality of Africa's regional organization.

We are all aware of the terrible economic crisis much of Africa is encountering. We know too that these provoke political turmoil both as their effects are felt and as your governments take the corrective measures required to restructure your economies on a sounder footing. We are working hard to restore the conditions of sound growth in the world economy. And I am sure that this will be a matter of central attention at the Williamsburg Summit. Hard decisions and strong leadership are required in this effort. We admire the courage many African leaders are displaying in making difficult decisions to restore their economies, and I can assure you that the U.S. Government will continue to support those governments which come to grips with their economic problems realistically.

And I might say, tomorrow in New York I plan to make a talk on the subject of economic development and the U.S. stake in the development of the developing economies of the world.[34]

It has been the President's pleasure to receive more than a dozen African chiefs of state in Washington, and we look forward to the state visit next month of one of the continent's most distinguished statesmen, President Houphouet-Boigny of the Ivory Coast.[35] Vice President Bush and other Cabinet members have visited your continent, and I hope to have the opportunity to do so myself. I have visited, but not as Secretary of State—it doesn't count when you visited there as a private citizen, I discovered that. But you learn more that way often times, you know. You get around among people and you find out what's on their minds.

There are enormous problems facing Africa today. I do not need to tell you of the suffering, poverty, denials of basic human rights, refugee flows, armed conflicts, and economic woes facing your region. I do want you to know that we respect the substantial strides made in many countries and the constructive role played by the OAU itself in building a climate for peace and development. The United States cannot solve Africa's problems, nor would Africans want us to. But we can and are determined to support a regional organization whose goals and founding principles are fully consistent with our national interests.

Ladies and gentlemen, please lift your glasses and join me in this toast to the past successes and to the future accomplishments of your celebrated institution, the Organization of African Unity.

Address by President Reagan Before the 65th Annual Convention of the American Legion, Seattle, August 23, 1983 (Extract) [36]

The Role of the United States in Africa

. . . . . .

In Africa, we're engaged in a parallel commitment—economic development, the growth of democracies and the peaceful resolution of conflict. And here, too, our emphasis is on developmental and economic assistance. We maintain only a handful of military advisers on the whole African Continent. Our economic aid is four times larger than what we spend on security assistance. Contrast this with what the Soviet Union is doing. The record shows that since the Soviets began their aid program to Africa in 1954, military aid has outpaced all other Soviet aid by 7 to 1. Then add more than 40,000 Soviet and surrogate military personnel stationed in Africa, and it's no wonder that Africa is rife with conflict and tension.

For our part, we're actively working to defuse the tensions and conflict in Namibia and Angola while we help fight poverty in the region. In Chad, the United States is a partner in a multinational economic assistance package designed to get this tragically poor and strife-torn country on its feet. But without protection from external aggression, there can be no economic progress.

And naked, external aggression is what is taking place in Chad today. Drawing upon the nearly $10 billion worth of Soviet military equipment and munitions now in Libya, Colonel Qadhaffi has been using Soviet-built fighter bombers, T-55 tanks and artillery in a blatant attempt to destroy a legitimate government. President Habre and the people of his country are truly beleaguered as they struggle to preserve their independence. It is in this context that we have joined a number of other countries in providing emergency security assistance to Chad.

Yes, in Africa there is real reason for concern. But there are also harbingers of hope. Less than 2 weeks ago, I had the pleasure of meeting with President Diouf of Senegal. [37] He's a great man doing a great job. His outstanding leadership has brought Senegal fully into the community of truly democratic states. And a similar democratic success story has just taken place in Nigeria, Africa's most populous nation, where free Presidential elections were successfully completed last week. [38]

That's right, there's a democratic revolution going on in this world. It may not grab the headlines, but it's there, and it's growing. The tide of history is with the forces of freedom—and so are we.

This luncheon today has become an annual event with its own tradition. We are proud to host the representatives of the member states of the Organization of African Unity. The role of regional organizations, such as the OAU, can be vital to the security and progress of member states. I know that from our own experience in our own regional body.

Earlier this year, the OAU celebrated its 20th anniversary. I recall joining the festivities personally at the Kenyan Embassy in Washington.[40] We were pleased at the successful holding of the 19th summit in Addis Ababa.[41] Your Organization's health is important to Africa and to all those who wish Africa well, including the United States. We seek a constructive dialogue and cooperation both with the Organization—and Chet Crocker has briefed me on his in-depth review with OAU Interim Secretary General Peter Onu a few days ago—and with individual member states.

We wholeheartedly endorse the principles and goals embodied in the OAU Charter. It is a document which is an inspiration to us all. U.S. policy, whether in Chad, the Western Sahara, the Horn of Africa, or southern Africa, is based upon respect and support for the Charter. Africa would be a far healthier, more prosperous, and more stable continent if its core principles, including respect for the sovereignty, boundaries, and territorial integrity of member states, were universally respected.

Distinguished guests, I am not here to give a speech, but, rather, I would like briefly to make three points about the U.S. approach to Africa.

First, we recognize that Africa faces an economic crisis, one that jeopardizes the continent's overall stability. As in other fields, the responsibility for turning around this situation is first and foremost an African one. But we are committed to a constructive American response; through expanded bilateral assistance, and our programs have grown significantly despite our own budget woes over the past 3 years; through continued U.S. support for the international financial institutions,—and President Reagan is committed on this—our substantial aid to victims of drought, and our counsel and our active promotion of the role of market forces in the development of Africa.

Second: We have, and we will, back regional African solutions to the political and security problems that trouble your continent. African initiatives, based on the Charter, receive U.S. support and cooperation. Where U.S. initiatives and leadership are appropriate and welcome, as in southern Africa, we will play our proper role. Let me reaffirm here our determination to persevere in the effort to bring Namibia to its rightful independence and work for enhanced regional security throughout southern Africa.

Third, we are a multiracial, democratic nation, and proud of it. In the 1980's, as in previous decades, we Americans, whatever our imperfections, believe the founding principles of our society have broader relevance. We do not appreciate, as you may have noted, verbal abuse and distortion of our principles and policies. Nor do we condone systems that violate them. Africans can be proud of the democratic success stories that do exist in such places as Botswana, Senegal, Nigeria, and elsewhere.

There is, as President Reagan said recently, a democratic revolution quietly at work in Africa.[42] That process will occur in other countries, including South Africa whose racially based system is unacceptable to Americans. We say so privately and publicly. More important, we back words with tangible programs of support for black advancement in that country.

Let me conclude with a personal observation. I am often told that there is a great reservoir of good will toward the United States in Africa. I believe it. I also submit that the time has come for us to speak plainly as friends and colleagues in a common effort to build a closer U.S.-African partnership. I sense that our mutual comprehension is improving, because more of it and more of you recognize that diplomacy and politics are a two-way street.

When you see me reach for the glass, you know I really am at the end. (Laughter)

Address by the Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs (Crocker) Before the Fourth Annual Conference on International Affairs, Lawrence, Kansas, November 10, 1983 [43]

The Reagan Administration's Africa Policy: A Progress Report

Thank you for inviting me here this evening. It has been almost 3 years since President Reagan assumed office. I thought it would be timely at this Conference, which is examining U.S.-African relations over the past quarter century, to take the opportunity to review the administration's Africa policy and achievements. We have not yet taken our final exam but we have certainly made important strides toward the realization of the goals we set ourselves at the outset of the administration.

We set out to:

—Forge a new and mature partnership with Africa

—Support those nations which resist external aggression and destabilization

—Help meet Africa's humanitarian needs

—Help Africa with its development needs

—Support democratic institutions

—Work for Namibian independence on the basis of United Nations Resolution 435 [44]

—Support regional security and peacemaking in southern Africa

—Encourage positive, peaceful change inside South Africa.

In approaching these challenges, we have consistently and without apology pursued U.S. interests. But our actions are carefully tailored to African realities and African concerns.

We believe as Vice President Bush said in Africa a year ago, that Africans have the capacity and will to control their own destiny. We have worked to forge a new and mature partnership with the nations and peoples of Africa. That partnership is based on mutual respect. It includes frank and honest discussions of the issues. Such partnership is a two-way street which rests on shared goals, common principles, and mutual interests. For, as we have deepened the dialogue with Africa, each of us—Africans and Americans—have come to recognize that there is much more that pulls us together than separates us.

Africa's leadership has changed remarkably in outlook in the two-and-a-half decades since independence, when anticolonialist clichés and rhetoric too often substituted for serious policy and decision making. We in this country have come to a greater appreciation of the obstacles to the continent's development and the dilemmas facing its leaders. Realism and pragmatism increasingly shape attitudes and decisions on both sides of the Atlantic.

The channels for communicating with Africa's leaders have been widened and are being utilized. The result is an atmosphere which permits useful discussion of those issues on which the United States and Africa must focus: security, economic development, tensions and change in southern Africa, humanitarian crises, and the strengthening of democratic institutions.

President Reagan has met with 17 heads of state and government during his first 3 years in office. Vice President Bush made a seven-nation tour of Africa last November.[45] We are talking with African leaders across the full spectrum of African politics and ideology. Ours is an unprecedented activist diplomacy in Africa aimed at addressing conflicts, strengthening genuine nonalignment, working for creative approaches to Africa's economic crisis, and creating options for peaceful change. The President has met with leaders of nations which are moving to reopen doors to the West after years of close but disappointing relations with the Soviet Union and the Eastern bloc. He has also made clear our firm support for traditional friends who look to the West as a source of security, economic support, and human inspiration.

We place great importance on the strengthening of Africa's security and on our role as a reliable partner in this effort. Both the United States and Africa seek the opportunity to get on with the business of development and nation building. Without security, these objectives cannot be achieved. This fact is an essential element in our support for the Organization of African Unity (OAU), whose Charter and foreign policy principles we endorse. The OAU is dedicated to the peaceful settlement of disputes, the protection of African states' territorial integrity, and the defense of the continent against external aggression and subversion.

In considering the security problems facing Africa today, we must recognize the interaction of political, economic, and security factors that make up the African security equation. Africa is a full participant in the global system. It is directly influenced by and also helps determine the ebb and flow of competitive global politics. For either the United States or Africa to pretend otherwise is foolish and very shortsighted.

This does not mean that the United States sees Africa exclusively as a theater for East-West conflict or competition. Quite the contrary.

We have no mandate (either at home or in Africa) to be the policeman of Africa, nor would we wish to be. But just as certainly our political, economic and security interests in Africa are not served by political or economic instability. Nor—do we believe—are Africa's own interests. Such conditions inhibit the development of modern African economic and political institutions which can interact with our own to mutual advantage. Our strategic goal in Africa is to limit and thwart the application of outside force in African conflicts and thereby to permit Africans to shape their own futures. The purpose of our diplomatic and security policies is to discourage nations from resorting to military solutions to problems and to strengthen Africa's ability to resist adventurism and destabilization.

Instability, caused by local economic and political weakness and often deep rooted regional conflict, is often exploited by outside powers unfriendly to the United States. When this takes place, the United States—and the West—is confronted with a new dimension, a global dimension with potential effects on the global balance. Neither African states nor Western nations gain when an outside power or a regional state aligned to one seeks to gain advantage by resorting to military force on the continent. If we in the West fail to react, the climate necessary to achieve African security and development is eroded. We cannot be a credible power if we ignore friendly states which turn to us for help when threatened.

Our resolve was dramatically demonstrated in our response to Libyan aggression in Chad. In 1980, 7,000 Libyan troops intervened in the Chadian civil war. That action quickly became a major cause of regional instability, posing a direct threat to Sudan and creating unease among Chad's other neighbors. When the following year, the Chadian Government called on Libya to remove its military force, the OAU deployed a peacekeeping force (the first ever in the Organization's history) to Chad to maintain order after the Libyans left.

We moved immediately to support this initiative on the part of the OAU by allocating $12 million to support the OAU peacekeeping force with transport and equipment. By June 1982, then Chadian President Goukouni, who had refused reconciliation efforts proposed by the OAU, was forced out of Chad and replaced by his principal rival, Hissene Habre. The OAU withdrew its troops.

Then last July, Libya's Qadhafi invaded Chad in support of a rebel force led by the former president. In response to this blatant act of aggression, the President made available up to $25 million in military assistance to the internationally recognized government of Habre, and after consultations with France, we deployed AWACS aircraft to the area.[46] France sent over 2,000 troops to Chad which halted the Libyan advance southward; the northern half of the country remains occupied by Libyan forces. Our efforts now, together with the OAU and France, are aimed at bringing about the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Chad so that the internationally recognized government can get on with the urgent tasks of economic development and political reconciliation.

The administration has also, in a few selective and important cases, increased our security assistance to friendly African countries. Almost all of these increases have been to Sudan, Kenya, and Somalia—countries which play a key part in United States strategic interests in the Indian Ocean.

Sudan and Somalia face significant Soviet-backed military and subversive threats directed against them from across national borders. Nevertheless, our security assistance has been measured and moderate, focussed on internal mobility, border security, air defense, and communications. It does not begin, nor does it seek to match the enormous and irresponsible export of billions of dollars of Soviet arms into Libya and Ethiopia alone.

Moreover, we have made clear our readiness to assist in any way we can in the resolution of longstanding tensions in the region, especially in the Horn of Africa, which have been the cause of so much war and suffering in the past.

Africa's poverty is marked, and exacerbated, by constant threat to human life on a wide scale. It is not just one drought, or one emergency refugee situation. Drought is endemic in Africa, striking first one region, then another. In some countries, like Mauritania, drought conditions have persisted so intensely over the last 7 or 8 years that whole segments of the population have been driven from their ancestral homes and way of life, perhaps never to return again.

Food: In this situation, the U.S. role as a supplier of food and other agricultural assistance becomes more than an occasional humanitarian act. The United States is a major source of long-term and emergency food to Africa. We have an unparalleled record of assistance in addressing this problem. We have not shrunk from this call, regardless of the political ideology of governments whose people are hungry and threatened.

In fiscal year 1983, the United States provided $250 million of food to sub-Saharan Africa, of which over $40 million was in emergency food aid. Recipients have included Mauritania, Ethiopia, Mozambique, Djibouti, Ghana, Upper Volta, and other countries.

In just over a month of this fiscal year, we have already committed $11 million and the United States is likely to increase our fiscal year 1984 emergency food assistance level for Africa to well over $50 million. In addition, regular food assistance under PL–480 will be maintained at substantial levels in 1984.

The long-term problems of food production and availability are also being urgently addressed. For the past two decades, per capita agricultural production has declined in Africa—the only region of the world where that is true.

For that reason our foreign aid programs in Africa have concentrated on means to increase the continent's food production. In addition, we have used our own country's abundant agricultural production to help encourage reforms and policies to increase Africa's own food production.

Refugees: As with drought and hunger, refugees are a part of the African scene and a problem of both immediate and long-term concern. Wars, famine, and internal strife have produced throughout Africa hundreds of thousands of refugees and displaced persons. Some of the largest pockets of refugees, in Sudan and Somalia, have been in this condition for many years and there is no early prospect for resolving their plight. In Angola, torn by internal and internationalized strife, thousands are constantly periled by lack of food and shelter.

African nations have an extraordinary record of accepting refugees into their countries and providing long-term shelter. But the strain on already poor economies is enormous.

The United States has been consistently sensitive and responsive to this problem. In 1981, we faced a dire situation in which many thousands of African refugees were in constant danger of starvation and exposure. At a conference that year jointly sponsored by the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity, the United States, represented by Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick, stepped out front in pledging $285 million for refugee programs.[47] Since then, working closely with the U. N. High Commission for Refugees and private voluntary organizations, we have succeeded in improving the management of relief efforts to the point where most refugees are out of immediate danger and we can concentrate on contingency planning and lasting solutions.

We have supported repatriation as the best solution where that is possible. There have been successful programs of that sort in Equatorial Guinea and Zimbabwe. We are particularly proud of a program now underway to repatriate Ethiopians from Djibouti, which was worked out despite many difficulties. Another significant approach has been our $1.5 million training and education program for southern African refugees aimed at making them self-sufficient and alleviating the burden they represent to host countries.

We are constantly concerned to see that funding for continuing these efforts will be adequate. Traditionally we have contributed about one-third of the U.N. refugee budget for Africa and we intend to continue to pull our weight, while pressing other donors to pull theirs.

Similarly, we have contributed the largest single share of the International Committee of the Red Cross' Africa program to help those displaced by war or famine within their own countries. Angola, Ethiopia, Somalia, Sudan, Uganda, and a number of other countries benefit from this humanitarian effort and the ICRC's presence on the ground.

Per capita food production in Africa has been declining slowly but steadily for the last two decades. Population is growing more rapidly in Africa than in any other continent. Two-thirds of the countries officially designated by the United Nations as being "least-developed" are in Africa. And in the last year or so, a massive drought of unprecedented proportions has turned despair into tragedy in many parts of Africa.

We have been in the forefront of the international response to Africa's immediate needs, and to its longer-term problems. We have consciously directed our economic assistance programs almost exclusively toward increasing food production and toward other areas of activity which support that goal, such as health programs, skills training, research of seed varieties and farming techniques, and support of agricultural extension services. We are working closely with other donors, with particularly satisfying results in the Sahel countries and southern Africa, and some other areas. We have joined the African Development Bank, having long supported its affiliate the African Development Fund.

We have been in the lead in encouraging the World Bank to devote a greater proportion of its "IDA" soft-loan resources to Africa, with gratifying success. We have reduced the loan component of our own assistance programs to an insignificant proportion of the total, realizing that most African countries today are in no position to accept additional future debt obligations. And, as I have mentioned, we are providing food assistance in substantial quantities.

In each of these endeavors, we have worked closely with the Congress, and I would like to digress long enough to acknowledge here the strong support and encouragement, and invariably wise and helpful counsel, always experienced in dealing with Nancy Kassebaum. She is one of our very best friends in Washington.

Let me speak for a moment about money, just to give you some idea of the magnitude of our involvement in, and commitment to, Africa in the 1980's. U.S. direct bilateral economic assistance to Africa last year totaled over $800 million. For the fiscal year just begun—FY 1984—we have requested a level in excess of $900 million. Despite the intense, and correct, pressures in Washington to hold budgets down, I am pleased to report that the FY 1984 level would represent an increase of over 20 percent since this administration took office.

I take no honor in busting the budget, but I am proud that this administration has seen fit to address Africa's urgent and profound economic problems head-on.

I should tell you parenthetically that we are also providing military assistance and training to a number of friendly African countries, and that last year the dollar value of military assistance was less than one-sixth the dollar value of our economic assistance. In fact, we rank somewhere around fifth as a supplier of military assistance to Africa, far behind the Soviets and some of their surrogates, and even behind allies such as France. If you take into account the assistance we are providing through such intermediaries as the World Bank, the African Development Bank and Fund, and the FAO and its World Food Program—all that assistance being economic—the balance is even more heavily skewed, and the total of our economic assistance far surpasses the billion dollar mark.

In the post-independence period, as they began the process of nation building, many African governments experimented with various forms of state socialism. They instituted central planning, created state corporations to control key economic sectors, instituted costly subsidy programs, and along the way incurred incredible, unsustainable debt burdens. With the world economic downturn from which the West, thankfully, is now beginning to emerge, many African countries have been faced with the harsh reality of what we would call in the private sector impending bankruptcy. They have become increasingly dependent on Western donors and the international financial system. They have turned to the International Monetary Fund for support. They have turned to the World Bank for assistance with structural adjustment.

As I have indicated, the United States has been responsive, and will continue to be. But, along with the Bank and the Fund, we have encouraged the African governments to reexamine their own economic systems and priorities. Many of them now realize the errors of past ways, and the awful price that past practices have imposed. There is across the continent a new awareness of the importance of putting limits on government's role in the economy, a new commitment to the private sector and the free market (indigenous and foreign), and a new striving for sound economic management.

This process of transition, of policy reform, is bound to be slow and halting, for the fundamental changes implicit in the process are bound to be destabilizing. Significant increases in the prices of basic foodstuffs; divestiture of state enterprises which have traditionally employed far more people than they need; dramatic alteration in a currency exchange rate—this is the stuff of which riots and revolutions are made. Stripped to its essentials, economic policy reform is a complex political process affecting bread and butter interests of different constituencies within African societies at every point of decision.

Yet, there is a growing awareness that steps such as these are necessary, that without them African countries cannot hope for the foreseeable future to find themselves even in a situation of tolerable equilibrium let alone on a path to economic growth. We are working with many African governments, international financial institutions and other donors right now to analyze such problems, and to advise and assist them in such directions. This work, in the long term, will be even more important to Africa than the millions and billions of dollars we commit through our economic assistance programs, even more important than the hunger we might help to stave off, the diseases we might help to eradicate, the dams we might help to design, the schools we might help to build, the skills we might help to transfer. The response of the Africans themselves—their willingness to take very hard decisions with severe short-term risks—has been heartening.

Let me say a few further words about the private sector thrust of this administration. What we are really talking about is encouraging the release of the productive economic forces potentially available—domestically and externally—for the goal of development. It is a long-term proposition with many aspects.

Let me give some examples: David Rockefeller headed a high-level banking and investment team that visited Africa last year. The team found governments anxious to secure foreign private investment and officials who are willing to make reforms to encourage private investment.

Guinea, with its abundant natural resources, is one example. President Sekou Touré visited the United States last fall to attend and lead an ambitious trade and investment seminar sponsored by Chase Manhattan. The Guinean Government has since set up a special office to help prospective investors cut through red tape.

There are other examples. Cabinet level trade missions have visited Africa.[48] We have held trade and investment seminars throughout major regional centers in the United States to encourage American business to look at opportunities in Africa. And, we have supported private American organizations such as the U.S.-Nigerian Joint Agricultural Consultative Committee (JACC) seeking to expand trade and investment.

More recently we have established an informal interagency working group in the executive branch to coordinate and strengthen U.S. development and promotional activities in the fields of trade and investment. While just beginning, we can play a useful role in those African countries which are capable and willing to work with us. Ultimately, private trade and investment flows into Africa are a function of the political and economic climate that exists in various countries, particularly the investment climate.

Only Africans themselves can make their economies attractive to foreign businessmen. Similarly, only African leaders can unleash the enormous creative potential of African artisans, entrepeneurs, farmers, and risk-takers. Our role is to develop, explore and discuss road maps, to build bridges, share concepts and information, and help build the networks of people, data, and institutions that will be needed.

The administration has given support to the strengthening of democratic institutions in Africa. The President's Conference on Free Elections held in Washington last year is stirring evidence to this commitment.[49] One of the best received contributions to that conference attended by delegates from around the world was made by the representative of Nigeria, a nation which enjoyed impressive multiparty democratic elections this year at all levels of its federal structure, one modelled in certain respects on our own. We have applauded the democratic elections which have taken place during the last year in Nigeria, Senegal, and Mauritius.[50] We have provided funding to help the Liberian authorities manage the transition to elected government in 1985, the first time Liberia will have experienced an open democratic process in its long history.

We cannot help but believe that democratic elections are both a manifestation of and stimulant to health, wealth, and wisdom in government. As President Reagan said a few months ago in a major foreign policy address, there is a quiet revolution at work in Africa today. That revolution is a signal of hope and self-confidence to a region buffeted by economic crisis and instability.

Let me conclude my comments this evening with a discussion of southern Africa. At the outset, I want to make absolutely clear the depth of this administration's commitment to peaceful change in southern Africa. We have engaged our prestige and our energies in defining a regional strategy and in using our influence and resources to implement it.

The southern Africa region holds great potential. It is strategically important because of its vast mineral wealth and its geographic location astride the sealanes which carry the oil of the Persian Gulf to Western nations. It is also an area of tension, unfulfilled political and economic aspirations and, unfortunately, the potential for growing violence with incalculable consequences for Western interests, African interests and East–West relations.

We ignore southern Africa and the positive and negative aspects of its potential at the risk of both Western interests and our most deeply held principles. President Reagan concluded early in his first year that Southern Africa matters. Only the enemies of the United States and Africa can benefit from a rising tide of violence and instability. Such conditions offer them an opportunity to expand their influence at the expense of political and economic development.

The goals of our policy are simply stated.

—Independence for Namibia based on United Nations Resolution 435.

—A framework of enhanced security including a practical basis of coexistence between all states in the region.

—The emergence of a regional climate in which foreign forces go home, boundaries of sovereign states are respected, and governments and people can dedicate themselves to the priority of development and nation building.

—Continued and accelerated movement in the on-going process of essential change in South Africa away from an approach to government based on the laws and principles of racial separation, an approach repugnant to us as Americans and serving, as long as it prevails, as an absolute barrier to normal relations between the United States and South Africa.

This administration—unlike some prior ones—has a strategy for achieving its goals in southern Africa, a strategy we call constructive engagement. There are no doubt some here tonight whose impression of that approach is influenced by the prevalence of misunderstandings, willful or unintentional distortions, and just plain rubbish that is current on this controversial policy arena. What I want to do for the remainder of my time this evening is explain constructive engagement in terms of progress toward the achievement of our goals.

Namibia: Namibia is, in effect, Africa's last colony and a focus of strife, violence, external involvement and political polarization. A series of U.S. administrations have engaged themselves in helping bring about Namibia's independence. This administration early on determined to try to bring about conditions which would make it politically possible for South Africa to relinquish control of this territory.

Together with our allies in the Contact Group—Canada, Germany, France, and the United Kingdom—we have built on earlier efforts of previous administrations (starting with that of President Ford) to bring about Namibian independence. We have based our effort on U.N. Security Council Resolution 435, adopted in 1978 and substantially strengthened since that time by subsequent understandings and agreements. We have helped shape principles which will guide the drafters of an independent Namibia's constitution. We have found solutions to a series of issues related to the role of the United Nations in the transition process leading to independence.

In fact, through intensive efforts with our allies in the Contact Group, Africa's frontline states, SWAPO (South West Africa People's Organization), South Africa, internal Namibian parties, and the United Nations we now have in place virtually all the elements for the implementation of Resolution 435 and the transition to Namibian independence.

It has taken longer than we hoped to achieve this much, but Namibian independence today depends only on some key political decisions of governments in the region turning on one issue. The U.N. Secretary-General defined the remaining hurdle. He visited southern Africa earlier this fall and met with all the parties with interests in this issue. His report confirmed that South Africa has agreed to the terms of Resolution 435.[51] But he also learned and made clear in his report that the South African Government is not prepared to withdraw from Namibia and begin the implementation of Resolution 435 in the absence of a commitment from the Angolan Government on the withdrawal of Cuban forces from that strife torn land.

The South African Government's position on this issue reflects its assessment of prospects for its own future security in the region.

Angola: Consequently, we are also fully engaged in a separate but parallel series of talks with the Angolan Government, which, if successful, will result in an agreement on the Cuban troop issue. This would open the way to South Africa's implementation of the international agreements we have reached for Namibia's transition to independence.

Cuban withdrawal from Angola and South African withdrawal from Angola and Namibia would open the way for Angolans to build a brighter future, pursue their substantial development potential, and end the long night of strife that land has experienced since its independence exactly 8 years ago.

Regional Security: The United States is actively engaged in efforts to reduce and contain cross-border violence in southern Africa, whether that violence comes in the form of terrorist bombs shattering glass and ending lives in South Africa or South African military raids into neighboring states. We are seeking to support those realistic leaders in the region who recognize the need for a framework of peace based on dialogue and understandings between South Africa and its neighbors. We have used our good offices, your communications channels and our influence to encourage a process which can only be conducted by those who live there. There can be no imposed peace in southern Africa. The reduction and control of violence depends on many things including a readiness to coexist despite fundamental political and ideological rifts; sufficient regional confidence to resist the temptation to import violent means and invite foreign interventionists; and demonstrated progress on the agenda of constructive, negotiated change so that the siren song of violence is indeed resisted.

As Under Secretary Eagleburger told the National Conference of Editorial Writers last June, "There can be no double standards for either South Africa or its neighbors. The obligations of statehood . . . are . . . reciprocal." The Under Secretary continued to say, "The United States categorically reaffirms the principle that all states have a duty to refrain from tolerating . . . organized activities within their territory by guerrillas or dissidents planning acts of violence in the territory of another state." [52] This applies to all states in the region.

We, ourselves, have taken steps to enhance our ability to play a constructive, catalytic role. We have moved to rebuild our relations with Mozambique on a basis of full reciprocity while responding to that nation's desperate economic situation with food aid. We have quietly encouraged bilateral talks between Mozambique and South Africa and have found a commitment on the part of both sides to continued negotiations in the search for mutual understanding. We have recently sent an Ambassador to Maputo to help foster this fragile dialogue between our two states.

Similarly, we have moved to counsel restraint and dialogue between South Africa and other neighbors such as Lesotho and Zimbabwe, complementing and reinforcing their own efforts to arrive at a workable basis of coexistence.

Whether this vulnerable beginning survives is up to the governments directly concerned. The states of the region are making a choice between violence and coexistence. To accept the challenge of coexistence is much more difficult, but it represents the best hope of fostering constructive change and avoiding international strife.

South Africa: An essential ingredient in this volatile mix, and one which will profoundly influence the region's success or failure in addressing its problems, is how South Africans shape their own future.

Vice President Bush said in Nairobi last November that, "Apartheid is wrong. It is legally entrenched racism—inimical to the fundamental ideas of the United States. America's history and America's future can only be understood in terms of our commitment to a multiracial democracy in which all citizens participate and from which all benefit. The rule of law, the principles of consent and participation in the political process, and the right of every human being to citizenship which reflects these principles are to Americans a sacred trust. We will not betray this trust."

There are those in the United States and Africa who advocate punitive measures against and isolation of South Africa and other countries with whose policies they disagree. There are proposals before the U.S. Congress, [53] and, I understand, the Kansas State Legislature as well, that would ban bank loans to South Africa or Krugerrand gold coin imports from South Africa, deny access to the International Monetary Fund's stabilization programs, call for disinvestment or no new investment in South Africa, and institute punitive trade controls on civilian commerce.

The advocates of this approach would have us disengage and somehow walk away from the issues which southern Africa presents, as if they will magically solve themselves or not affect us if we turn our back on them. I reject that approach; it is basically a cop-out, cloaked in a fastidious false piety. Worse, it presumes without a shred of supporting evidence that change in South Africa would be advanced if the United States washed its hands of the problem, leaving the scene to others to work their will. That is not foreign policy. It is ostrich policy.

The prime focus of our efforts should rather be on positive steps to back constructive change and those in South Africa who are working for peaceful change. Constructive engagement is aimed at institution building, and supporting those advocates of constructive change in South Africa of all races in and out of government. American and European business carry a particularly heavy burden in this regard. It is within the capacity of this community to hasten the process of constructive change. Meaningful and broadened power sharing will occur as blacks acquire the economic and organizational base from which to insist on it, bargain for it and negotiate. Economic growth supported by foreign investment is, therefore, essential to the creation of opportunity for black South Africans.

For these reasons the administration opposes punitive measures and instead strongly supports the voluntary Sullivan Code of Fair Employment Practices. [54] American firms are playing and can continue to play a role in bringing about constructive change. An objective look at South Africa clearly demonstrates that blacks are gaining economic strength. Black labor and black purchasing power are vital to South Africa's economy. American and other firms are channeling hundreds of millions of dollars into black advancement in the work place, often setting the pace on a national scale and opening up new avenues for black advancement.

We are also backing up our views on change by the commitment of public funds to the process. And we are doing so—I might add—with bipartisan support in Congress.

—We have undertaken a $4 million-a-year scholarship program to bring 100 black South African students annually to the United States to study in our universities. The legislative basis of this program preceded this administration. [55] It has been substantially increased in the past few years.

—We have initiated training programs, in cooperation with the AFL-CIO, for black South African trade unionists to which the U.S. Government will contribute over $1 million this year and next.

—We are supporting small business development in black communities at a cost of some $3 million over the next 2 years.

—We are providing $2 million over the next 2 years to help tutor black South African high school students to improve their chances of entering professional schools.

These are illustrations of an approach that can be expanded further and, with Congressional support, it will be.

I cannot leave this subject without commenting on the recently approved constitutional proposals in South Africa. [56] While it would be inappropriate for the United States Government to propose or endorse any particular blueprint for political change in South Africa, it seems clear the 66 percent yes vote by South Africa's white electorate is a reflection of a growing consensus within that electorate of the need for change.

In that sense, November 2, 1983, is already a milestone in the modern history of South Africa. The proposals themselves did not address the question of political rights for the country's black majority. But a clear majority of white South African voters decided to take a step which opens the way to constructive, evolutionary change toward a system based on the consent of all South African citizens, 80 percent of whom are not white.

The referendum results give the South African Government a mandate to move decisively along the road of change. The U. S. Government hopes that the South African Government will use its mandate to address the problem of the political rights of South Africa's black majority—for the sake of the people of South Africa and of southern Africa, and for the sake of its relations with the rest of the world, including the United States.

I have talked long enough, but I thought it important that you have a clear picture of how this administration views Africa and is addressing the major issues.

It is an ambitious program, but one which we believe will draw increasing support and understanding in Africa and here at home. Thank you.

Support For Proposed Constitutional Reforms in South Africa

. . . . . .

Q. Does the United States have any comment on the South African proposals of a constitutional reform where blacks, who are 70 percent of the population, will still be left out of the political— [2]

A. I do. The decision of the Colored Labor Party of South Africa to consider the South African Government's extension of a national political franchise to the so-called colored community is indicative of a larger process of change going on in South Africa.

While we fully recognize that the current proposals for reform do not address the fundamental question of national political rights for the 72 percent of South Africans who are black, a process of change is under way and we support it. The United States has no political blueprint to prescribe for South Africa's unsettled political agenda.

Our position reflects our strongly held belief that South Africa's future is for South Africans of all races to decide. In the context of our policy of constructive engagement, we have said simply that advocates of peaceful evolutionary change in South Africa, away from apartheid and toward a system of government by consent of the governed, can look to the United States for encouragement and support.

We view developments in the so-called colored community and the reform process generally in this context.

Human Rights Practices in South Africa

South Africa is a multiracial country with a parliamentary democratic system in which, as a result of the apartheid system, the 16.2 percent of the population which is white presently holds a monopoly of power. The South African system is a mixture of Western-style human rights practices and limits on these practices. National elections are free and fair, but only whites may presently participate. The press is free, but circumscribed by government pressure. Free labor unions exist, but while black unions are growing in strength, government pressure on them, including arrests of union leaders, has increased. The judiciary is based on the British model, but security legislation encroaches broadly on judicial power.

Political change of the apartheid system was the focus of reform proposals, public debate, and counterproposals in South Africa in 1982. At the same time internal and regional violence increased as a result of the conflict between the South African Government and groups such as the African National Congress, some of which have resorted to violent means to bring about an end to apartheid. The process of evolutionary change toward an undefined future political system was thus accompanied by both violent efforts to bring about revolutionary change and government efforts to eliminate opposition and keep control of the pace, direction, and substance of the process.

Increasing opposition to apartheid, the reaction to violence, and the process of change itself significantly affected South Africa's human rights situation in 1982. Chief among the effects was the continued erosion of the rule of law and its replacement by administrative fiat, diminishing the ability of citizens to appeal to courts for protection. The public now has no effective judicial remedy against the denationalization of Africans, forced resettlement, and indefinite detention without charge, among other administrative actions. While many of these actions are defended by the Government as necessary and correct measures to counter violent opposition to apartheid, they often affect those who have eschewed violence and are seeking to bring about peaceful, evolutionary change away from apartheid.

Following a consolidation of the position of advocates of change within the ruling National Party, the South African Government in 1982 took some steps toward broadening participation in the country's political process. It also enacted a new Internal Security Act which contains some peripheral improvements over previous legislation governing such practices as detention without trial and banning (internal exile). The Government also moved administratively but not legislatively to ameliorate the treatment of security prisoners in the wake of widespread international criticism of deaths in detention. The year also saw the moderation of some restrictions imposed on leading individual opponents of apartheid.

The Government's new proposals for constitutional reform include a limited national franchise for South Africans of colored (mixed race) and Asian descent. Not yet agreed to by these communities or implemented by legislation, these reforms have sparked wide debate. These proposals were designed to address a major inconsistency in apartheid doctrine as originally conceived: while black South Africans had been given political rights only in the context of separate "national states" created for them, the blacks losing in the process their South African citizenship, South Africa's colored and Asian populations were not considered nations and, while regarded as South African citizens, had no logical place in the political system. The government-sponsored reforms, if implemented, will recognize the rightful place of these two groups in the present Republic of South Africa and extend to them, on an ethnic basis, a form of limited national political representation. The proposed reforms do not allow for participation by black South Africans in the South African central Government.

While increasingly recognizing the need for economic integration, the South African Government continues to look for a political alternative to a unitary, nonracial South Africa. While the Government's proposed reforms have been criticized by opponents of apartheid as "cosmetic," the ruling white National Party split in February 1982 over the very issue of power sharing with coloreds and Asians.[4] Despite the National Party split, a severe right-wing backlash in the Afrikaner community, and potential splits within the colored and Asian communities, the Government has indicated its determination to move ahead with its reform proposals.

As the debate continues on whether or not the process of change under way in South Africa represents the beginning of meaningful reform of apartheid or only its rationalization and modernization, apartheid remains the governing reality of life in South Africa. Apartheid, by whatever name, institutionalizes political and economic control by the white minority. The 83.8 percent of South Africa's population which is not white suffers pervasive discrimination which severely limits political, economic, and social life. (This report refers to the four major South African population groups as African, colored (the South African legal term for people of mixed race), Asian (Indian), and white. The term black is used in the broad sense, embracing all those of color in South Africa—Africans, coloreds, and Asians.)

The Constitution of South Africa, as amended since the National Party came to power in 1948, currently denies all persons who are not classified as white the right to vote in parliamentary elections or to be members of Parliament. Government proposals for constitutional reform currently being discussed would extend the franchise on a racially exclusive basis to coloreds and Asians. Derived from the Westminster model, the South African Constitution contains no Bill of Rights and provides for parliamentary supremacy. Government policy holds that, because of South Africa's ethnic and cultural diversity, the present economic and educational disparities among its constituent groups, an orderly society can best be achieved through separation of the races. A web of discriminatory laws and practices has thus been implemented throughout South African society. Important examples include: (A) the Constitution itself; (B) legislation which limits the citizenship of South Africa's 21 million black citizens to generally resource-poor "homelands" comprising 13 percent of the country's land area; (C) influx control or "pass" laws which prescribe the conditions under which black workers and their families may remain outside the homelands; (D) separate and unequal educational systems for the various race groups; (E) the Group Areas Act,[5] which mandates separate residential areas for whites, coloreds, and Asians; (F) the Immorality and Mixed Marriage Acts,[6] which make sexual relations or marriage between whites and persons of other races illegal; and (G) the Separate Amenities Act,[7] which authorizes the use of public facilities by persons of a particular race group without requiring equivalent facilities for other race groups.

South Africa has through the years also enacted legislation that, in the name of security, curtails the civil liberties of those persons (of all races) whose statements, actions, or associations are viewed as seriously challenging the established order. After a careful review of existing security laws, the South African Government enacted a new Internal Security Act during 1982 which repeals, while retaining and consolidating under the new Act, virtually all previous legislation affecting state security. While critics acknowledge peripheral improvements, they also assert that the Act preserves many of the objectionable elements, including detention without charge or trial and the authority to ban individuals, organizations, publications, and gatherings.

Flowing out of the defense of and opposition to apartheid in South Africa, a vicious cycle of violence is developing in southern Africa involving African National Congress attacks into South Africa and South African attacks against the African National Congress in neighboring states. fense Force raid aimed at elements of the African National Congress in Maseru, Lesotho, left 42 persons dead, including South African refugees, women, children, and Lesotho citizens. There are also reports that the South African Government supports dissident movements in neighboring states as a means of diminishing local government support for the African National Congress. The conflict between the Southwest Africa Peoples' Organization and South Africa over Namibia, resulting in Southwest Africa Peoples' Organization attacks into Namibia from Angola, parallels the situation along the borders of South Africa itself. This growing cycle of cross-border violence is a challenge to both human rights and political stability in the entire southern African region.

Political Life in South Africa

. . . . . .

Q. Elliott, on South Africa, could I ask a specific question? I'm bemused by a sentence in the opening paragraph which says, "National elections in South Africa are free and fair, but only whites may presently participate." [9]

How can a system of national elections be free and fair when 16.2 percent of the population are permitted to participate?

ASSISTANT SECRETARY ABRAMS. It's very important to distinguish between a country in which 16.2% of the people engage in free elections, and there are scores in which zero percent of the population engage in free elections.

The purpose of the opening paragraph on South Africa was to try to give a sense of the complexity of the human rights and political situation there. It is a country in which, as that paragraph says, there is a very strange mixture.

Those elections in which the whites participate in South Africa meet any country's standards of freedom, but the vast majority of South Africans are simply not permitted to participate in them.

Similarly, they have an independent judicial system in South Africa that is one of the finest in the world, by world standards, yet there are significant, and growing over the years, restraints on what the judges are allowed to even get into.

One of the greatest critics of the government in South Africa is the press. It has one of the most vibrant free presses in the world, yet the government puts very significant limitations on the press, and on occasion attempts to intimidate it.

So what we tried to do is to give a sense of the extraordinary mixture of qualities which the South African human rights situation presents.

It is a very strange one. There are very few countries—in fact, I cannot offhand think of one—which has that particular mix of qualities, and that was what we were trying to get at there.

There is a very vibrant political life in South Africa, yet it is one which lives under extraordinary human rights restrictions, and that's what we were trying to convey.

The Search for Regional Security in Southern Africa

Mr. Chairman, Congressmen, it gives me great pleasure to be able to report to you on developments in southern Africa at the midpoint in the first term of President's Reagan's administration.

These hearings on progress toward independence for Namibia, and the broader subject of "destabilization" in southern Africa, are indeed important, for they address issues at the core of our southern Africa policy. Over the past twenty-five years, virtually all of formerly colonial Africa has gained independence from the European metropolitan powers. These newly independent nations, with many of whom we have significant economic, commercial and political ties, have made clear the importance they attach to eliminating colonialism from their continent. Thus, even apart from the traditional American desire to help the spread of self-government and democracy, there are profound political reasons for engaging in the effort to bring independence to Namibia.

There are equally important reasons for our concern about tension and instability in the region. Clearly, our desire to strengthen our economic and commercial links with Africa are not served by local conflicts or arms races, or by efforts of outside powers to exploit them for unilateral advantage. On the contrary, our own national interests are best served by an atmosphere of political stability and economic growth, which alone can nurture modern African economic and political institutions. It is obviously to our advantage to do whatever we can to ease tensions, and work toward the peaceful resolution of problems and disputes among the nations of the region. This is the fundamental principle behind our policy of constructive engagement in the search for a more stable, secure, prosperous and democratic southern Africa.

I would like to start, Mr. Chairman, by restating the administration's objectives, so it will be clear that they have not changed, and that we are continuing to pursue them with vigor and purpose.

—The United States seeks to help strengthen communication between the countries of southern Africa in order to ease tensions, bolster regional security, and encourage negotiated solutions and peaceful change.

—We are intent upon using every diplomatic tool at our command in order to bring about conditions which will lead to Namibia's independence at the earliest possible date.

—Believing that "apartheid", as a structure of legally-entrenched racial separation, is morally unacceptable to a democracy such as our own, we have sought to encourage those elements within South Africa seeking constructive change, in order to see widened the base of participation in government and the economy to include all the elements of South Africa's varied population.

—Finally, we seek constructive engagement with all the states of the region who wish the same with us. We do not approach the region with the belief that our task is to choose sides; on the contrary, it is the fact of our desire for strengthened relations with all the states of the region that enables us to play a role—where such is welcome—in working for regional security, development, and peaceful change. The United States is on the side of peaceful change and negotiated solutions. This is where our interests lie and this is what makes us uniquely relevant to the region.

Regional Security

It has long been clear to all who were genuinely concerned about Africa's efforts to develop modern democratic institutions and processes—social, economic, and political—that tension and hostility were inimical to those efforts. Certainly a region threatened with the prospect of heightened violence and polarization would find it difficult, at best, to focus positive efforts on its own development.

The recent history of southern Africa must serve as a cause of alarm to us. With the collapse of the Portuguese Empire in the mid 1970's, violence has escalated throughout the region to a point today where the fact or threat of violence is a major feature of the area. Cross-border conflict risks becoming endemic. The question the United States faces—alone and with its allies—is whether diplomacy can provide an alternative to violence or whether southern Africa is in the process of condemning itself to violence as a way of life. We have seen this happen elsewhere in the world—in the Middle East—with still incalculable consequences for world peace and our national security. It is in our national interests to seek to avoid such a development.

Mr. Chairman, this administration did not invent violence in southern Africa. We did make it our purpose to do something about it. We have set out as a conscious objective of policy to provide an alternative to conflict—not only in Namibia, our most visible effort, but throughout the region. We have made it our purpose to work with the nations of the region to see if a framework of restraint and broad rules of conduct could be developed which could contain conflicts and provide this basis for solutions. The Vice President summed up our policy in Nairobi on November 18, 1982, when he said:

> "We are determined to help turn the sad tide of growing conflict and tension in southern Africa." [11]

From the outset of this administration, we sought to establish effective communication with all those nations and other political elements with whom communication was inadequate or had lapsed. It seemed self-evident that unilaterally isolating ourselves from those with whom we had differences, however strongly felt, served no purpose other than to cut us off from an ability to influence or affect their policies.

We began with a series of intensive discussions with all of the major actors in the region in order to identify their concerns, see how these fit in with our objectives, and determine how best we might proceed to advance American and Western interests. The priorities which seemed apparent to us were the ones enumerated earlier: regional security, independence for Namibia, the encouragement of elements favoring peaceful change within South Africa away from the system of apartheid, and constructive engagement with regional states in tackling the larger problems of economic and political development.

With respect to regional security, it seemed clear that one of the major barriers—if not the principal stumbling block—was the inability or unwillingness of parties on either side of South Africa's borders to speak to each other. Instability, coupled with a self-imposed reluctance on the part of the United States to act in concert with potential parties on behalf of our interests, had led to openings which were being exploited by our adversaries. Another major problem was our own lack of a credible dialogue with significant actors in the southern African region—not the least of which were the Governments of South Africa and Angola.

Over the course of the past two years, we have worked assiduously to restore communication and get a dialogue going again. I believe we can point to a considerable record of success:

—We have now had an extensive series of discussions at senior levels with the Angolan Government, exploring ways of improving our bilateral relationship with that country and seeking to bring about circumstances which will make possible agreement on Namibian independence. [12]

—After a period of difficulty in our relationship with Zambia, we have worked hard to reestablish a basis of confidence and improving communication, culminating in a highly successful visit that Vice President Bush paid to that country in November of last year. [13] We hope to have President Kaunda visit the United States in the near future. [14]

—We have continued to attach a high priority to assisting Zimbabwe, now in its third year of independence, as it seeks to meet pressures from the world economic downturn, a devastating drought sweeping across much of southern Africa, and the stresses and strains from political divisions within. Zimbabwe has traveled a rough road over the past 2 years but those who seek to judge its performance should have the humility to recall our own history at a similar stage in America's independence, as well as the daunting challenges facing Zimbabwe's leadership. We intend to continue our efforts to assist this new country, convinced that it offers important prospects for becoming a keystone in the economic development and regional stability of southern Africa. Just as we seek to foster a regional climate of security and confidence that will encourage constructive change in South Africa, so too do we seek a regional climate conducive to Zimbabwe's success as an independent nation.

—This administration took office just as the United States' relations with Mozambique reached a low-water mark. Communication with the Mozambican government was practically nonexistent; that country's policies seemed unalterably aligned with those of the Soviet Union and its satrapies, its perceptions warped by hostile disinformation. But the utter incapacity of Marxist economics to cope with the problems of a developing country, and the conspicuous inability of the Soviet Union to assist Mozambique with security and political problems stemming from its isolation, led to indications that the Mozambican government wished to reestablish communication with the United States. We responded by making clear that we were interested in a positive relationship based upon respect for each other's interests and were willing to engage in building bridges between us based upon mutual respect. Within just the past 3 months, we have had two sets of discussions between senior American and Mozambican officials aimed at engaging the Mozambican government in a constructive effort to improve regional stability and restore communications between us.[15] We believe that a solid basis now exists for a meaningful improvement in relations between us.

[15] Reference is to Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Frank G. Wisner's visit to Maputo on December 13, 1982, for discussions with President Samora Moises Machel, and to Crocker's visit to Maputo for discussions with Machel on January 13, 1983.

Similarly, in our contacts with South Africa we quickly moved beyond discussion of the Namibia issue and bilateral questions to the overarching question of regional security. We believe our extensive contacts with Pretoria have enabled us to more fully grasp the South African Government's concerns about the region's dynamics while also making clear the terms on which we must operate if we are to be credible and effective there. While much remains to be done, the conditions now exist for a candid, sensitive and productive dialogue on regional matters with that country.

I would like to turn now to another facet of our diplomacy in southern Africa—encouraging effective communication between South Africa and its neighbors. We have not engaged in this effort as a search for glory or out of our own ambition. We have done so for the good and sufficient reason that it is obviously in our national interest. The cycle of violence that threatens southern Africa is antithetical to everything this country stands for. Militarized conflict and the recourse to violent means can only advance the interests of our adversaries.

Dialogue alone, of course, will not necessarily solve the problems, but communication among countries that have serious disputes and basic political differences is an obvious first step. Within the past 6 months, South Africa has had significant and positive discussions with Angola, with Mozambique, and, in fact, with virtually all of its immediate neighbors.[16] It is difficult to overstate the significance of the developing dialogue between South Africa and its neighbors, a dialogue we have sought—in unintrusive ways—to further. We welcome the fact of these contacts, and hope that by a thorough airing of differences, a constructive effort can be made toward their resolution.

It is important, we believe, to recognize that as dialogue itself is, by definition, a two-way street, so, too, is regional security. There is a compelling need for all the parties to recognize this. Although at any given moment, following some specific development or event, it might be possible to pronounce a moral or political judgment upon that event, it is not always useful, or even wise, to do so. For that matter, it is not always even possible to know precisely what has taken place, or why. Public posturing and the passing of judgment, however gratifying to those who do it, is not usually the most helpful way to deal with the root causes of disputes. We seek results. This administration is profoundly conscious of the fact that southern Africa is a highly charged, politically polarized environment. Some would say it is a minefield. There is ample public posturing by the regional actors themselves without adding our own rhetoric to the mix.

Regional security runs in both directions across international borders, and in southern Africa each side in every dispute claims grievances against the other. We have not chosen to condemn each transgression by one or another of the parties, but have, rather, chosen the perhaps less gratifying but certainly more important long-term task of trying to ease tensions. In our view, our effectiveness depends on our ability to be a credible partner of all who wish our partnership and are prepared to engage in good-faith efforts to solve problems. Apart from Namibia, all states of the region are sovereign and recognize each other's sovereignty. That is a fact, and it carries with it certain obvious implications. Some states are not more sovereign than others. We recognize no state's right to harbor plotters or perpetrators of violence across borders and against other lands.

Mr. Chairman, I recognize that some observers are less than satisfied with the balance and discretion inherent in what I have just said. But we believe that those who would have us take sides among the parties in southern Africa would have us unlearn every important role of diplomacy. In southern Africa as in the Middle East, it is not by choosing sides that we shape events or resolve conflicts. Our nation should be proud to stand on the side of peace and diplomacy and be prepared to weigh the concerns and interests of the parties involved as we seek to build bridges and explore avenues for agreement.

Namibia

When President Reagan took office in January of 1981, the Namibia negotiations had broken down,[17] despite the substantial efforts and accomplishments of our predecessors. There was an atmosphere of mutual suspicion and recrimination among the parties whose agreement was essential for Namibia to secure its freedom. The obstacles to agreement between the parties were so great that it would have been tempting for us to walk away from the problem, washing our hands of the negotiations, and leaving it to debate and doubtful resolution by others. Certainly there were other urgent priorities.

Instead, partly in response to what we were clearly told by our African friends and our key allies in NATO, and partly because of America's historic tradition of support for self-determination, we set out to find a way to move toward Namibian independence. In preparation for this, we conducted extensive and exhaustive discussions with each of the major parties to the negotiation—the frontline states, SWAPO, other states in Africa, the South Africans and the internal parties inside Namibia, and our European allies.

We concluded that Namibia's independence could not be achieved in the absence of conditions which gave all participants reasonable confidence that their security interests would be protected. It was obvious to any observer that—irrespective of the reasons for their being there—the presence of Cuban combat forces in Angola was an integral part of the regional security problem.

town of Komatipoort to discuss ways to improve relations and the political situation in southern Africa.

[17] In January 1981, the Pre-Implementation Conference in Geneva concluded in failure.

I know that the members of this distinguished subcommittee are familiar with the charges and countercharges from both Angola and South Africa about the fighting across the Namibian-Angolan frontier. My point is a simple one: the Cuban troop issue is not an issue we made up; it is an objective reality at the core of the question of regional security. The South Africans, whose concurrence and cooperation must be secured for any agreement leading to Namibian independence, have repeatedly made clear that they regard the Cuban troop issue as fundamental to their security concerns. Quite apart from that, the United States, as Vice President Bush said in Nairobi on November 19, 1982, "is not ashamed to state its interest in seeing an end to the presence of Cuban forces in Angola," just as we seek internationally recognized independence for Namibia. Such an outcome would contribute to both regional security and a global climate of restraint.

We have, for more than a year now, been engaged in intensive discussions with the Angolan Government in an effort to reach a broadly acceptable formula for parallel withdrawal of foreign forces from Namibia and Angola. These bilateral discussions have been held outside the framework of (UN) Security Council Resolution 435,[18] and are not part of the Western Contact Group's mandate. We are fully prepared to respond to Angola's security concerns as well as to deal forthrightly with the reality of South Africa's concerns. We believe that this is a viable means of achieving the goal of Namibian independence to which we are profoundly committed. We know of no other means.

We believe that Angola wishes to contribute to a Namibian independence agreement, so long as its own security interests are preserved. We have achieved real progress in our talks with the Angolans and will spare no effort in continuing our search for a comprehensive, peaceful settlement.

Your letter, Mr. Chairman,[19] inviting me to participate in these hearings, asked what the "short and long-run prospects" are for a Namibian settlement, as well as a number of specific questions about "when" South Africa and the United States made Cuban troop withdrawal a necessary accompaniment to Namibia's independence.

The answer to the first question is: "reasonably good." Certainly we intend to continue the effort. But this is a complicated and difficult negotiation, and it involves fundamental issues and choices for both sides. It has taken time and it may take more. I believe the greatest mistake that we could make would be to yield to the historic American impatience with the progress of negotiations.

That carries with it the answer to your second question, about "when" the Cuban troop issue became a prerequisite for Namibian independence. Security, of which the Cuban troop issue is an integral part, has always been a prerequisite for agreement on Namibian independence. As a practical diplomatic matter, it will not be possible to obtain a Namibian independence agreement without satisfactory regional security assurances. Quite apart from the diplomatic problem, it would not be desirable to bring Namibia to independence in circumstances that held the prospects for greater regional instability and turmoil. This administration would not be a party to it, and I would hope that no one in this room would wish to see that either.

This approach does not mean an indefinite delay for Namibia's transition to independence. Some in the media and elsewhere press for our forecasts on these negotiations. In reply, I would say that we are neither optimistic nor pessimistic; instead, we have a realistic objective, and we are determined to move steadily toward it.

In conclusion, I would emphasize that we have set ourselves goals worthy of the support of all Americans and developed a road map for reaching them. The parties in the region are well aware of our seriousness. Not surprisingly, all of them can find fault with this or that aspect of our diplomacy. But our goals and methods are increasingly understood. Despite the inherent difficulties, the Administration sees no reason to shift course and every reason to persevere.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would be glad to answer your questions.

[19] Representative Howard E. Wolpe.

MR. WOLPE. You are the people who made the linkage. We have talked about this in public session on a variety of occasions. So we can begin to clarify that record; it was the United States, was it not, that raised the Cuban troop issue as a matter of formal linkage to the question of the Namibian independence settlement? It was not South Africa that raised this question. It had not arisen in the earlier diplomacy prior to the new effort that was undertaken; is that not accurate?

MR. CROCKER. No; that is not accurate, Mr. Chairman. The issue of Cuban troops had been referred to and had been raised in previous periods of negotiation, going back several years before we entered office.

What we sought to do in coming in to examine the situation was to identify what it would take to get a go-ahead from the key parties.

We knew, as far as the African parties were concerned—that is, the Front Line states and SWAPO—that what it would take to get an agreement was the consolidation and the confirmation of U.N. Resolution 435.

MR. WOLPE. If I may interrupt you, it is very important that we use the same words—not use different words that are intended to convey one meaning when you have something else in mind.

I have had conversations personally with ambassadors representing the Front Line states and with Presidents and heads of state. I have had similar discussions with members of the Western Contact Group, the French, Canadian, British, and Germans. In no instance has anyone suggested that anything but the Cuban troop linkage question was newly advanced as part of the diplomatic thrust of the new administration. Simply they claim it had never arisen as part of the formal negotiating process previously.

Are you saying that is all in error? I want to understand precisely what your position is on that.

MR. CROCKER. Mr. Chairman, I share your interest completely in clarifying this point. The point I made is that this is not, since we came into office, the first time that the Cuban troop issue has been discussed in the negotiations.

What we sought to do was to restructure for success the negotiation that we inherited. The negotiation we inherited had a substantial accomplishment in it; namely, all the agreements surrounding U.N. Resolution 435.

There is one minor problem, Mr. Chairman. South Africa was not of a mood to implement it.

MR. WOLPE. Did you or did you not make these formally linked propositions in a way that had not happened previously?

MR. CROCKER. Our effort to relate Namibia to Angola was our effort. I am not denying that. What I am saying is that—

MR. WOLPE. That is all I was trying to establish.

MR. CROCKER. That was not the question you asked, Mr. Chairman. You asked if this was the first time Cubans have been an issue in the negotiation. They have been an issue in this problem since 1975, when they arrived there.

. . . . . .

MR. CROCKER. Mr. Chairman, in the interest of clarifying the record on the issue we were previously discussing, I wonder if I could add one word on that question of the Cubans. . . .

I think you said that we were looking for a way to restructure the negotiations and we sort of sidled up to the South Africans and said, "Hey, how about some Cuban troop withdrawal?" That wasn't the way it went. I want to make this very clear for the record.

We sought to ask the South Africans for a definitive list of their concerns which, if addressed, would lead to an agreement to implement U.N. Resolution 435.

They were very quick to indicate what that would be, not surprisingly. This is an issue, as I said, that has been on their minds since 1975.

This question of linkage gets tossed around in many ways. For years we have heard from the Angolan Government a notion of linkage which is that once Namibia is independent, sometime thereafter Cuban troops will go home. We do not think that kind of linkage is terribly productive any more than we would have accepted South Africa's insistence that Cuba should go first and then, after the Cubans have left, we would be prepared to decolonize Namibia.

We have rejected both kinds of linkage which say "you go first," and we have sought a relationship of parallel movement here which would have both sides, in effect, making compromises.

I think it should be very clear for the record, since we are trying to establish a record here, that our approach is fundamentally balanced on that point.

Mr. Chairman, in relation to your—

MR. WOLPE. Can I clarify that point before you move on to the question? Are you saying, in effect, that the American Government took South Africa's list of what was important to it and agreed to make that part of our diplomatic package because it was on South Africa's list?

MR. CROCKER. We asked all the parties what was on their list. We did not accept everything on everybody's lists either.

MR. WOLPE. Why this?

MR. CROCKER. It was obviously the most important issue. As we said, what we are seeking to do is to build a climate in southern Africa which has foreign troops going home, South African foreign troops going home and Cuban foreign troops going home.

. . . . . .

MR. WOLPE. Let me close with just a few additional questions related to the Angolan piece of what is happening.

First of all, what is the American position at this point with respect to UNITA? Do we take the position in our diplomacy that there must be some kind of arrangement with UNITA that is also a part of the overall ability to put together a settlement of the Namibian conflict and of the issue surrounding Cuban troop withdrawal?

MR. CROCKER. Mr. Chairman, we take the position that we have all along, that UNITA is an important and legitimate nationalist movement inside Angola.

It is based inside Angola. It operates primarily from the base of support of people inside Angola and from captured equipment.

We also take the position that the resolution of that political question is not for us. It is a matter for Angola. It is an internal Angolan matter. It is not a preconditioned or a linked aspect of the negotiations that we have been talking about today.

Whether the Angolan Government and others will conclude that in order for these other issues to be resolved, there will need to be some kind of an agreement on the issue of UNITA, that is for them to say. We have no conditions on that issue.

The U.S. View of Southern Africa Cease-Fire

. . . . . .

Q. Do you have anything on peace treaties between Angola and South Africa, and the status of that?

A. Yes, I do. I guess you're referring to the reports that de facto cease-fire is in effect already between South Africa and Angola. [21]

Our understanding is that no formal ceasefire is yet in place but that, complementary to the negotiations underway between Angola and South Africa, all sides may have seen some advantage in showing a degree of military restraint in recent months.

The objectives that Angola and South Africa are working toward in their direct negotiations are a matter between those two countries. No useful purpose could be served by our commenting on them in advance. However, it's difficult to imagine that even a limited cease-fire between some of the parties in the war-torn southern African region would not be, in fact, a constructive step toward a more comprehensive regional peace.

"It is Helpful To Have a Relationship and To Work With the South Africans"

. . . . . .

PRESIDENT WHITE. The Reagan administration policy of constructive engagement in a friendly way with the Government of South Africa has come under recent criticism. Do you see this policy as useful in producing a real change in the apartheid policies of South Africa or in a successful conclusion to the negotiations for an independent Namibia?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I do. I think it is helpful to have a relationship and to work with the South Africans. That doesn't, by any means, condone at all the existence of an apartheid policy which is reprehensible and not acceptable in any way. I think we have to be absolutely clear about that. However, there are important problems in the region. There is, I think, the possibility of some progress, and we should be on the side of that progress.

Furthermore, insofar as the emergence of an independent, self-governing Namibia is concerned, obviously, the attitudes and policies of South Africa will be an important ingredient in bringing that about. And if you're going to have some impact on what their policies are, you have to be able to talk to them. So we are trying to have ourselves in a position of talking to them, even though on the apartheid policy, we have no time at all for that policy.

leader Saul Mkhize. The Department anticipates that a full investigation will be carried out by the appropriate authorities to determine the circumstances surrounding Mr. Mkhize's death.

It appears that Mr. Mkhize was shot while organizing a peaceful protest against Government plans to remove a community from its present location to one of South Africa's ethnic "homelands."

The United States has consistently made clear its view that South Africa's problems are not constructively addressed by the arbitrary relocation of peoples on an ethnic basis within South Africa, or by any effort to divide the country into pieces by creating "homelands" or by depriving the displaced peoples of their South African citizenship.

U.S. Claim of Contact Group Support in Search for Angolan Solution

. . . . . .

Q. . . . There have been several charges from the French and others, and there were several requests that the U.S. change its policy again on linkage between Angola, South Africa, and so forth. Do we have any comments, especially to the French criticism the other day?

. . . . . .

A. The agenda of the Contact Group, [25] as defined by U.N. Security Council Resolution 435, is substantially complete, as Minister Cheysson said in Paris. [26]

Through the cooperative efforts of all parties, we have reached the point where, with the exception of the electoral system for the Constituent Assembly and final agreement on the composition of UNTAG, we are close to being able to implement the U.N. plan for Namibian independence.

In his speech, the Foreign Minister called attention to the fact that very little remains on the formal U.N. Security Council Resolution 435 agenda. Meanwhile, we are working very hard to achieve success in our separate discussions with Angola, and we have had the full support of all our Contact Group partners to that end.

We have sought and will continue to seek an understanding that meets the basic concerns of all parties and that opens the way to a stable and peaceful regional context in which Namibia can achieve its independence under the free and fair process envisaged in the U.N. plan.

Prepared Statement by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs (Wisner) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, May 3, 1983 [27]

Opposition to Restrictions on U.S. Trade and Investment in South Africa

I welcome this opportunity to appear before the committee to address the very serious questions of substance raised by the rider attached to the State Department Authorization Bill by Mr. Solarz. [28] The Department will provide full written comments on the rider. I would at this time like to summarize the Department's views with regard to the proposals to require mandatory compliance with the Sullivan Code, to prohibit new U.S. bank loans to the South African Government or agencies thereof, and to prohibit the importation of South African gold coins or krugerrands.

These proposals are similar in nearly all respects to H.R. 3008 and H.R. 1693, [29] the latter being a reformulation of the former which was not accepted by the ninety-seventh session of Congress. At that time the Department went on record in opposition to H.R. 3008. Much of my comments represent a reiteration of our previous statements.

I would like to outline here why we do not believe it helpful to the process of change away from apartheid for the U.S. Congress to legislate compliance by U.S. corporations and affiliates with a code of fair employment practices applicable to affiliates and subsidiaries operating in South Africa.

Let me review for the committee the record of adherence to and performance under the voluntary Sullivan Code. Three-hundred thirty U.S. firms and affiliates employ 127,000 individuals in South Africa. Seventy-one percent or 90,000 of these employees work for the 146 U.S. firms, affiliates, or business units which have adhered to the Sullivan Code. These 146 firms actually represent 178 business units.

There are some 152 other business units operating in South Africa affiliated to U.S. companies which are not signatories of the Sullivan Code. Nineteen of these 152 are companies where U.S. interest does not amount to control. This leaves 133 companies or business units controlled by U.S. firms or affiliates which are not Sullivan Code signatories.

These 133 firms employ 17,000 persons. Of the 133 firms, 25 firms alone employ 14,000 of these 17,000 persons. The remaining 106 firms employ some 3,000 persons.

These figures illustrate that it is not correct to judge the success of the voluntary Sullivan Code on the basis of the number of firms which have adhered to the code, but rather, the judgement should be based on the number of employees that could theoretically be covered by the Sullivan Code. As I have indicated, at the present time some 71 percent of these employees are covered by the Sullivan Code.

If the 25 firms employing 14,000 persons were added to this, Sullivan Code coverage would extend to 171 firms or 104,000 employees representing 82 percent of all employees.

Further research needs to be done on the remaining 106 firms employing some 3,000 persons. Many of these firms are very small operations, many only employing a minimal number of persons.

[28] Reference is to H.R. 2915, 98th Congress, the Department of State authorization bill for fiscal year 1984. Title VII, Solarz's rider to H.R. 2915, was subsequently deleted by unanimous consent of the Foreign Affairs Committee, and was incorporated as Title III of the Export Administration Amendments Act of 1983, H.R. 3231, 98th Congress. See document 536.

[29] Reference is to H.R. 3008, 97th Congress, introduced by Representative Solarz on April 2, 1981, outlining restrictions on U.S. trade and investment in South Africa; and H.R. 1693, 98th Congress, introduced by Representative Solarz on February 25, 1983. See document 551. Restrictions regarding South Africa were incorporated in H.R. 3231. See document 536.

The real question at issue in our view is how to encourage adherence by the main 25 firms which are not signatories. The question is whether the proposed rider would be the appropriate means of achieving this objective. We do not think it is either appropriate or the most desirable means of encouraging U.S. firms and affiliates to implement fair employment practices.

Through totally voluntary efforts, the Sullivan Code has succeeded in accomplishing a major change not only in the restricted sphere of the companies own operations, but also in the entire approach to industrial relations in South Africa. The Sullivan Code has played a contributory role to the labor reforms instituted by the South African Government and the Sullivan Code has acted as a catalyst for both other foreign investors and for South African industries as well. The Sullivan Code accomplished all of this on the basis of volunteerism, without the interference of the U.S. Government or the establishment of a bureaucracy to dictate that U.S. firms must account to the government for their adherence to fair employment practices.

Sullivan signatory firms spent $3,310,772 on training of employees in 1982, a 48 percent increase over the previous year's expenditures. Sixty percent of the employees benefitting from the training were black, colored, or Asian. Sullivan signatories contributed over $10,500,000 on projects to assist the disadvantaged black, colored, and Asian communities in South Africa. This represented slightly more than 2 percent of the total profit derived from U.S. direct investment in South Africa in 1981. Expenditures for community development and education and training assistance for non-employees by the 120 Sullivan signatory firms filing compliance reports represented approximately 3.5 percent of their 1981 profits. This does not include an evaluation of the time contributions of U.S. subsidiary employees which amounted to 13,000 employee days. Neither does it take into account contributions made in these areas by non-reporting or non-signatory U.S. subsidiaries. These additional contributions indicate that the actual percentage of U.S. corporate income from South Africa made available for these purposes was really higher than 3.5 percent. An across the board contribution of 3.5 percent of all corporate profits by all firms in South Africa would amount to $215 million a year. As U.S. investment in South Africa represents only a minor percentage of total investment it is obvious that the contributions to community development in South Africa by U.S. firms is several orders of magnitude larger than is accounted for by the significance of the U.S. firms to the South African economy.

In short, U.S. firms are acting as catalysts for change in South Africa, not only in terms of fair employment practices, but across the board in all aspects of community life. The Sullivan Code deserves most of the credit for being the engine which is driving this corporate force for change away from apartheid and discriminatory employment practices. The activities of the Sullivan signatory firms have had an impact far beyond the book value of U.S. investment in South Africa. The U.S. corporate community in South Africa, on a voluntary basis, has become one of the main catalysts for change. We feel strongly that this is where the U.S. corporate community belongs.

Capitalism and apartheid cannot coexist. We believe that capitalism will help to bring about the end of apartheid through a process of peaceful, evolutionary change based on adequate economic growth.

Adherence to the Sullivan Code is, therefore, not only in the best interests of the individual firms, it is in the national interest of the United States. We have strongly urged all non-signatory firms to adhere to the code on a voluntary basis. The track record of the 146 firms which have adhered to the Code is good, getting better and deserving of the support and commendation of the executive and legislative branches of government. At the same time, these firms and this administration strongly urge all non-signatories, of whatever size, to adhere to the Sullivan Code and to perform and participate in the activities of the Sullivan task forces. We are not prepared to diminish the track record of the Sullivan signatories by cloaking it in the bureaucracy proposed by H.R. 1693, but clearly, those firms which have not adhered must recognize their corporate responsibility to their black employees and as representatives of the United States. We believe that adherence to the Sullivan Code is the most effective means of meeting these obligations and we urge these firms to adhere.

Let me also briefly address the structure proposed by the rider for implementing its legislative requirements. I would like to appeal to the committee to recognize that the Department of State is not a regulatory agency. We have neither the staff, the expertise, nor the mandate to monitor foreign business practices. The proposed section 103 (a) [30] obligates the Department of State to implement compliance with the legislation through procedures which are similar to section 2(b)(8)(c) to the Export-Import Bank Act, known as the Evans amendment. [31]

While we have worked out procedures to implement this act, the Congress must accept that this regulatory action is not proper to the Department of State. In this regard, I must advise the committee to look carefully at the Evans amendment precedent before obligating the Department of State in the person of the Secretary of State to carry out the provisions of the proposed legislation. We would also advise the committee that such proposals could be construed as constituting an extraterritorial application of U.S. legislation and may be construed as such by the South African Government. In such case the Department does not believe it feasible to establish the advisory council in South Africa called for in section 103(a).

I do not want to dwell extensively on these technical objections, although I believe that each, on its own, precludes favorable consideration of this proposal. Rather, I would prefer that the committee concentrate its attention on the proven track record of success on a voluntary basis of the Sullivan Code. The Sullivan Code has worked because it is voluntary. It would be a disservice to the U.S. corporate community and to the cause of change away from apartheid in South Africa, if we as a government took any action that undercut the Sullivan Code. The administration strongly believes that the proposed rider or H.R. 1693 would have just this effect.

I have concentrated my remarks on the Sullivan Code. Let me say a few words about Title II of H.R. 1693, the proposals to ban the sale of South African gold coins in the United States and the proposal to ban any new U.S. bank loans to the South African Government or its agencies. These topics should be addressed in more detail by the representatives of the Department of [the] Treasury and by the constitutional experts who are more qualified to address the question of U.S. Government restrictions on capital flows abroad. [32] I would also call to the committee's attention the legislation and actions being taken to put into circulation an American gold coin. One of the areas that should be looked at is the source of the bullion to be used in minting this coin: I believe the committee will find that South Africa is among those sources and that restricting sales of krugerrands will have no effect in terms of the net gain from gold sales to the United States by South Africa.

I would, however, like to close my statement and underscore our opposition to Title II by emphasizing that these proposals, while well-intentioned, will not serve the purpose of advancing movement away from apartheid in South Africa. While appearing salutory in principle, careful consideration indicates that the measures proposed will not be effective. If we know this and proceed nonetheless on this course, the South African Government can only conclude that we are not serious about our advocacy of peaceful change, but are only paying lip service to political exigencies. We do not believe such is the case. We all share a commitment to the goal of ending apartheid and, the Congress, together with the executive branch, have demonstrated an ability to conceive and design programs such as the South African Scholarship Program passed with the assistance of Mr. Solarz, which are actively promoting change away from apartheid. We applaud and welcome such initiatives for their effectiveness. This, in the final analysis, must be the criteria used to judge any proposed action with regard to apartheid, and in this regard, we find the cur-

Statement by the Representative at the United Nations (Kirkpatrick) Before the U.N. Security Council, May 25, 1983 [33]

Progress Report on Namibia

The events of this past weekend, in Pretoria and Maputo, [34] are a bloody reminder, if any was needed, of the consequences of violence, and of the very real potential that today exists throughout southern Africa for the further escalation of that violence. As is all too often the case, the victims of these most recent tragic events include many who were entirely innocent and blameless. The United States deplores such acts of violence, from whatever quarter, whether perpetrated in the name of change, or in opposition to it. Violence cannot solve the pressing problems of the region. On the contrary, by creating new victims, new grievances and new grounds for anger and hatred, such acts can only increase the danger of new and greater violence, in an ever escalating cycle. Ultimately, we must count among the wounded of these acts all those who seek and hope for peaceful change through negotiation and dialogue.

My government has for the past several years been seeking to assist the governments of the region to find peaceful ways to address and to resolve mutual problems. We have been encouraged by the purposeful high-level dialogue between Mozambique and South Africa, a dialogue which the events of last weekend must not be permitted to place in jeopardy. We have made known to both South Africa and Mozambique—and, indeed, to all governments of the region—our willingness to help. We have stressed our conviction that the problem of crossborder violence, if allowed to go unresolved, will seriously endanger prospects for both stability and peaceful change.

Let it be clearly understood that the United States deplores violent crossborder activities in southern Africa, in whatever direction and for whatever stated goal. Similarly, we categorically reaffirm the principle that all states have a duty to refrain from tolerating or acquiescing in organized activities within their territory by guerrillas or dissidents planning acts of violence in the territory of another state. There can be no double standard for southern Africa. Crossborder violence cannot be condoned, whether it be in the form of a bomb placed in a crowded square in Pretoria by externally based organizations, or of the continuing violation of Angola's territorial integrity by South African forces.

Mr. President, the Security Council also bears a solemn responsibility to uphold the principles of nonviolence and the settlement of disputes by peaceful means. Those principles are especially pertinent to the issue which this meeting of the Council has been convened to consider.

The United States welcomes the opportunity afforded by this meeting to participate in a review of the efforts that are being made to bring about the independence of Namibia, in accordance with decisions previously taken by the Council. As all are aware, the United Nations, and in particular the Security Council, bears a unique responsibility for furthering the interests of the people of Namibia and their aspirations for peace, justice, and independence. It has been two years since the Council last met to examine the question of Namibia, and it is therefore appropriate that it should wish to review what has transpired in the intervening period.

The participation in this debate of so many distinguished foreign ministers testifies to the importance and the urgency which the international community as a whole attaches to the attainment by the people of Namibia of their justly deserved and too long delayed independence. I especially welcome the presence here of the foreign ministers of the Front Line

States,[35] with which governments of the Western Contact Group have enjoyed an active, constructive, and vital partnership in our efforts to hasten Namibia's independence.

Finally, I welcome this opportunity to report to you on the role that my government, in partnership with the other members of the Western Contact Group, has sought to play in helping to promote a peaceful, negotiated settlement for the earliest possible attainment of Namibia's independence.

Before doing so, however, I wish to pay a special tribute to the Secretary-General. I know first hand his deeply felt commitment to the attainment of Namibia's independence. I have been impressed by his dedication and objectivity, and have full confidence in his ability to carry out the responsibilities assigned to him under Security Council Resolution 435. I am also aware of the efforts he and his staff have made to ensure that all is in readiness for the day when agreement is reached for implementation of the U.N. settlement plan.

I also wish to thank the Secretary-General for his report,[36] which provides an accurate summation of what has transpired since the Council last met on this issue in April, 1981. It is not necessary to recapitulate what he has already set out. I would, however, like to recall the very different circumstances that prevailed at the time of that last meeting.

The tone and the outcome of that debate were very much a reflection of the widespread disappointment over the failure of the Pre-Implementation Meeting in Geneva to reach agreement on a date for the start of the ceasefire envisaged in Security Council Resolution 435. The preimplementation meeting ended only a few days before the administration, of which I am now a member, took office in Washington. It became one of the urgent tasks of the new American Government to assess, jointly with its Contact Group partners, the reasons for the failure of the Geneva meeting.

It would be fair to say that the new American Government was the recipient of a great deal of advice at that time. I will be frank in telling you that there were those who advised strongly against a continuing U.S. role in pursuit of a negotiated settlement of the Namibian problem. It was said that the obstacles to a peaceful settlement were too great to be overcome, and that the interests of the United States in the region did not justify the tremendous commitment of time and energy that would be required. Needless to say, those responsible for formulating the policies of this administration did not share these views. Although mindful of the great difficulties involved, they were also aware of the efforts that had already been made, and of the opportunity which existed to resolve through peaceful negotiations, this pressing issue. They were in this regard sensitive to the cardinal importance attached to Namibia's early independence by the nations of Africa. These goals, Mr. President, more than justified a rededication of efforts which the Contact Group had first undertaken four years earlier.

At the same time, we were anxious in our renewed approach to the problem to avoid, if at all possible, the frustrations of the past. We sought an approach that would not result in the same disappointment so keenly felt—above all by the people of Namibia—following the failure of the Geneva preimplementation meeting. With this firmly in mind, we undertook a fresh round of consultations, first with our Contact partners, and then with the other concerned parties: the Front Line States, the South African Government, SWAPO, and the Namibian political parties that would also participate in the U.N.-supervised elections envisaged in Resolution 435.

In the course of these consultations several facts became abundantly clear:

—First, we were assured of the interest and the desire of all those directly concerned that the negotiations should continue.

[36] Reference is to U.N. Secretary-General Javier Pérez de Cuéllar's report concerning the implementation of U.N. Security Council Resolution 435 (1978) on the independence of Namibia. For the text of the report, see U.N. document S/15776, May 19, 1983, entitled Further Report of the Secretary-General Concerning the Implementation of Security Council Resolutions 435 (1978) and 439 (1978) Concerning the Question of Namibia.

—Secondly, it was clear that in the absence of a peaceful negotiated settlement leading to Namibia's independence, the situation of armed conflict and instability in the region would only worsen, with unacceptable consequences for all the inhabitants of the region.

—Finally, we were assured by those with the greatest stake in the success of the negotiations that the Contact Group had a continuing and important role to play in helping to bring about a peaceful settlement.

On the basis of this assessment, the foreign ministers of the Contact Group met in May of 1981 and decided to redouble their efforts to bring about a negotiated settlement. They reaffirmed their conviction that only a settlement under the aegis of the United Nations would find broad international acceptance, and that Security Council Resolution 435 continued to provide the basis for Namibia's peaceful transition to independence. Bearing in mind the difficulties that had arisen at the preimplementation meeting in Geneva, the Contact Group foreign ministers further decided to develop specific proposals that would address directly the concerns that had thus far prevented the implementation of Resolution 435. They considered that the purpose of these proposals should be to give all concerned greater confidence as regards the future of an independent Namibia.

Since the relaunching of their negotiating efforts in the spring of 1981, the members of the Contact Group have worked closely and intensively with all the parties concerned. It is a matter of the greatest regret to us, as I know it is to all of those here, that the promise of Namibia's independence has not yet been realized. At the same time, however, I believe it would be a mistake to discount the progress that has been achieved toward the implementation of Resolution 435 since the Council last met to review the situation.

—First, it is important to note that all parties concerned have reaffirmed their acceptance of Resolution 435. That resolution, and the settlement plan it endorsed, remains the only agreed and recognized basis for an internationally acceptable settlement of the Namibia question.

—All parties have committed themselves to constitutional principles which will serve as a guide to the elected Constituent Assembly in drafting a democratic constitution for an independent Namibia. This agreement, which was confirmed to the Secretary-General in July of last year [37] and which is noted in his report to the Security Council, has helped to reassure all those who will participate in the U.N.-supervised elections of the democratic future of an independent Namibia.

—Substantial progress has also been made in resolving the issues which were responsible for the unsuccessful outcome of the Geneva preimplementation meeting. In particular, through intensive consultations which took place in New York and Washington last summer, involving representatives of the frontline states, SWAPO, South Africa, and of the U.N. Secretariat, understandings were reached that will assure all parties to the elections of the fairness and impartiality of the process leading to Namibia's independence.

—Finally, through their own consultations with the parties concerned, the Secretary-General and his staff have made substantial progress in resolving outstanding questions concerning the composition and deployment of the military component of UNTAG. Here I would like once again to express our appreciation to the Secretary-General for the determined efforts he has made to ensure that all is in readiness for the implementation of the U.N. settlement plan.

Because of the substantial progress that has been made over the past 2 years, only two major issues remain to be resolved in preparation for the implementation of Resolution 435. These are:

—the choice of the electoral system to be employed in the elections, which all parties are agreed must be settled in accordance with the provisions of Resolution 435, and in a manner that does not cause delay; and —final, technical matters concerning the composition of the military component of UNTAG.

[37] Reference is to the submission by the Contact Group of the text of Principles for a Constituent Assembly and a Constitution for Namibia on July 12, 1982. For further information, see U.N. document S/15287.

Mr. President, while the United States is pleased with the record of what has been achieved over the past 2 years, we are by no means satisfied. Indeed, none of us can rest content until the goal which we seek has been attained. But the fact that much has been achieved justifies continued commitment to the course.

Apart from the specific accomplishments I have just mentioned there has been the development of an atmosphere of confidence which we hope will make it possible for the parties concerned to take the important political decisions necessary to go forward with the implementation of Resolution 435. We have been especially gratified by the constructive and flexible attitude displayed by the concerned parties, which has made possible the progress that has been achieved to date.

We share the concern that the factors relating to the regional situation in southern Africa, which are, however, outside the scope of the mandate of the Contact Group, have not yet permitted implementation of the U.N. plan. We believe that these issues should be resolved rapidly, in a manner consistent with the sovereignty of all states concerned, so that the people of Namibia can exercise their right of self-determination. The ministers have accordingly decided that the Contact Group should continue its work with all urgency.

We are convinced, now more than ever before, that with the continued good faith and cooperation of all concerned, our shared objective of a negotiated settlement leading to a stable, democratic, prosperous and independent Namibia will be realized.

Here, Mr. President, I would like to say a word about the role and the objectives of my government in these negotiations.

—I wish to stress above all that the United States neither desires nor seeks any special advantage or position for itself in these negotiations.

—It is not our intention, nor is it within our power, to impose our own views or wishes on those whose interests and aspirations are most directly involved.

—We fully respect the fact that the political decisions needed to proceed with the implementation of the U.N. settlement plan are sovereign decisions that can only be taken by the governments most immediately and directly concerned.

—Furthermore, we recognize that those who must take those decisions will wish to assure themselves that their own interests and security will be respected and protected.

—In the sometimes thankless role that we have assumed our sole objective has been to assist the parties in overcoming the difficulties that have to date prevented the implementation of Security Council Resolution 435 and the attainment of Namibia's independence.

—Finally, Mr. President, I wish to assure all those here assembled that the United States will continue to work for Namibia's transition to stable and prosperous independence once an agreement has been achieved. With other members of the United Nations, we are prepared to contribute a fair share to ensure the effectiveness of the U.N. Transition Assistance Group. We also stand ready to cooperate with others in providing the assistance that will be essential to giving all Namibians the opportunity to lead peaceful and productive lives.

Mr. President, I am keenly aware of the sense of frustration felt by members of this body because the aspirations of the people of Namibia have not been realized. We share that frustration, and we have sympathy for the people of Namibia, and the region, who suffer from the continuing conflict. We will not, however, allow our feelings of frustration to lead us to despair. Our common efforts will succeed. The only alternative to the continued, vigorous pursuit of a peaceful, negotiated settlement, is a more dangerous and ever more destructive escalation of the violence that the people of Namibia and those throughout the region have known too well too long.

Those of us who are priviliged to participate in the decisions of this body have a special responsibility to do all we can to help achieve Namibian independence peacefully and promptly. We are ready to work closely with other members of the Council, and with the parties concerned, to achieve such an outcome, which we know will also enhance the prospects for peace, security, and economic development throughout the region.

Secretary Shultz's Meetings With African Foreign Ministers

JOHN HUGHES. I'd like to run through this is in chronological order. The Secretary began his sessions here this afternoon with a session with the Foreign Minister of Zaire, Mr. Kamanda. That meeting lasted from 4:30 to 5:05. The participants on the U.S. side were the Secretary of State, Ambassador Kirkpatrick, and Assistant Secretaries Crocker and Hughes. The Secretary complimented the Zairian Foreign Minister on the progressive steps his country had taken in connection with amnesty in the past few days, announcing amnesty for all political prisoners and saw this within the framework of other positive developments in Zaire. [39] There was then talk of U.S.-Zaire relations which both sides agreed were very good. There was some discussion of world affairs; that was followed by a discussion about U.S. aid to Zaire. The Secretary indicated that the administration would continue pushing for the amount of aid it considered appropriate to Zaire and would work in Congress to achieve those totals. They then got into discussion about Namibia and some discussion of the upcoming resolution on Namibia in the U.N. Security Council. The Secretary indicated that the United States was determined to work for an independent Namibia in terms of U.N. Resolution 435.

After that, the Secretary met with SWAPO leader Nujoma. That lasted from 5:10 to 5:40. The U.S. participants again were the Secretary of State, Ambassador Kirkpatrick, and Assistant Secretaries Crocker and Hughes. There was extensive discussion during that meeting on the future of Namibia. The Secretary once again underlined U.S. commitment to an independent Namibia and asked Mr. Nujoma to talk a little about the kind of independent Namibia he foresaw. Mr. Nujoma responded and gave remarks along those lines as had been requested. The Secretary again stressed that the United States wants to see the emergence of an independent Namibia and was committed to working toward that end.

The third meeting in the hotel was with the frontline states plus Nigeria. That meeting lasted from 6 until 7:10. On the U.S. side, the participants were the Secretary of State and Assistant Secretaries Crocker and Hughes. The frontline states, represented by their Foreign Ministers and their Permanent Representatives, were Tanzania, Botswana, Angola, Zambia, Mozambique, Zimbabwe, plus Nigeria. Again, there was general discussion about the issue of Namibia and once again, the United States reiterated its commitment to an independent Namibia. The Secretary said the United States felt a great deal of progress had already been made in this connection and that the remaining issues really were resolvable given the proper environment. He pointed out that as a matter of fact, as an observation, there was a connection between the sovereignty and security in the region. The facts were and are that there are foreign forces in Angola and there are non-Namibian forces in Namibia. There is violence in the area about which the United States is concerned. The Secretary again said that it was his feeling that the nub of the problem on Namibia was soluble if the surrounding environment in the region was made secure and the United States had an acute interest in working to help create the conditions—create the environment—which would enable countries in the region to be sovereign and secure and to undertake sturdy economic development. He said the United States was committed to dampening the cycle of violence in southern Africa and creating the climate of confidence which would permit the sovereignty, the security and the economic development which I already mentioned.

Q. Mr. Hughes, what sort of changes, if any, have there been that might have been indicated to the Foreign Ministers in terms of the U.S. position on—the linkage issues?

[38] Source: Office of Press Relations, Department of State. John Hughes, Department of State Spokesman, conducted the briefing following Secretary Shultz's meetings with the Foreign Ministers of Zaire, Tanzania, Botswana, Angola, Zambia, Mozambique, Zimbabwe, and Nigeria. The Secretary also met with SWAPO leader Sam Nujoma.

[39] Reference is to the granting of amnesty to all political prisoners in Zaire on May 19, 1983.

MR. HUGHES. Well, the United States really wasn't discussing linkage. It was discussing security in the entire area, and that was the point that the Secretary was trying to make. He was not talking about Angolan troops alone. He was talking about all foreign forces in Angola, and he was talking about, obviously South African forces in Namibia, making the point that to get to the sovereignty, the security and the opportunity then to further economic development, clearly those forces of all characters have to eventually be withdrawn.

Q. Would it be fair to characterize this as the beginning of a personal effort on the part of the Secretary of State to try to resolve that impasse?

MR. HUGHES. Well, the Secretary's been involved and the President's been involved, and the Secretary made that point in the meetings because the United States does have a commitment to the independence of Namibia, but it certainly is the first time the Secretary has seen Mr. Nujoma, for example, though I think Mr. Nujoma has seen a previous Secretary of State.[40] But they had not met. I suppose that was a first. And certainly these meetings, I think, this afternoon demonstrate the U.S. concern and commitment and specifically the Secretary's, yes.

Q. Have the frontline states, though, seemed to relax their position on the removal of the Cuban troops from Angola? They say that's totally irrelevant.

MR. HUGHES. Well, I don't think I should speak for them. I think they can speak for themselves.

Q. Has the United States relaxed its position on that?

MR. HUGHES. It's not a question—the United States doesn't have a position, the United States has an observation. There are certain realities in play here and one of the realities is the presence of Soviet-Cuban military power in Angola and that's one of the realities observed by the South Africans, so it's not really the United States who is saying you have a situation; you have a reality and somebody has to work at that.

. . . . . .

Q. Was there any indication that the United States was expected to put more pressure on South Africa?

MR. HUGHES. Well, the United States isn't in the business of putting pressure on either side. The United States is in the business of trying to use its good offices to increase commitment on both sides to break through this impasse.

Q. When the talks were over, how did the Secretary feel about them? Was he pleased or was he frustrated, was he—

MR. HUGHES. I think that he felt that all three meetings were very worthwhile and constructive.

Q. Thank you. Thanks very much.

Resolution 532 (1983), Adopted by the U.N. Security Council, May 31, 1983[41]

Security Council's Call For South Africa's Implementation of Resolution 435 (1978)

The Security Council,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General (S/15776),

Recalling General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 and 2145 (XXI) of 27 October 1966,

Statement Issued by the Contact Group on Namibia, Paris, June 8, 1983 [43]

Contact Group's Endorsement of the Security Council's Reaffirmation of Resolution 435 (1978)

In continuation of the meeting we had at Williamsburg, the Foreign Ministers of Canada, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the United States, and the Political Director of the United Kingdom representing the British State Secretary for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs [44] met to pursue the efforts to achieve an early settlement of the question of Namibia in accordance with U.N. Security Council Resolution 435.

They welcome the constructive spirit in which the recent Security Council debate was conducted. In particular, they noted that the spirit has made possible the unanimous adoption of Security Council Resolution 532. "The United States Rejects Both the Status Quo of Apartheid and the Use of Violence"

. . . . . .

Q. Also, do you have anything with respect—has the United States transmitted anything to the Pretoria Government with respect to the executions that are scheduled for tomorrow morning?

A. I have a guidance which goes back to yesterday, which I think I would want to use rather than trying to talk specifically about anything we might be doing directly with the government. Let me just make a statement for you in response to your question.

The Department has taken note of the announcement that the State President of South Africa has commuted the death sentences of three self-proclaimed members of the African National Congress—the ANC—convicted of taking part in activities in which no one was killed, but denied the clemency appeals for the three who were convicted of murder. [47]

The latter three were convicted of participating in attacks against South African installations which resulted in four deaths. They had waived their right to appeal their convictions and applied directly for clemency, which has now been denied.

The United States voted on December 7, 1982, in favor of U.N. Security Council Resolution 525 which urged the Government of South Africa to commute the death sentences of the three. In accordance with U.N. Security Council Resolution 525, the United States made known its concern to the South African Government regarding the six South Africans condemned to death. [48]

In the wake of the car bomb attack in Pretoria, in which 18 were killed and 200 injured, responsibility for which was subsequently claimed by the ANC, and the South African attack on Maputo, Mozambique, [49] the United States calls on all parties to the conflict in southern Africa to halt the growing cycle of violence and to dedicate themselves to the pursuit of peaceful resolution of the problems of the region.

The United States rejects both the status quo of apartheid and the use of violence as a means to bring about change or resolve problems. We do not believe that further deaths will contribute to a resolution of the problems of southern Africa.

[46] Source: Office of Press Relations, Department of State. Alan Romberg, Department of State Acting Spokesman, conducted the briefing which began at 12:25 p.m.

[47] On June 6, 1983, President Marais Viljoen of South Africa announced that three of the six African National Congress members convicted of attacks against South African installations would have their sentences commuted from death to life imprisonment. They had been involved in attacks in which no one was killed. The three remaining members, Thelle Simon Mogoerane, Jerry Semano Mosoli, and Marcus Thabo Motaung, who had taken part in attacks where deaths occurred, were hanged in Pretoria Prison on June 9.

Prepared Statement by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for Trade and Investment Policy (Cornell) Before a Subcommittee of the House Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs Committee, June 8, 1983 [50]

South African Restrictions

I appreciate the opportunity to provide the Treasury Department's views on the proposed Solarz amendment to the Export Administration Act. [51] We oppose this proposed legislation on four broad grounds.

First, the provisions would be contrary to the administration's policy of constructive engagement with the South African Government, as Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Wisner explains in some detail in his statement.

Second, we favor minimum government interference with market decisions. Restrictions on bank lending or on the freedom of Americans to buy gold coins would be inconsistent with this approach. The mandatory code of employment conduct would vastly expand government controls on American firms. Restrictions against krugerrand imports may in addition be illegal under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT).

Third, restrictions on U.S. bank lending to South Africa could be viewed both at home and abroad as evidence of U.S. readiness to use capital controls for political ends. This could erode international confidence in the freedom to invest in the United States and in the security of foreign investments in this country, and thus impair the credibility of our international monetary and financial policies. Applying the restrictions to foreign subsidiaries of U.S. financial institutions could also bring the operation of these institutions into conflict with the laws of third countries, creating foreign resentment about—and damaging retaliation against—what would be considered to be the extraterritorial reach of U.S. legislation.

Finally, the proposed measures would likely be ineffective in imposing significant costs on South Africa, since South African entities could obtain bank loans and investment funds from other countries. Americans would still be able to purchase and hold krugerrands abroad, and South African gold could be imported as part of the content of other foreign gold coins and gold bullion.

Since the statements by Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Wisner, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Commerce Dennin, [52] and Vice-Chairman Lord go into detail on foreign policy considerations and on the proposed mandatory code of conduct, my detailed comments will be devoted to the proposed restrictions on bank lending and the prohibition of krugerrand imports. I should point out, however, that Section 104 of H.R. 1693 (sanctions for noncompliance with the code of conduct) would conflict with the 1946 income tax treaty with South Africa [53] by its denial of U.S. income tax credits for taxes paid to the South African Government.

The Treasury has strong objections to Section 201 of Title II, which would prohibit U.S. banks and other financial and lending institutions operating under the laws of the United States (including insurance companies) from making any loan, directly or through a foreign branch or subsidiary, to the South African Government or to any corporation, partnership, or other organization owned or controlled by the South African Government. These provisions interfere with the free movement of capital, in effect imposing discriminatory exchange controls.

Imposition of exchange controls on U.S. loans to South Africa would be unlikely to prevent South Africa from obtaining foreign credits. Capital is fungible. South Africa could increase its demand for loans from other countries, which could then borrow the needed funds in the United [52] For the statements of Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Frank G. Wisner II and Deputy Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Africa, the Near East and South Asia Joseph F. Dennin, see South African Restrictions, pp. 146–149 and 175–182, respectively.

States. We would then continue indirectly to finance South African credits. Outstanding loans to South Africa from commercial banks in the major industrialized countries total $14.1 billion (end June 1982 data). Of this, claims on South Africa by U.S. banks and their foreign branches total about $3.7 billion (June 1982 data), including some $620 million owed by South African public borrowers, including state enterprises. Much of the U.S. bank lending to South Africa probably finances U.S. exports, i.e., consists of trade financing.

This form of U.S. Government intervention, which would apply the rules to foreign subsidiaries, could bring the operation of U.S. owned financial institutions into conflict with the laws of third countries. This would add to foreign resentment about what is considered the extraterritorial reach of U.S. legislation. It would almost certainly invite foreign retaliation against the United States and U.S. investors.

The imposition of restrictions on the importation of krugerrands proposed in this bill may violate U.S. international obligations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT). A prohibition of imports from an individual country, such as South Africa, would normally be considered a discriminatory trade measure under the GATT. It could leave the United States open to a complaint in the GATT from South Africa, and the possibility of GATT sanctioned countermeasures by South Africa. The GATT does permit the adoption of measures, under Article XX, relating to the importation or exportation of gold or silver, if they are not applied "in a manner which would constitute a means of arbitrary or unjustifiable discrimination between countries where the same conditions prevail." Because the proposed bill would apply only to imports of South African gold coins, and not to all gold coins, the proposed restrictions would appear to be arbitrary or unjustifiable discrimination. There is no GATT case law, however, explaining the meaning of this phrase, and how the exception to normal GATT law, contained in Article XX, is to be applied. Even if the U.S. discrimination were found to be justified, however, South Africa may be able to make a GATT case which would permit it to retaliate against imports from the United States under GATT provisions.

The proposed ban on imports of South African gold coins would probably not result in a corresponding reduction in U.S. gold demand or imports of foreign gold. Americans would still be able to purchase and hold krugerrands abroad, and new marketing efforts could be developed in an effort to get Americans to do so. Americans might also switch from buying krugerrands to purchasing coins and gold pieces of other countries. South Africa would still benefit after such switching, since gold for the production of most foreign coins is purchased in the market to which South Africa supplies about two-thirds of newly mined non-Soviet gold.

In the final analysis, a ban on U.S. krugerrand imports would affect South African earnings from gold sales only to the extent that such a ban would have an impact on gold prices generally. It has been the policy of South Africa to sell all its gold production, either in the form of bullion or coins, and not to vary this production significantly. If Americans switched to buying krugerrands abroad or to foreign coins produced by gold purchased in the world gold market, the overall demand for gold would not be changed and the price would not be affected. If the U.S. demand for coins fell, South African bullion sales would rise as krugerrand sales fell, leaving the quantity of South African gold sales unchanged. The lower demand would, however, tend to lower the price received by all gold producers, including South African. Finally, if Americans were to switch to purchasing coins and medallions minted from official reserves rather than new production, the price of gold would also tend to decline, because of the increase in supply.

Any downward pressure on gold prices consequent to a U.S. ban on krugerrand imports is not likely to be strong. Even in the extremely unlikely event that the demand for South African gold fell by the full equivalent of recent annual U.S. imports of about one million ounces of krugerrands, this would be small relative to the 40 million ounces of new gold supplied to the market last year. The effect on gold prices, and on the value of South African gold exports, would not be large.

In summary, Mr. Chairman, we oppose this sort of legislation not only in principle, as a departure from traditional U.S. external economic policies, but also on practical grounds. We think, for the reasons outlined, that it will not have the intended effect; but, more important, we believe that, while failing in its intended effect, it will be counterproductive and costly to U.S. exporters, U.S. workers, and U.S. investors. In an interdependent world where money and capital are fungible and where the U.S. has viable, serious competitors, countries which are the intended targets of such legislation can get what they want from those competitors. Thus, the intended political and economic effects are not achieved, but heavy costs are borne by U.S. citizens for no demonstrable reason.

Under Secretary Eagleburger's Speech: A Summation of U.S. Policy on Southern Africa

Q. Is there any shift of nuance or flavor or policy in what linkage the administration is drawing between the Cuban troops and the Namibians, a withdrawal from Namibia by South Africa?

SENIOR OFFICIAL. No shift.

Q. You don't then mean to deemphasize your position that there should be a parallel withdrawal of the Cubans, or at least a commitment to draw the Cubans from Angola as the South Africans make their commitment to withdraw from Namibia?

A. No, there's no change in the basic situation. Obviously, the negotiation has moved along since the last time we had a major speech. [55] This is the highest level speech on this subject during the course of this administration, and the most pulling together of all the threads of our policy in southern Africa, but there is no change on that issue.

Q. The South Africans say that they can't leave Namibia until the Cubans leave Angola and the Angolans say the Cubans can't go because they have an insurrection in the south of the country which the South Africans and I believe the Israelis are supporting with arms and which we're giving moral support to since we've had their leader here and given him an honored reception. [56]

Isn't this a sort of Catch-22 permanent situation? Aren't we partly responsible for the nonresolution of the problem?

A. If this problem is resolved, as we hope it will be, it'll be largely because of efforts; not that we are the obstacle to the effort.

Q. What is our attitude, then, to the UNITA insurrection, which is the reason for the Cubans?

A. Our position is that the initiative that we have taken there provides the basis for the independence for Namibia, and, if that is successful, will lay the basis for a return to peace and an end to the civil conflict, in fact, in Angola.

It is not a Catch-22, but the situation that exists between the parties inside Angola is not part of this negotiation. That's a matter for Angolans to resolve.

Q. But what is the U.S. attitude to UNITA, then?

A. As we have said before, UNITA is a credible nationalist force, an important element of the Angolan political equation. But the way in which various Angolan parties achieve internal peace is their affair, and it is an internal Angolan matter.

Q. You say negotiations are moving along regarding the Cuban issue. Are we getting any closer? Can you point to any particular progress that we're going to resolve that in our favor soon?

A. We believe that there is a positive evolution in this negotiation, but we're not here today, and this speech is not pegged upon any dramatic, new announcement that we're in a position to make. But we believe that in the wake of the visit here in April of a senior Angolan team, [57] that there has been further evolution. We remain in contact, and when we have announcements to make, we will.

The speech is designed to put that initiative, and other things we're doing in southern Africa, in a broader context to pull together all the elements of our southern African strategy that have been developed and put in place over the past 2 1/2 years, and to make clear how the pieces fit together with each other; and to indicate that constructive engagement is a regional approach to all the countries of the area, and not just something defined in terms of Namibia, for example.

Q. Why was the decision made at this time to deliver this speech to, as you say, pull together all the threads?

A. In part because we have over the past 2 1/2 years set some things in place, both as concerns our policy toward South Africa, our support for constructive change in South Africa, our effort to get dialog going between South Africa and a number of its neighbors, our efforts to communicate at the highest level with a number of leaders of the area at the head-of-state level.

We have also moved the 435 process on Namibia to the point where it is ready to be implemented, provided we can get the basis for a political decision to go forward with it. So the time is right.

In addition, we have the perception, from time to time, that there are those who misconstrue some of what we're doing in the area. We felt the time had come for a major statement of the coherence of our approach to the region as a whole.

Q. Is it fair to say, then, that you feel that your policy is now in place in southern Africa after 2 years of implementing it?

A. Yes, indeed, we would.

Q. What are the prospects for getting an agreement this year?

A. I'm not going to give you percentages. We obviously think this is a going negotiation; that it has a good chance of success, but, beyond that, I don't think we want to try and put bets on the table.

Q. In the speech, . . . link the Namibian situation with the President: "The President is committed to Namibia's independence." Is there any special significance in linking that with the President?

A. I think, as the opening paragraph of the speech made clear, this is a region, southern Africa, which is of growing importance to Western and to U.S. interests. The President has himself been involved from the early days of that negotiation in laying the basis for the policy. It is, obviously, in our interest as we seek to become something we have not always been—a credible actor vis-à-vis all the key parties in the region, to make sure the President stands behind this effort, that he is interested in this effort, and that he considers this an important initiative.

Southern Africa: America's Responsibility for Peace and Change

I am grateful for this opportunity to speak to you who are so involved in helping to shape this nation's consideration of critical choices. I have come to speak to an issue that has occupied an important place on this administration's agenda—an issue of common interest to the Western world: an issue central to international stability.

From this podium, spokesmen from the several administrations of recent times have addressed the responsibilities which the United States bears for the great crisis areas of the globe—Europe, the Middle East, Asia, Latin America. Tonight I invite you to join me in considering what is at stake in southern Africa, and what role we can play in shaping that region's future. My message is not an easy one: It is a message of responsibility—responsibility for the use of American influence and power in dealing with a question of substantial and growing national interest.

I do not have to tell this audience that there is a crisis in southern Africa. Nearly a decade ago, as we stood mesmerized by our engagement in Southeast Asia and by escalating warfare in the Middle East, Portugal's empire in Africa collapsed. In its wake, southern Africa's conflicts, rooted as they were in longstanding struggles for decolonization and racial equality, became world issues—issues that would engage our national interests and test our resolve. Angola became an area of intense civil strife and contest between the Soviet Union and the West, the war for Zimbabwe's independence intensified, Mozambique was caught up in regional conflict, and the struggle for change in South Africa assumed more violent and polarized forms. Wars which had been more or less contained within national boundaries spread across frontiers, and the cycle of violence which has come to plague the region, took root.

In retrospect, Western indifference to change in southern Africa played a part in creating this situation. As a nation we were not well equipped to deal with the region. Our involvement had been superficial; we knew little of its actors or its dynamics. Our body politic was polarized. The left was transfixed by the issue of racism, while the right was too often prepared to interpret events only in the light of the East–West competition. In spite of these domestic divisions, three administrations have attempted to catch up with fast moving events, define our national interests, and decide how to use our influence.

The divisions of the past, I regret to say, still linger. There are those who would assure our irrelevance. As we meet here tonight, voices in our Congress, media, and public call for punitive measures against governments which do not please us—banning bank loans to South Africa or krugerrand imports from South Africa, denying access to the stabilization programs of the International Monetary Fund or escalating petty trade controls, banning food aid to Mozambique or development assistance to Zimbabwe. Others repeat the slogans of liberation, while denying us the ability to add an ounce of political will or diplomatic investment to solving the region's problems. At a time when we need all the leverage available to us, some argue for disinvestment and escape. They confuse the making of statements with the ability to influence events.

There are those outside Africa whose motives are more cynical. They are the advocates of violence, who would turn the landscape of southern Africa into an enlarged version of Lebanon, with the sovereignty, independence, and economic viability of the states in the region subordinated to a battle between South Africa and its neighbors. These forces would welcome such an outcome, since it would present new opportunities for neocolonial exploitation. They are more than willing to shed African blood and to supply copious quantities of weapons, even though they know violence cannot create anything of value in southern Africa. Violence, for these outsiders, is not a means to achieve national self-determination or to end apartheid. Rather, it is an end in itself, a political vehicle to enhance external influence and permit the political and ideological subjugation of independent Africa. The United States, on the other hand, proceeds from the conviction that our national interest and the interests of the West demand an engagement—constructive and peaceful—in the affairs of southern Africa. The United States is, I believe, uniquely situated to speak to all sides in the conflict.

The region has enormous potential—positive and negative. Historically it is a zone of Western influence and has been so for three hundred years. But direct Western control has ended. Decolonization, peaceful and violent, left a legacy of weak institutions, conflicting nationalisms, fear and loss of confidence in any reliable hand.

The implications are clear. If we wish to shape events, we must be prepared to take initiatives, make investments, support those things we believe in, build institutions and bridges. We must, in short, be involved. And we must, as well, be prepared to oppose those from outside Africa who claim a right to violent intervention.

To succeed in southern Africa, we must define a coherent regional strategy. Apart from Namibia, we are talking about a community of sovereign states. Southern Africa is interdependent economically in its infrastructure, its populations, markets, its natural links and to an important degree in its external orientation. The region, unfortunately, suffers from a current and aggravated temptation to depend upon the instruments of violence.

One way or another the states of southern Africa have to evolve explicit or tacit ground rules for cooperation and coexistence, for the alternatives are all too obvious. Both South Africa and the independent African states to its north have enunciated at different times a vision of coexistence. Regional coexistence, the only path to peace and stability, has an additional meaning. Unless there is peace and stability in southern Africa, it will prove impossible to encourage essential change in South Africa—and by change I mean a basic shift away from apartheid.

At present, the issue of Namibia, and South Africa's continuing control there, the presence of Cuban forces in Angola, and the practice of harboring guerrillas and dissident movements to strike at targets across borders, pose severe challenges to regional security and Western diplomacy. As a region, southern Africa contains parallels to the tragedies of the Middle East. A cycle of violence has begun: unless it is reversed the interests of the region and the West will be severely damaged. If southern Africa is at war, the consequences for South Africa will be clear: increased spending on war; reduced political will for addressing the domestic agenda of negotiated, evolutionary change; and a heightened polarization of attitudes that can only distort the internal South African debate about the means and forms of change. Similarly, if the region is at war, the economies and institutions of the neighboring African states will be undermined, distorted, and perhaps destroyed. No amount of Western or international support and solidarity with these states will be productive if the politics of development and coexistence continue to be subordinated to the politics of survival and war.

It is for all these reasons that this administration has committed its prestige and energy to defining a regional strategy and using our influence to shape events. The undertaking has several aspects which, taken together, are directed at encouraging enhanced regional security, economic development, and peaceful change.

Namibia

The quest for Namibia's independence remains for this administration, as it was for our predecessors, a key object of American diplomacy. The unresolved status of Namibia creates a dangerous vacuum in the area and serves as a magnet for violence and external meddling. Namibia remains Africa's last colony, and a focal point of the continent's and the nonaligned world's attention. Its people suffer from war and outside domination. The United States long ago accepted responsibility for helping to secure Namibia's independence; we have, since then, made a considerable contribution toward achieving that goal. Under President Ford we defined the first procedure for a peaceful move to independence. Under the Carter administration, we joined with our allies—France, Canada, Great Britain, and Germany—in negotiating U.N. Security Council Resolution 435, a document of seminal importance which defines how transition to independence under U.N. authority will occur.

During the Reagan administration we have faced squarely the need to secure conditions which will make it politically possible for South Africa to relinquish its position in a territory it has controlled since 1916. [59]

We inherited a stalemated negotiating process. Since that time, we and our allies, working through what we call the Contact Group, have elaborated constitutional principles to guide the framers of the constitution for an independent Namibia. We have successfully resolved a series of troublesome issues related to the role of the United Nations. The fruits of this intensive diplomacy are impressive. Through sustained and coordinated effort with our allies, the frontline states and SWAPO, the South Africans, the internal Namibian parties, and the U.N. Secretary-General and his officials, we have virtually all elements in place for the implementation of Resolution 435.

There is, admittedly, some frustration over the time it has taken to move as far as we have. But these are complex and delicate questions which have required months of quiet negotiation. There is, today, virtually unanimous agreement on the basis for resolving this intricate and important problem. We are at the point where the transition to independence can begin as soon as the key parties are prepared to take the necessary political decisions.

Angola

With the Government of Angola we have undertaken a separate but parallel negotiation which, if successful, will provide for the departure of Cuban forces, thus opening the way to a South African decision to implement the international agreements so painstakingly developed on Namibia's transition to independence—while setting the stage for peace in Angola itself. In a year and a half of talks, we have sought to build confidence in our objectives, and to establish a principle of broad applicability to the region at large.

That principle is reciprocity. Progress in the area can be achieved only if all parties make a contribution, and only if the security and sovereignty of each is respected. South Africa must leave Angola's southern provinces and it must leave Namibia. Angola, on the other hand, can make such steps possible, while remaining true to its principles, by assuring, as a separate sovereign act, the withdrawal of Cuban combat forces from its territory.

The position of the United States is clear. The President is committed to Namibia's independence. He wants to assist in creating a peaceful and independent Angola in a peaceful and prosperous region. He is prepared to use his full influence to achieve these ends.

A Framework For Regional Security

The quest for peace in southern Africa does not stop with Namibia and Angola. Our diplomacy has consciously sought broader regional security. We have moved to rebuild our relations with strife torn Mozambique. We have responded to Mozambique's difficult economic circumstances with food aid and will shortly send an ambassador there. We have pressed for dialogue between South Africa and Mozambique, and an end to cross-border violence. Our efforts have been rewarded with two rounds of talks at ministerial level between the governments, and a commitment to a continued search for understanding despite the pressures of recurring violence. The dialogue is fragile, but we will continue to do what we can to foster it.

Similarly, between South Africa and Zimbabwe and South Africa and Lesotho we have quietly urged patience, restraint and dialogue. Here again our efforts have achieved a measure of success. But I repeat, the framework is new; it is vulnerable and only through good will and reciprocal undertakings will it survive.

This concept of regional security in southern Africa rests on several key premises:

—First, we are talking about sovereignty. Apart from Namibia, the region consists of sovereign states which recognize the rights and obligations of that statehood. Respect for international boundaries and renunciation of the use of violence across them are central to any framework for international security. There can be no double standards for either South Africa or its neighbors. The obligations of statehood, in southern Africa as elsewhere, are basic and reciprocal.

—Second, the United States categorically reaffirms the principle that all states have a duty to refrain from tolerating or acquiescing in organized activities within their territory by guerrillas or dissidents planning acts of violence in the territory of another state. This applies equally to South Africa and its neighbors.

—Third, regional security cannot rest solely on the activity, the vision, or the influence of outsiders. Our task is not to impose a structure of security. The structure must rest on regional realities, mutual interests, and direct channels of communication. Our role is to foster a climate conducive to building it. We have made a beginning by stressing our readiness to work for reduced violence, to facilitate contact and communication, to build bridges and to serve as honest broker. To be effective, our stance must rest on a capacity to speak credibly to all states. We are uniquely qualified to play this role and we intend to play it. But it is up to the governments directly concerned—in South Africa, Mozambique, Zimbabwe, Lesotho, Botswana, Zambia, and others—to make the basic choice between the temptations of violence and the challenge of coexistence.

—Fourth, we recognize that it is not realistic to speak of regional security without reference to the domestic political dimension of coexistence between states. The dilemma we face is that peaceful domestic change in southern Africa and regional security are both urgently needed if the risks of growing international strife are to be avoided.

In South Africa, about which I will speak further in a moment, the imperative of peaceful change is domestic; South Africa has enjoyed sovereign statehood for over 70 years. Yet, a structure of regional stability in southern Africa is unlikely to take root in the absence of basic movement away from a system of legally entrenched rule by the white minority in South Africa. By the same token, peaceful change toward social justice and equality for all South Africans is unlikely to happen in a regional climate of escalating strife and polarization.

In Namibia, we and our Contact Group allies are working effectively as a matter of highest priority to bring about negotiated peaceful change to internationally recognized independence. Success would directly benefit in many ways our goals of building regional security, addressing the issue of cross-border violence and foreign intervention.

The Dimensions of U.S. Regional Involvement

There are those who see in southern Africa's political tensions an opportunity for the West to identify the good guys and the bad guys and then to align itself accordingly. Others argue that the United States cannot maintain constructive ties based on principle and mutual interest with both South Africa and its African-ruled neighbors. Our policy of constructive engagement rejects simplistic stereotypes based on race and ideology as inadequate guidelines for U.S. policy. From the outset of this administration, we have signaled our hope for constructive relations with all governments in southern Africa. No regional state or external power can or should define our relations for us.

Accordingly, if we are to be effective in this region, we must maintain a balanced policy that is relevant to its needs and that fully reflects its diversity and divisions. Politically, we seek to bolster those whose development policies and external actions warrant that support. But we have also consciously held out the option to others to diversify their external orientation and to pursue closer economic ties with the West. Our cooperative diplomacy on Namibia has brought us into intensive contact with the frontline states, a grouping that spans a wide range of African political choices—some of them still evolving. Vice President Bush's travel last November to Zimbabwe, Zambia, and Zaire—and return visits here by their leaders—enable us to nurture these important ties. Our substantial commitment to the success and health of newly independent Zimbabwe is another dimension of our effort to help this strategically important region find stability and growth. While Zimbabwe faces serious difficulties, its leadership has committed itself to the principles of political reconciliation and a mixed economy. Because of its key geographic position and relatively strong economic base, it is important that Zimbabwe not fail as a new nation.

Economically, some 25 percent of U.S. bilateral assistance to sub-Saharan Africa goes to southern African states, six of which are land-locked. Though rich in minerals and human potential, most states of the area share to a greater or lesser degree in Africa's current economic crisis.

As part of our effort to deal with the region's economic crisis, we are working to support Zambia's efforts to restructure its economy and stimulate its promising agricultural sector. The recent visit of President Kaunda to the United States and subsequent intensive consultations have given impetus to this process.

Southern Africa's current drought—the worst in decades—represents a serious challenge to economic security and human well-being in the region. After careful review of this potential food disaster, we have recently increased by $25 million our P.L. 480 food aid programs for affected nations, beyond the $79 million for FY 83–84 already programed.[60] Over the longer term, even as political tensions threaten to divide southern Africa, there are potent factors of geography, history and economics that pull these states together. Transport links, the pattern of interstate boundaries, and the natural flow of goods and people all point in the direction of regional cooperation. We are supporting the regional efforts in transport and food security of the Southern African Development Coordination Conference (SADCC), while also quietly urging South Africa and its neighbors to maintain pragmatic trade and customs agreements based on mutual benefit.

South Africa

It is essential that South Africans get on with the business of deciding and shaping their own future. The political system in South Africa is morally wrong. We stand against injustice, and therefore we must reject the legal and political premises and consequences of apartheid. Indeed, it is increasingly recognized as impossible to maintain by a growing number of South Africans of all races.

We reject unequivocally attempts to denationalize the black South African majority and relegate them to citizenship in the separate tribal homelands. We do not and will not recognize these areas. All Americans are repelled by the sight of long-settled, stable black communities being uprooted and their inhabitants forcibly removed to barren sites in far away "homelands" they have never seen before. Neither can we countenance repression of organizations and individuals by means of administrative measures like banning and detention without due process of law.

By one means or another, South Africa's domestic racial system will be changed. Black South Africans will gain fuller participation in all aspects of South African society and politics. Our policy is directed, therefore, not at whether a nonracial order is in South Africa's future or what the shape of that nonracial order will be, but how that nonracial order will be arrived at. Western policy toward South Africa today must focus on how various black groups acquire the basis and influence necessary to participate in a genuine bargaining process that produces change acceptable to all. The future of South Africa depends on those who participate in shaping it. A peaceful process of change depends on support from those who reject, as we do, both alignment with the current racial order, and violence as a means of ending it.

We believe that South African and U.S. interests are best served by encouraging the change that is now underway in South Africa. We are committed to strengthening the capacity of black South Africans to participate in their country's society as equals—economically, culturally, and politically. It is our view that such "power to participate" can only be made—it cannot be taken. This is not and cannot be a zero-sum game, since power taken by force, or a revolutionary upheaval, will likely leave little worth fighting over.

American efforts should, therefore, concentrate on positive steps which back constructive change and those who are working for it. We applaud the steps which are being taken to expand home ownership opportunities, trade union rights, and access to education. The structure and substance of apartheid is inevitably affected as education budgets grow dramatically and blacks find new opportunities and new influence as workers and consumers. The recent South African court decision to confirm urban residency rights of blacks is an important development.[61] Equally, the findings of the de Lange Education Commission underline the necessity of a sustained expansion of opportunity on a basis of greater equity. The commission's findings and recommendations deserve recognition and support.

South Africa retains an independent judiciary and a distinguished bar—two institutions which tie it to the finest traditions of Western democracy. Indeed, the rule of law is for South Africa, as for any country, a precious inheritance. In recent years the power of the court has been circumscribed by new acts of parliament and police practices which remove from the courts the ability to review executive action. Nowhere is this more apparent than in the system of detention, where the right of access to those in the hands of the police has been limited. Such a system leads to abuse. There are few things Americans should be prouder of than the rule of law in our society. Similarly, we admire efforts by South Africans to retain an independent judiciary. Those who work to rebuild the rule of law are forging anew South Africa's more important links to Western democracy. We wish them well.

[61] On May 31, 1983, the South African Appeals Court ruled unanimously that migrant workers who held jobs in South Africa for 10 consecutive years were entitled to permanent residence with their families in black townships.

Our policy—constructive engagement—supports those inside and outside of government in South Africa, who are committed to peaceful change away from apartheid. Our support is both tangible and political. It is essential that we in the West, who have the most to offer toward peaceful change and much to lose if it fails, send an unambiguous message to the people of this increasingly important country. The message is, first, that we agree with those South Africans who recognize that change is imperative and, second, that we are determined to permit them the opportunity to shape and define that change free of the threat of foreign intervention. Constructive engagement seeks to support trade unionists, students, entrepreneurs, government leaders, cultural-political movements, civic associations, and religious organizations which, through their commitment to peaceful change away from apartheid, can help make a better future for all citizens of South Africa. Such groups and individuals must prosper if there is to be multiracial bargaining leading to a government based on the consent of the governed.

To support the positive aspects of change in South Africa, the Reagan administration, with the support of Congress, has initiated new programs over the past 2 years:

—A $4 million-a-year scholarship program which brings approximately 100 black South African students a year to the United States for undergraduate and graduate degrees. The majority of these students are studying in the hard sciences. By 1985 there will be some 400 black South Africans enrolled in U.S. institutions of higher education, and we will begin graduating more black engineers, chemists, and computer engineers than now exist in South Africa.

—In cooperation with the AFL-CIO, programs of support are being initiated to train labor leaders in South Africa in skills which will improve the collective bargaining ability of black and mixed trade unions and enhance the dialogue between the American and South African labor communities. The U.S. contribution to this program will increase from $190,000 this fiscal year to $875,000 next year.

—In cooperation with the National African Federated Chamber of Commerce of South Africa, we are beginning this year a project to support small business development in the black community. Over the next two years, some $3 million will be invested in this project designed to enhance the economic leverage of the black community.

—In conjunction with black community groups throughout South Africa, we have underway a tutorial program to assist black high school students preparing for the matriculation examination which will determine their professional futures. Over the next 2 years this $2 million project should significantly boost the number of blacks eligible for university admission.

—Moreover, the U.S. Senate has recently expressed its interest in setting aside $5 million for an internal scholarship program as a counterpart to the program now bringing black South African students to the United States. This program, implemented through private South African institutions, could provide scholarship support to some 400 black South African students per year.

I do not pretend that these programs, in and of themselves, are the answer to apartheid. But they are indicative of an approach that fully justifies the term "constructive." We are tangibly backing the things we believe in. By strengthening the educational standards of the black population, by enhancing the organizational ability of labor, and by expanding the business base of the black community, we are engaged in institution-building for change away from apartheid while helping to encourage the alternative to it.

In terms of supporting change in South Africa, the American business community has considerably more experience than the U.S. Government. Over the past decade, American corporations with subsidiaries and affiliates in South Africa have become a force for change. The activities of these firms have had an impact far beyond the book value of U.S. investment in South Africa, and far greater than is commonly recognized. U.S. firms have led the way toward equal employment opportunities in South Africa. Corporate initiative, both foreign and domestic, helped bring about changes in South African labor law permitting blacks to organize trade unions and bargain collectively. U.S. firms, acting through the voluntary Sullivan Code of Fair Employment Practices, have had a significant impact on the well-being of black South Africans on the job. We strongly believe that voluntary adherence to the Sullivan Code is one of the best ways to go beyond rhetoric about apartheid. Equally important, so do the great majority of our corporate leaders.

The record of U.S. corporate citizenship in South Africa, though not perfect, is clear and impressive. Our firms have been pace-setters for change. Those in the United States and other Western nations who would have our firms disinvest not only ignore this record of achievement but propose measures that rest on no discernible philosophic or policy premise. Disinvestment by U.S. firms would undo an avenue of positive effort. Proponents of corporate disinvestment—and of stockholder or pension manager sales of stock of firms operating in South Africa—would have Americans wash their hands of any association with that country. This apparent quest for symbolic dissociation is, in reality, a formula guaranteed to assure America's irrelevance to South Africa's future.

In the final analysis, however, South Africans themselves—both black and white—will have to meet the challenge of their society, drawing for inspiration primarily on their own resources and their own history. Movement toward change in South Africa is taking place. In the economy blacks have been gaining ever more bargaining power as producers. They are moving into more skilled and responsible positions. As consumers their purchasing power has become essential to the South African economy. Black trade unions have become a major new reality. Politically, Prime Minister Botha put his own political base in jeopardy with his proposal to extend a limited and ethnically-based franchise to the colored and Asian communities. What some South Africans see as too much, others see as too little. I do not see it as our business to enter into this debate or to endorse the constitutional proposals now under consideration for South Africa. Nor do we offer tactical advice to any of the interested parties. Yet the indisputable fact which we must recognize is that the South African Government has taken the first step toward extending national political rights beyond the white minority.

Many are quick to point out that these proposals make no provision for the national political participation of the black African majority in South Africa, except via the separate tribal homelands. More generally, there is a tendency to reject all incremental improvements in whatever sector of life in South Africa that are not explicitly linked to a full-blown democratic blueprint. We recognize the limits of current change, and for this reason do not make a practice of endorsing individual steps as, in themselves, an adequate response to the dead end of apartheid. At the same time, we believe it is incumbent on us to avoid the arrogance of rejecting such steps. Nor, if we would be credible, can we expect South Africa's would-be reformers to announce their game plan and their bottom line to the world at large.

We state clearly and unequivocally our belief in the concept of government based on the consent of the governed. We do not presume to offer a formula to South Africa for resolving its unsettled political agenda other than to state that all South Africans must have a say in determining their political system.

Conclusion

Let me conclude by drawing your attention to a little recognized fact. Our southern African policy of constructive engagement—extending the hand of friendship, cooperation and support to all states and peoples of the area who wish it—has occasioned controversy. Some, it appears, have misunderstood the message or chosen for their own reasons to misunderstand it. Less noticed is the encouraging evidence of a growing consensus across party lines around the core principles of more active involvement in this increasingly important region. Many Americans are coming to recognize that without a strong Western leadership role, it could become a turbulent zone of tragedy. They are pleased to see the United States striving diplomatically to build regional peace, to achieve independence for Namibia, to create conditions for the departure of Cuban troops from Angola. I detect a common sense public awareness that we can do these things only if we develop close and credible working relations with all the parties in the region. Whatever tactical debates may exist, I perceive a growing consensus in Congress, among businessmen, church leaders, trade unionists, and the media that it is right for Americans to do more than preach about apartheid. The time has come to support what we believe in, not to walk away in self-righteous indignation.

Report by the U.N. Secretary-General (Perez de Cuéllar) Submitted to the U.N. Security Council, August 29, 1983 (Extract) [62]

. . . . . .

5. In my preliminary consultations with senior officials of South Africa on the implementation of resolution 532 (1983), [63] they maintained that the main obstacle to implementation of the United Nations plan was the presence of Cuban troops in Angola, and that as soon as they were withdrawn, the remaining outstanding issues could be addressed and resolved. At the same time, they indicated that I would be welcome to visit South Africa for consultations. I made clear to them that the question of Cuban troop withdrawal from Angola could not be accepted as a precondition for a Namibian settlement. I added that if South Africa was not prepared to discuss the outstanding issues at this stage then there would be little point in visiting South Africa for consultations. I stressed that such a visit could only be justified if it served a useful purpose within the context of Security Council resolution 435 (1978) and resolution 532 (1983).

6. On 10 August I received a letter from the Foreign Minister of South Africa in which he set out the views of his Government concerning its requirements for a peaceful settlement of the question of Namibia. The letter stated that once firm agreement has been reached on the fundamental requirements of Cuban withdrawal, and a commitment had been obtained from the Angolan Government regarding the implementation of such an agreement, the South African Government was of the opinion that the other outstanding issues could be addressed and resolved reasonably quickly within the framework of the understandings that were reached between South Africa and the Contact Group. In this regard he said that South Africa would insist on compliance with the commitments which were made during the phase I and phase II negotiations, particularly with regard to impartiality which remained an essential requirement for the implementation of any settlement. Discussions would therefore have to take place concerning the manner in which the principle of impartiality would be applied in practice.

7. At separate meetings in New York, I informed SWAPO, the representative of the Chairman of the Front-Line States, as well as the Western Contact Group that should South Africa continue to insist on addressing outstanding issues only after agreement had been reached on the withdrawal of Cuban troops, it would not be possible to make any further progress on the implementation of Security Council resolutions 435 (1978) and 532 (1983) at this stage. At a further meeting, the Western Contact Group reconfirmed that understandings reached during phase I and phase II of the negotiations in 1982 (see S/15776, paras. 4 to 9), as agreed to in parallel discussions with SWAPO and the Front-Line States, as well as with South Africa, remained in force and were still binding on the parties. Following from this, I reaffirmed to the parties that in the implementation of Security Council resolution 532 (1983) discussions should not be reopened on matters in regard to which agreement and understandings had already been reached, and confirmed as such to the United Nations. In this connection, I drew their attention to the fact that the only remaining outstanding issues which had to be addressed in the context of Security Council resolution 532 (1983) were the choice of the electoral system and some final problems relating to UNTAG and its composition.

8. On 16 August I met with Ambassadors Fourie and von Schirnding of South Africa to discuss the letter of 10 August from the Foreign Minister in the context of Security Council resolution 532 (1983). At that meeting they assured me that South Africa accepts Security Council resolutions 435 (1978) and 532 (1983) as the basis for further discussions; and that South Africa was prepared, without prejudice to its position on other regional issues, to discuss the two remaining outstanding issues relating to the electoral system and the few remaining points pertaining to UNTAG and its composition. The Ambassadors also assured me that it was not the intention of South Africa to reopen discussions on matters regarding which agreement has been reached with the parties; and that South Africa also accepted all understandings and agreements reached with the parties, as valid and binding on the parties to the negotiations, and would accordingly insist on their implementation. It was on the basis of these clarifications that I decided that a visit to southern Africa might be useful within the context of Security Council resolution 435 (1978) and resolution 532 (1983).

9. On 17 August, I informed the Foreign Minister of South Africa that following an exchange of views with Ambassadors Fourie and von Schirnding on the points made in his letter, and in the light of clarifications given to me by them, it would be possible within the context of Security Council resolutions 435 (1978) and 532 (1983) to pay a short working visit to South Africa from 22 to 25 August to hold further discussions with the Government of South Africa in regard to the implementation of the United Nations plan for Namibia. I also emphasized to the Minister that in the context of our discussions, it was important that the question of Namibia be viewed as a primary issue in its own right, and not as an appendage to other issues. I further informed the Minister that I intended, subsequent to my visit to South Africa, to pay a brief familiarization visit to Namibia in regard to my responsibilities and in the context of pertinent Security Council resolutions.

10. I left New York on 20 August accompanied by Mr. Brian Urquhart, Under-Secretary-General for Special Political Affairs; Mr. Abby Farah, Under-Secretary-General for Special Political Questions; and Mr. Martti Ahtisaari, my Special Representative for Namibia. I arrived in South Africa on 22 August, after a brief stop in Cape Verde, which I made at the invitation of President Pereira for discussions with him.

11. In Cape Town, I met with Prime Minister P.W. Botha on 23 August and had extensive discussions with him, both on the question of Namibia and the general situation in the region. This was followed by meetings on 23 and 24 August with Foreign Minister Botha and the Minister of Defence, General M. Malan, together with senior officials of the Government. The Administrator-General of Namibia, Dr. W. van Niekerk, was also present at these meetings. My discussions with the Foreign Minister focused on the two remaining issues mentioned in my last report, namely, the choice of the electoral system and the settlement of some final problems relating to UNTAG and its composition.

12. At the working session, the Foreign Minister restated the South African Government's commitment to seek a settlement to the Namibia question on the basis of Security Council resolution 435 (1978) within the framework of the understandings reached with the United States and the Western Contact Group. He confirmed that the position of the South African Government was that the one major issue still to be resolved was the withdrawal of the Cubans from Angola, on the understanding that they would not be replaced by any other hostile forces. He further stated that firm agreement would have to be reached on the fundamental requirements of Cuban withdrawal, and a commitment would have to be obtained from the Angolan Government regarding the implementation of such an agreement. The other outstanding issues, he stated, should be addressed and resolved within the framework of the understandings reached with the United States and the Western Contact Group.

13. In reply, I stated that the United Nations could not accept the linkage precondition for the implementation of the United Nations plan for Namibia. I made clear that my mandate did not include the question of the withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola and that the terms of reference for my discussions with his Government were exclusively spelt out in resolutions 435 (1978) and 532 (1983). I urged the Government of South Africa to respond positively on the two remaining outstanding issues.

14. In regard to the electoral system, the Foreign Minister stated that the Western constitutional proposals provided for a choice between the two systems, namely, proportional representation and the constituency (single-member constituency) system, to be made by the Administrator-General after commencement of implementation of Security Council resolution 435 (1978). He indicated that South Africa's choice would now be made by the Administrator-General and communicated to the Special Representative as soon as a date for implementation had been set, which would be earlier than originally envisaged in the proposals. Members of the Security Council will recall that in my last report to the Security Council (S/15776, paragraph 8), I explained the situation in regard to the electoral system as follows:

"As regards the electoral system to be employed in electing the Constituent Assembly, it was agreed that it would be based either on proportional representation or single-member constituencies. I was also assured that all the parties were agreed that this issue must be settled in accordance with the terms of Security Council resolution 435 (1978) and that the issue must not cause delay in the implementation of that resolution. The Front-Line States and SWAPO emphasized the view that agreement should be secured on the electoral system prior to implementation of Security Council resolution 435 (1978). To this end, the Western Contact Group undertook to continue their consultations with all the parties."

15. In regard to UNTAG, I first took up the composition of its military component. I reviewed the progress made in previous discussions in regard to Governments that had agreed to provide the seven infantry battalions for UNTAG. In so doing, I explained that the final decisions on the composition of UNTAG would be made by the Security Council on the basis of proposals by the Secretary-General. Following the discussion, the Foreign Minister expressed agreement on the proposed composition of UNTAG and stated that as far as South Africa was concerned the matter was resolved.

16. The discussions also resulted in the settlement of outstanding issues regarding the Agreement on the Status of UNTAG. This agreement would provide UNTAG with the necessary immunities and privileges to facilitate its work and to protect its status in the Territory as a United Nations operation.

17. The Foreign Minister also raised again the question of impartiality. In this connection, he assured me that it was not the intention of South Africa to reopen discussion on this matter, regarding which agreement had already been reached, but that in order to avoid future delays it would be useful for South Africa to know how provisions relating thereto would be implemented. I assured him that in the implementation of Security Council resolution 435 (1978) all parties would be treated equally by the United Nations. It followed that South Africa was expected to do the same.

18. Since I completed my talks with South Africa ahead of schedule, I proceeded to Namibia on 24 August on a brief familiarization visit. I visited Ruacana on the northern border of Namibia, where I was shown the hydroelectric power station and its facilities. The journey to Namibia provided me with an opportunity to learn at first-hand some of the present difficulties facing its inhabitants. While in the Territory, I raised these matters and other problems in informal consultations with the Administrator-General, Dr. van Niekerk.

19. Namibia is afflicted by a serious drought situation with dire consequences for the entire population, particularly those in the rural areas. In my contacts and meetings with the people of the Territory, most of them, after expressing their desire for peace and stressing the necessity for an early implementation of the United Nations plan, urged me to alert the international community to their plight and to facilitate the flow of humanitarian assistance. The present cycle of drought in Southern Africa as a whole is having a devastating impact on the national economy and the every-day life of the people of the Territory. In the circumstances the international community might wish to consider what could be done to provide humanitarian assistance to support local efforts in this regard.

20. Having concluded the first leg of my visit to southern Africa, I paid a one-day visit to Luanda on 26 August to follow-up discussions I initiated in New York with SWAPO in regard to the implementation of Security Council resolution 532 (1983). I also met with President dos Santos of Angola to discuss the situation in Southern Africa.

21. I met with Mr. Sam Nujoma, President of SWAPO, in Luanda to discuss the question of Namibia in the framework of Security Council resolution 532 (1983). He reiterated to me SWAPO's statement of January 1981 during the Geneva Pre-Implementation Meeting. He stated that SWAPO was ready to sign a cease-fire with South Africa and to further co-operate with the Secretary-General and UNTAG, both military and civilian components, in facilitating the speedy implementation of Security Council resolution 435 (1978) without modification, amendment or extraneous and irrelevant issues of linkage and reciprocity.

22. With regard to the composition of the military component of UNTAG he assured me that SWAPO would support the recommendations which I intended to make to the Security Council with regard to the composition of the seven infantry battalions.

23. On the choice of the electoral system, Mr. Nujoma reaffirmed SWAPO's position that it was prepared in principle to accept either proportional representation or the single-member constituency system, and urged the imperative need for a decision to be made on this matter as soon as possible and for the establishment of a time-frame for implementation.

CONCLUSIONS

24. I have described above my efforts to carry out the mandate given to me by the Security Council in resolution 532 (1983), namely, to consult with the parties to the proposed cease-fire with a view to securing the speedy implementation of Security Council resolution 435 (1978). These prolonged and intensive consultations have resulted, as far as UNTAG is concerned, in resolving virtually all the outstanding issues. In fact we have never before been so close to finality on the modalities of implementing resolution 435 (1978).

25. However, the position of South Africa regarding the issue of the withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola as a precondition for the implementation of resolution 435 (1978) still makes it impossible to launch the United Nations plan. I have repeatedly made it clear that I do not accept this so-called "linkage" and that the question of Cuban troops was not envisaged in Security Council resolution 435 (1978) and is not part of my mandate under resolution 532 (1983). This difficulty can only be dealt with in its own context by those directly concerned, acting within their sovereign rights, and, above all, by a determined effort by all concerned to reduce the tensions and contentious issues and to put an end to conflict in the area as a whole.

26. My visit to the region brought home to me vividly both the human tragedy of the present situation and the necessity for urgent progress towards implementation. The people of Namibia, on whose behalf this long-standing international effort has been mounted and maintained, are suffering not only denial of their legitimate aspirations for genuine self-determination and independence, but from the effects of procrastination and the uncertainty of their future. To their already great difficulties have now been added the hardships of a long and serious drought. I have now witnessed at first-hand their impatience and disillusionment.

27. A peaceful solution of the Namibian problem is also the key to a peaceful and co-operative future for all countries of the region. The instability and conflict generated by the failure to resolve this problem has had disastrous results for the neighbouring countries, and especially for Angola. It is in the interest of absolutely no-one to have this situation continue. It is both highly damaging to the peoples and Governments of the area and also a threat to the wider peace. Another complicating factor is the injection of wider political and ideological issues into this already complex and highly-charged situation.

28. I have reported above substantial progress since the Council last met on the Namibia question. However, no-one is more aware than I that we cannot claim real progress until an actual date is fixed for the start of implementation of resolution 435 (1978), and the cease-fire comes into force. I have no doubt that further disastrous consequences will result if we do not reach this stage quickly.

29. The attainment of a peaceful, prosperous, independent and united Namibia would be an achievement of which all members of the international community could be proud. For the sake of the people of Namibia, for the future of this richly-endowed region of the world and in the interest of international peace and co-operation, I appeal to all concerned not to be distracted from this objective by other issues. I urge them, in a renewed spirit of co-operation, to build on the progress made and to make another major effort for the achievement of independence for Namibia through the implementation of resolution 435 (1978) at the earliest possible date. For my part I am determined to continue my endeavours to this end and also to assist the people of Namibia in any way I can.

U.S. Denial of Charges of Its Violation of the Arms Embargo on South Africa

Mr. President, we were surprised and disappointed that the distinguished representative of Nigeria chose to suggest in his October 5 address [65] that the United States has in some way violated the military arms embargo imposed on South Africa in Resolutions 418 (of 1977) and 473 (of 1980). [66] This suggestion is false.

The United States has embargoed arms sales to South Africa since 1963, [67] well before the adoption of the Security Council resolutions creating the U.N. embargo in 1977. [68] The United States has also rigorously enforced these prohibitions on military sales and continues to do so. It is indeed regrettable that this conscientious effort should be maligned by false assertions on so important a subject.

The alleged violation concerns approval by the U.S. Government of bidding by American companies on a contract to provide advice and technical services to a South African firm whose commercial nuclear reactors provide electricity to a nationwide power grid. This action is neither a violation of the Security Council embargo nor a threat to the peace. The facts are:

—The reactors are typical commercial nuclear electric power generators built by a European firm, similar to those found in four dozen other countries.

—They use only low-grade uranium fuel not suitable for military purposes.

—In addition to the safeguards made applicable by virtue of provisions of the U.S. Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act, [69] South Africa has accepted IAEA monitoring; the reactors are therefore covered by IAEA regulations, including those relating to inspections.

—The maintenance services upon which bids are to be submitted involve no arms, no military material, no transfer of sensitive technology, and no risk of nuclear proliferation.

—A large number of companies from other countries with industrial nuclear capability—both European and Asian—have also submitted bids.

In fact, bids by U.S. companies represent the least chance of nuclear proliferation as no other country has imposed on its industries as tight controls as those provided under the 1978 U.S. Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act.

We were also surprised and disappointed that the distinguished Foreign Minister of Upper Volta should have stated, in his October 12 address to this Assembly, [70] that the United States had accorded South Africa a credit of $50 million to consolidate the nuclear potential of that government. This is false.

The United States has not accorded South Africa any credit, loan or grant for nuclear development—not $50 million, not 5 million, not anything. The assertion is wholly false and can only put in question the seriousness of the expressed concern.

Statement by the Representative at the United Nations (Kirkpatrick) Before the U.N. Security Council, October 24, 1983 [71]

Update on the Situation in Namibia

Mr. President, the tragic events of Beirut of yesterday, [72] testified to the dangerous point to which international issues can grow if left to fester unresolved. Unfortunately, the people of southern Africa are no strangers to such unhappy, indeed, tragic scenes. It is our special responsibility as members of this august body to confront the problems of our world in a timely, realistic and responsible manner. This isn't easy for many factors work against anyone who assumes seriously the task of peacemaker. Certainly the members of the Council and the leaders of the frontline states, as well as of the Contact Group, have expended great efforts in the search for a way to bring Namibia to a peaceful independence. And we have come very close in our goal, but we have not yet succeeded. Meanwhile, our frustrations mount and the call for violent solutions grows louder. In times like these, I believe that a special value attaches to clear assessment to the skills of diplomacy and statesmanship of our political leaders. It is our reponsibility to help the people of the world to see better where we are, how far we have come, so that they will renew their commitment to the goal of a prompt and peaceful settlement of this terribly troubled and important issue and not from despair, cast aside the agreements already so painfully reached.

It is for these reasons that the United States especially welcomes this opportunity for the Security Council, once again, to exercise its responsibility for Namibia and to review developments in the negotiations being conducted pursuant to U.N. Security Council Resolution 435 since the Council's last discussion in May. [73]

On that occasion, the Council was able to hear directly from the principal parties to the negotiations regarding the progress that has been achieved and to address frankly what remains to be done in order to bring about implementation of the U.N. settlement plan. On that basis, the Council was able to act unanimously, through the adoption of Resolution 532, [74] to ask that the Secretary-General lend his personal good offices to consultations with the parties aimed at identifying a basis for the movement towards Namibia's rightful independence.

My government welcomed the Secretary-General's sincere, constructive, and skillful approach to his mandate under Resolution 532. I should like once again to express the deep appreciation of the United States for the dedication and objectivity shown by the Secretary-General and his staff, which have so thoroughly characterized their commitment to the Namibia settlement process and which have, in fact and very significantly, gained the confidence of all sides of the conflict. The Secretary-General's achievements have been noteworthy. My government welcomes his interest and continued active involvement to reach our common goal.

In his August 29 report to the Council, [75] the Secretary-General described in detail his discussions in South Africa, Namibia, and Angola, underscoring both the very significant achievements of his trip and the obstacle that still stands in the way of a settlement. The United States attaches the highest importance to the results of the Secretary-General's discussions with the South African government. In the course of those talks, very real progress was made on issues that had, until then, remained unresolved over the years. Notably, all questions regarding UNTAG that had a direct bearing on implementation of Resolution 435 have now been cleared up. The South African Government has also affirmed its commitment to indicate at an early date prior to implementation its choice of an electoral system. We regard this as important forward progress. The South African Government also stated unequivocally that it now has no question or reservations regarding the impartiality of the United Nations in the settlement process. These are significant accomplishments which have contributed in important ways to building a climate conducive to a peaceful settlement of the Namibia conflict.

Similarly, my government welcomes the Secretary-General's report that SWAPO President Nujoma in his meeting with the Secretary-General in Luanda,[76] reaffirmed that his organization stands ready to sign a cease-fire and to move forward on implementation on the basis of the agreements that have been reached.

Mr. President, although the Secretary-General's initiative in southern Africa measurably advanced the negotiations, his report to the Security Council also made clear that there does remain one issue standing in the way of implementation of Resolution 435: South Africa's position regarding the withdrawal of Cuban forces from Angola. This put into focus the frustration widespread in Africa, felt most sharply among the frontline states who have worked so long and so hard on the Namibia process, that an issue outside the scope of Resolution 435 is delaying our common objective. It is obviously a matter of frustration. The United States and its partners in the Contact Group share that frustration. However, my government remains firmly convinced that this obstacle can and should be resolved—that this can be done with perseverance and good will, that we will be able to overcome this obstacle.

The United States remains firmly committed to the objective of Namibian independence pursuant to Resolution 435. Our attachment to freedom—manifested in our foreign and domestic policies since our own independence struggle more than two centuries ago—permits no other course. Our continuing concern in these negotiations has been that this goal be approached realistically—practically. We must recognize that, as a practical matter, implementation of Resolution 435 will take place only if the fundamental concerns of all parties are addressed. To that end, we have devoted our energy to the search for a solution based on reciprocity, with full mutual respect for security and sovereignty on all sides, with Namibia's independence as its only acceptable result. We will remain engaged in this effort as long as it appears that there is a chance for a peaceful solution.

Mr. President, the problem of cross-border violence in southern Africa is of deep concern to us all. We are working toward a peaceful resolution of the region's differences and have urged and will continue to urge military restraint. We do not believe there are military solutions to the conflicts afflicting the states of this troubled region. Our policies are premised on the belief that negotiated solutions are both possible and essential. As we have said in the past, cross-border violence cannot be condoned, whether it be in the form of a bomb placed in a crowded square in Pretoria by externally based organizations or in the form of the continuing violation of the territorial integrity of Angola by South African forces.

Mr. President, many speakers in this debate have stated their concern over the amount of time it has taken to move the negotiations as far as they have come. The truth is that the complex issues directly relating to the U.N. plan have required the most delicate negotiation. With the results of the Secretary-General's trip, there is today virtually complete agreement on the basis for implementation of Resolution 435. It is also equally clear that there can be no final resolution of the Namibia question without the cooperation of the parties most directly involved.

Mr. President, during the May debate, the position of my government regarding these negotiations was made clear to the Council. There has been progress since then, as the Secretary-General's report makes clear. At the same time our basic position has not changed, and I will restate that position today:

—The United States neither seeks nor desires any special advantage or position for itself in the negotiations.

—It is not our intention, nor is it within our power, to impose our views or wishes on the parties whose interests and aspirations are most directly involved.

—We fully respect the fact that the political decisions needed to proceed with implementation of the U.N. plan are sovereign decisions that can only be taken by the governments most immediately and directly concerned.

—We further recognize that those who must take those decisions will wish to assure themselves that their own interests and security will be respected and protected.

—Our sole objective has been to assist the parties in overcoming the difficulties that have to date prevented the implementation of Resolution 435 and the attainment of Namibia's long-deserved independence.

Mr. President, while Namibian independence is not yet within our grasp, it is within sight, doubling our impatience, but also redoubling our commitment. The United States is convinced that the will for a settlement is present on all sides in no small part based on recognition of the imminent, dangerous alternative of an escalating cycle of destructive violence. The future of the people of Namibia, for whom the United Nations and this Council bear unique responsibility, depends on our working together to keep the negotiating process firmly on track. The United States continues to stand ready to work closely with other members of the Council and with other parties to hasten the day when an independent Namibia can take its place among us as a sovereign state. Until that day, it is to each of us to think how best we can contribute to that achievement.

Resolution 539 (1983), Adopted by the U.N. Security Council, October 28, 1983 [77]

U.N. Security Council Condemnation of Linkage Between Namibian Independence and Withdrawal of Cuban Troops From Angola

The Security Council,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General (S/15943) of 29 August 1983,

Recalling General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 and 2145 (XXI) of 27 October 1966,

Recalling and reaffirming its resolutions 301 (1971), 385 (1976), 431 (1978), 432 (1978), 435 (1978), 439 (1978), and 532 (1983),

Gravely concerned at South Africa's continued illegal occupation of Namibia,

Gravely concerned also at the tension and instability prevailing in southern Africa and the mounting threat to the security of the region and its wider implications for international peace and security resulting from continued utilization of Namibia as a springboard for attacks against and destabilization of African States in the region,

Reaffirming the legal responsibility of the United Nations over Namibia and the primary responsibility of the Security Council for ensuring the implementation of its resolutions, in particular, resolutions 385 (1976) and 435 (1978), which call for the holding of free and fair elections in the Territory under the supervision and control of the United Nations,

Indignant that South Africa's insistence on an irrelevant and extraneous issue of "linkage" has obstructed the implementation of Security Council resolution 435 (1978),

1. Condemns South Africa for its continued illegal occupation of Namibia in flagrant defiance of resolutions of the General Assembly and decisions of the Security Council of the United Nations;

2. Further condemns South Africa for its obstruction of the implementation of Security Council resolution 435 (1978) by insisting on conditions contrary to the provisions of the United Nations plan for the independence of Namibia;

3. Rejects South Africa's insistence on linking the independence of Namibia to irrelevant and extraneous issues as incompatible with resolution 435 (1978), other decisions of the Security Council and the resolutions of the General Assembly on

Namibia, including General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960;

4. Declares that the independence of Namibia cannot be held hostage to the resolution of issues that are alien to Security Council resolution 435 (1978);

5. Reiterates that Security Council resolution 435 (1978), embodying the United Nations plan for the independence of Namibia, is the only basis for peaceful settlement of the Namibian problems;

6. Takes note that the consultations undertaken by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 5 of resolution 532 (1983) have confirmed that all the outstanding issues relevant to Security Council resolution 435 (1978) have been resolved;

7. Affirms that the electoral system to be used for the elections of the Constituent Assembly should be determined prior to the adoption by the Security Council of the enabling resolution for the implementation of the United Nations plan;

8. Calls upon South Africa to cooperate with the Secretary-General forthwith and to communicate to him its choice of the electoral system in order to facilitate the immediate and unconditional implementation of the United Nations plan embodied in Security Council resolution 435 (1978);

9. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council on the implementation of this resolution as soon as possible and not later than 31 December 1983;

10. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter and to meet as soon as possible following the Secretary-General's report for the purpose of reviewing progress in the implementation of resolution 435 (1978) and, in the event of continued obstruction by South Africa, to consider the adoption of appropriate measures under the Charter of the United Nations.

Explanation of the U.S. Vote on U.N. Security Council Resolution 539 (1983)

Mr. President, my government wholly supports the spirit of the Security Council resolution just adopted. [79] We share the desire of the Members of the Council—those who wish to contribute to a productive solution of the problem—we share with them an ardent desire to move Namibia toward independence without further delay within the framework of Security Council Resolution 435. Many have worked hard and sincerely toward this end—no one, I might note, more effectively than our distinguished Secretary-General. My government has worked hard and will continue to work to overcome obstacles that stand in the way of Namibian independence. Nonetheless, there are in Resolution 539 certain elements that cause us concern.

The resolution contains a number of references to past resolutions which the U.S. Government did not support.

The timeframe, moreover, provided by the resolution represents in our judgment a genuine good-faith effort to strike a difficult and a delicate balance. On the one hand, this Council must do nothing that would in any way encourage delay for the sake of delay. On the other hand, the same delicacy, the same difficulty, counsel against unreasonable or unrealistic constraints on the negotiating flexibility required to overcome remaining obstacles to Namibian independence. My government has some reservations on this score with regard to the language of Resolution 539, although I reiterate that in our judgment it does represent a laudable effort at striking the right balance.

[79] Supra.

Finally, Mr. President, we are disturbed by the resolution's implicit allusions to possible future action under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter.[80] We regard such allusions as premature. Progress is being made in the negotiations aimed at securing the implementation of Resolution 435. This progress, substantial progress, was reported by the Secretary-General in S/15943 dated August 29. My government does not look forward to the eventuality of failure. We look forward, we are wholly committed to, ultimate success.

Southern Africa: U.S. Perspective

I am delighted to be here to talk to you about the problems and prospects in southern Africa.

I have worked on southern Africa—this beautiful and promising region with seemingly intractable problems—for several years now. During that period, I have learned one thing—it is almost impossible to have a rational, unemotional discussion about southern Africa. As soon as the subject is announced, the adrenalin starts to flow, and rhetoric rather than reason takes over. Today I would like to share with you the perspective of those of us in Washington responsible for developing U.S. policy toward Africa's southern third. And let me begin by describing our view of reality and the future in this tormented region.

Southern Africa is the embodiment of a paradox;

—It is blessed and cursed at the same time.

—It is blessed because of the climate, its natural resources. It lacks the terrible problems of overpopulation and hopeless poverty which afflict so much of the Third World. But to many, it is also cursed in an almost biblical sense; despite the riches in southern Africa, an aura of doom and foreboding hangs over the region.

—There is a feeling—unspoken much of the time—that at some point uncontrollable, irrational violence will engulf the region, destroy its prospects, and deny its people of the promise that they have every right to expect. I would submit to you that our task in the West is to help the people of that region—for they must in reality do the job themselves—to defuse the time bomb which is ticking in their region and encourage southern Africa to live up to its promise. But to understand the region, one must understand its diverse parts. Let me begin with South Africa.

Our critics have said that our policy in southern Africa begins and ends with South Africa. That is not true, but any analysis of the region must pay appropriate attention to the reality of South Africa. That reality has several notable aspects:

South Africa is the primary economic system in the region. Thus, if one is interested in economic development in the region, it makes no sense to attempt to diminish or circumvent the South African economic system.

South Africa enjoys military primacy among the states of the region. That is partly a function of economic reality. It is also—and let us face the issue coldly—a result of the fact that isolated South Africa has fended for itself and has done so with terrible effect. South Africa in part because of its isolation, has become an important producer of military hardware. My government supports fully the international arms embargo but we also recognize the irony. International efforts to achieve isolation have had the counterproductive consequences of producing a well armed South Africa capable of supplying many of its defense needs.

Third, South Africa is a deeply divided nation; it faces an uncertain future. Its parts are suspicious of each other and each part doubts that a system acceptable to the other can provide adequate safety for itself. White South Africa's acute paranoia colors its view of the region as a whole. Too few white South Africans believe they can live in peace and protect their way of life except through the exercise of force.

Fourth, white South Africa may be a product of the great Western colonial expansion of the 17th, 18th, and 19th centuries—as my own country is—but after the retreat of that great imperial tidal wave from Africa, South Africa remains. And let me state quite factually that white South Africa will not—merely to make its critics in the West feel more comfortable—blindly surrender its political advantages.

This leads me to my fifth general point about South Africa. In the near term, white South Africans will have an important influence—indeed at times control—over what happens in the region as well as over the pace of change and the nature of change within South Africa.

However, and I will return to this theme later on, we recognize that a South Africa beset by real or imagined enemies and out of touch with the West can do grave damage to our interests in the region. That is a point we have made clear to Pretoria—a constructive relationship with the West is not a one-way street. South Africa must respect Western interests in the region. But, indeed, these often coincide with South Africa's best interests, although some in Pretoria may be reluctant to see that.

Lastly, we recognize that there is an active debate underway inside South Africa about both the future of the country and the future of the region. Let me develop this theme.

It has been a major thrust of our policy—which we have described as "constructive engagement"—to influence in as careful and effective a manner as possible South Africa's bitter internal debate about how the country will face its future—realizing that our influence in South Africa's internal affairs is limited.

This is a crucial debate. Let me describe briefly to you how we see it, most broadly.

At the risk of considerable oversimplication, I would say that we believe analytically there are two poles of thought at senior official levels in South Africa about how to deal with the future.

We associate the following with one of these poles of analysis:

—South Africa is better advised to put its neighbors on notice and increase through an interventionist military policy, the costs which they will pay for permitting acts of violence to be planned and launched from their territories.

—Coupled with that position is the general, almost reflexive search for tribal minorities and political opponents of neighboring governments which can be armed and supported.

—A second element is a forceful economic policy aimed at maximizing dependence on South Africa.

—Finally, this school of thought would be wary of political involvement with the West fearing that entangling compromise might deter South Africa from taking the robust steps needed to assure its survival.

Fortunately for South Africa and the West, there is another school of thought in South Africa on how to deal with the future. Its tenets include:

—The belief that a confrontation with neighbors has its costs; it produces deep bitterness and widens the chasm of suspicion. It is not indefinitely sustainable.

—South Africa cannot foul its region, impoverish and destabilize its neighbors and expect to emerge unscratched. If it does so, it will face the consequences without benefit of Western understanding or cooperation.

—Demographic change is a factor. Whites are a declining proportion of South Africa's population. South Africa's economy cannot expand without additional skilled manpower and a broader consumer base at home and in the region. Both argue against "state of nature" policies in the region.

—Ultimately an aggressive posture toward neighbors will open the way to external intervention, Western political pressure to be sure, but more importantly the intervention of the Soviet Union and its allies whose sole objective is to fuel the fires of violence.

The relationship in this debate between external and internal policy is not always clear. Indeed a recent public opinion survey indicated that most whites favor a hard approach to the neighbors and a softer line on internal change.

But generally—at the top—within the leadership, there is a potential association between pragmatism vis-à-vis the neighbors and gradual expansion of the basis for political involvement inside the republic. It is a cardinal feature of our thinking that a South Africa under less of a threat from neighboring states is a South Africa in a stronger position to pursue internal reform. This thought contributes to one of the most important features of American policy in southern Africa—the active quest for rules of coexistence between the states of the area and the emergence of regional détente.

Finally, on South Africa, let me turn to our approach for dealing with Pretoria—the policy of "constructive engagement."

As Vice President George Bush said in his public statements in Africa, we believe that apartheid is morally wrong. We believe that apartheid represents an approach to government fatally flawed in its basic premise—that people are not equal in the access they should have to deciding their system of government. As a multiracial society, we cannot concur in any system which arbitarily classifies people according to race rather than allowing people to be self-classified on the basis of talent, merit, and freedom of action.

That said, however, we believe it is preferable to treat South Africa's dilemma as a political problem involving participation rather than a moral issue involving inequity. In my experience, "moral problems" are often intractable. Moralistic interpretations of political conflicts lead to all or nothing confrontations. It is the Manichean heresy transferred to diplomacy.

Thus we support constructive change in South Africa—change which will widen the participaton of all South Africans in the affairs of their nation. In particular:

We feel the nature of political change in South Africa will and must be determined by the people of South Africa, not by outsiders. Outsiders have an interest in the outcome and can encourage positive change.

We believe that change inside South Africa—which in reality in the first instance will largely be under white control—must be incremental. In that regard, we view the new constitutional dispensation as a fundamentally important step. Not that the step defines South Africa's political future nor solves the problem of political participation nor that the constitutional results will prove to be acceptable to all South Africans or even workable. Rather the arrangements are a sharp break with the country's recent past and this step opens the way to further changes. It permits white South Africans to make a choice, vote for change, and move toward political moderations and accommodation.

And that is the real issue. South Africa is not ready today to choose a "solution." The issue is not whether blacks like or accept these proposals. They do not; blacks and many others are offended by them. The issue is whether South Africa's white electorate is doomed to follow in the footsteps of Rhodesia in the 1960's, or whether a creative shift toward the political center can occur and thereby open the door to the inclusive politics of bargaining, expanding rewards, benefits, and responsibilities and broadened participation.

The "homeland" policy South Africa has pursued will not work and we do not accept it. It does not respond in any way to black political aspirations. In addition, it is clear that the existing homelands are neither economically nor socially viable. In that sense, they may, in the near term, complicate matters. South Africa will not find its future by denying citizens their fundamental right to South African citizenship assigning them—without a choice—to homelands on the basis of tribal and linguistic origin. However central tribal factors may be in African politics—including the tribalism of white South Africans themselves—tribal origin cannot be the juridical basis of political structure or a constitution in any modern nation state.

I have said something about what we are against. I want to say what we are for. We are for change—a progressive and rapid movement to a system based on the consent of the government. We are for the rule of law and equality in the work place, in education, housing, and social services. We encourage expanded opportunity for black, colored, and Asian South Africans; their acquisition of the tools which will permit them to forge their future on a basis of equality. And we support those who work for change, including South African and foreign enterprises. We are active officially, investing public funds in education, labor, and black business development.

We feel that a developing relationship with the West is essential to give assurance to the leaders of South Africa—assurance in a time of flux and change. But the relationship between Washington and South Africa in particular, and the West and South Africa in general, must be reciprocal. In other words, constructive measures by Pretoria vis-á-vis its internal situation and its neighborhood should be recognized as such by the West and welcomed. In the same vein, unhelpful steps should be pointed out frankly as such. And the West should be prepared to encourage forward movement and to respond accordingly when it occurs. Let me be quite specific. All Western nations have a role to play and an interest in peaceful change in South Africa. The burden and responsibility do not fall solely to the United States.

A final point on reciprocity; Pretoria cannot have it both ways. South Africa claims to be a part of the West; we accept that as an historical fact. But, if that is the case, Pretoria must respect Western norms and sensibilities to a much greater extent both in the management of its internal affairs and in the way it deals with its neighbors. South Africa cannot pose as a Western bastion, if it offends Western values and if its behavior serves the interests of the Kremlin.

I know that the leaders of South Africa appreciate this is a reality in our thinking. I also suspect that those in South Africa who oppose reciprocal links with the West—those who would like to see the relationship as a one-way street of Western support and concessions—are aware of the reality as well.

Let me now focus on the neighbors; first Zimbabwe, second Mozambique and Angola, and some comments on Namibia.

Zimbabwe: The U.S. Government under President Carter welcomed Lancaster House [82] as a remarkable example of the peaceful solution of a seemingly intractable problem. This administration reviewed the situation in Zimbabwe and concluded that Zimbabwe could be an important element in an overall effort to stabilize the situation in southern Africa.

Accordingly, we took the following steps:

—An aid pledge of $225 million over 3 years to assist recovery and development;

—Making it clear to Pretoria that a successful and stable Zimbabwe is in South Africa's interest.

Let me say that we recognize fully any relationship between Harare and Pretoria will be difficult. But it must exist and is logical, given Zimbabwe's transportation and trade links and Pretoria's desire for stability on the northern border of the Transvaal. We also accepted the fact the United States and other Western nations have roles to play in making that relationship work and in helping ensure South Africa and Zimbabwe work out rules of coexistence.

I will not pretend to you that our relationship with Zimbabwe is either easy or always comfortable. We are dealing with a new nation forged out of a revolutionary experience. But we hope to keep our eye firmly on geopolitical realities in the region, and we hope the leadership in Harare will do likewise. We have sought and will continue to seek a strong relationship with that important country. It is a relationship which can only be sustained on the basis of respect and reciprocity.

Zimbabwe has been accepted in the family of nations as an equal. It occupies at present a seat on the Security Council. Its actions affect the interests of others, including the United States. My country's relationship with Zimbabwe is influenced by how we cooperate globally and in the region and how Zimbabwe's domestic order is understood by our Congress and public. The relationship is not based on the provision of economic assistance on the one hand and the acceptance and efficient use of aid on the other. Such a view trivializes the relationship and simply casts Zimbabwe in a client position. The relationship must be more mature and broadly based. It must treat the full range of issues Harare and Washington confront. Finally it must proceed on the basis of respect for each other's most important interests.

Angola and Mozambique: Let me turn to Mozambique and Angola. A remark about both of them together.

I believe that all observers accept that the Portuguese revolution in April 1974,[83] and the subsequent collapse of the Portuguese colonial empire were seminal events in the modern history of southern Africa. The decolonization process was chaotic and the West bears a degree of collective responsibility for an outcome that essentially was the legacy of upheaval in one Western state.

But the story continues and now—almost 10 years after it began—we are noting a dramatic evolution in the development of the former Portuguese territories. Of course, there are local differences but let me concentrate on the common themes:

—The governments, which came to power in haphazard and confused circumstances, were born of political parties and liberation armies. They lacked the institutions and the manpower which permit the orderly governance of states.

—Independence has never been fully consolidated. Armed internal opposition movements are active—indeed increasingly active—supported by South Africa.

—A stable relationship with South Africa—the major regional power—has not been sorted out by either.

—Economic confusion, indeed decline, are self-evident, partly as a result of the adoption of an inappropriate Soviet economic style.

But the most interesting theme we have observed is that the leaders and governments of the former Portuguese territories have increasingly come to the conclusion that the Eastern option—reliance on the Soviet Union and its clients—does not work.

That is an existential realization that they came to on their own. We did not tell them how to interpret events. They came to their own understanding over 8 years, 8 very difficult years. As a result, there is a new opportunity for the West to assist these countries as they struggle toward a new and more stable accommodation with the realities which they face.

In Mozambique, we have opened a dialog with the government of President Samora Machel on the problems of the region in general and the neuralgic relationship between Pretoria and Maputo.

In that regard, we have urged both sides to discuss their problems in a realistic manner. And we have told the South African Government that the use of internal dissidents to overthrow the Mozambique Government is not in their interest, nor is it in ours.

Similarly, we have asked our Mozambican friends to think long and hard about South Africa's concern for its security and to take the steps necessary to achieve détente with South Africa.

Finally, we have provided short-term assistance to Mozambique—in particular food aid. And we plan to do more. Our dialog continues. In fact, I will be going down to Maputo after this conference.[84]

The Angolan situation is more complex, given its relationship to the Namibian imbroglio. It is marked by:

—A civil war based upon ethnic and political divisions which predate independence;

—South African attacks on the country, indeed the occupation by South Africa of Cunene province—a fact which we condemn;

—Economic decline and confusion partly resulting from war, partly resulting from misbegotten efforts to apply Soviet economic models.

We have had an extensive and at times difficult dialog with the Angolan leaders and I am personally convinced that they want to solve their problems. In particular, they want to open their doors to the West.

That dialog continues but its outcome is very much a function of bringing independence to Namibia. We will persist in seeking a solution to the problems of peace in Angola.

On Namibia, our position is quite clear:

—We believe the Namibian people deserve their independence and the implementation of UNSCR 435 is the best,

---

[83] On April 25, 1974, Portuguese Prime Minister Marcello José das Neves Alves Caetano was overthrown in a military coup led by General António de Spínola.

[84] Wisner visited Mozambique from November 8 to 10, 1983, to discuss bilateral relations and the situation in southern Africa with President Machel and other government leaders.

indeed the only way of obtaining that goal. When this administration came into office in 1981, however, it was apparent that the political conditions for the successful implementation of 435 did not exist.

In particular:

—South Africa, for a complicated set of foreign and domestic reasons, was unwilling to agree to a date for implementation of 435, as was made clear in Geneva in January 1981;

—The states of southern Africa had not thought through the issue of security between themselves—they have not done so yet. But for Namibia the question is vitally urgent. Unless South Africa sees how its security will be protected, the conditions for implementing 435 will not exist.

Our goal has been to create such a context which would be in the interests of all the countries which border Namibia. That is why we have focused on the issue of Cuban combat forces in Angola as the key to unlock the door to an independent Namibia. In that regard:

—The Angolans tell us that the Cubans are there to protect Angola from South Africa. They can depart when that threat is removed; and essential conditions of peace are in place and have been tested.

—The South Africans say—most recently to the U.N. Secretary-General when he visited Cape Town—that they have no more Namibia issues and are prepared to implement 435 when an agreement on Cuban troop withdrawal has been reached. [85]

Surely it cannot be beyond the realm of human imagination to knit together these two positions. That is precisely what we are attempting to do. But let me be clear about the fact that the clock is ticking on this issue. To say so is not a negotiating ploy on my part; it is a fact. For our part, we are on the verge of our long, preoccupying Presidential season. Reasonable proposals are on the table. We need answers and soon. The dialog continues. But now is the time for decisions.

Any discussion of southern Africa would be woefully incomplete without observations on the East/West dimension of the situation.

Our critics sometime accuse us of injecting the cold war into the problems of the region or, at the least, of viewing its tribulations through a prism of anti-Soviet obsession. That is not true.

We did not inject the Soviets into southern Africa. Rather they accomplished that fact themselves, choosing to exploit Western disarray and paralysis to seek unilateral advantages for themselves in a distant region of no historic importance to any legitimate Soviet interest. We believe the reality of Soviet involvement in the region is as follows:

—Southern Africa is, practically speaking, well outside the Soviet Union's zone of primary interest, indeed of its secondary interests. We believe that Moscow is aware of that fact and, in reality, spends little time thinking about the area. That analysis disconcerts our South African friends—perhaps disappoints those who seek an easy explanation for South African problems—as they like to see themselves the target of a "total onslaught" by the Soviets. We do not believe they are.

—Nonetheless, there is a substantial Soviet presence in southern Africa as a result of opportunities offered and seized after the Portuguese revolution. But the Soviets—while aware that future opportunities may occur—should not wish to raise significantly their ante in the region;

—Concomitantly, we do not want to see new opportunities created, notably by South Africa.

—Finally, the Soviets suffer from their failures in the region—economically and militarily in Angola and Mozambique, politically in Zimbabwe. They are aware that there is substantial disenchantment over Moscow's role. This may increase their reluctance for further involvement. While we are frankly interested in diminishing the Soviet presence in the region, we do not see our policies as undercutting legitimate Soviet interests or precluding peaceful competition. At issue is the determination of the West to stand for change and peace in the region and to deter those who would convert these imperatives into a quest for narrow advantage, which will inevitably lead to a bloodbath in the region and aggravated international tension. I have covered a great deal of ground this evening and I should now close to allow time for questions and comments. Let me make two final points. I have worked on southern African affairs for many years, and have known many southern Africans as I noted in my opening remarks. I am well aware of the area's problems; also of its potential. In that regard, I recall the bitter conclusion of Shiva Naipaul's book "North of South" in which he suggested that the peoples of southern Africa—black and white—who in common in his view are xenophobic, selfish, and blind—ironically deserve each other somehow. I believe that the peoples of southern Africa can share a prosperous future. But I have learned that above all they must create that future—not you, nor I, nor others can do it for them.

That said, southern Africa is adrift today; given the interests which all of us in the West have in the area, we must be involved and proceed from a common vision of a strategy toward the region and our responsibilities to it. Those on the left or the right, who seek moral satisfaction through a retreat to condemnation of what we do not like endanger key Western interests in southern Africa as well as the region's future. Responsibility did not end with the decolonization. In a real sense it began anew; we have before us an historic opportunity to help shape events, if we are prepared to be involved.

The United States is committed to using its influence to stem the polarization of the region. We are building our leverage as carefully as possible with all parties in southern Africa, precisely so that American influence can be brought to bear in a way that will make a difference. We seek a partnership with our friends in the West. It is a partnership not only between governments; it is a collaborative effort which must include business, labor, church, intellectual, and citizen organizations.

That is why I have traveled this far to be with you tonight.

Statement by the Alternate Representative (Keyes) Before the U.N. General Assembly, November 15, 1983 [86]

The U.S. Position on U.N. General Assembly Resolution 38/11

Thank you, Mr. President. The apartheid system in South Africa rests upon the twin premises of absolute racial exclusivity and inherent white racial superiority. Building upon these premises the architects of apartheid have constructed and attempted to justify a system of political, social and economic injustice that denies fundamental human rights to South Africa's black population. The Government and people of the United States reject the false premises of apartheid. We abhor the system of oppression erected upon those premises. We condemn the denial of fundamental rights to South Africa's majority black population. We stand by the principles, fundamental to our identity as a nation, that "all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights" and that no government can claim legitimacy which denies that equality and systematically violates those rights. By virtue of our adherence to these principles, painfully vindicated through civil war, legal arbitration, and nonviolent mass protest against injustice, the American people are the enemies of apartheid, as we are the enemies of any system that denies the common dignity and attendant rights of human beings.

The issue raised by the resolution [87] before us, therefore, is not between those who oppose apartheid and those who do not. The issue is how best to encourage practical steps away from the apartheid system, which we all strongly believe to be illegitimate and unjust. As we have repeatedly stated, it is not appropriate for the U.S. Government or for this body to propose, endorse or condemn any particular blueprint for political change in South Africa. This applies especially to the proposals just approved by the white voters of South Africa. We believe that the 66 percent "yes" vote by South Africa's white electorate in the recent referendum is a reflection of a growing consensus within that electorate of the need to move forward toward broader participation by all South Africans in the country's political process. In that sense, November 2, 1983, is a potentially significant date in the modern history of South Africa. As a multiracial democracy, the United States can only welcome a collective decision by a clear majority of white South African voters to take a step which opens the way to constructive, evolutionary change toward a system based on the consent of all South Africa's citizens, over 80 percent of whom are not white. The referendum results also indicate that the South African Government now has a firm and broad mandate to move decisively along this road so that South Africans of all races can enjoy the blessings of an open society and the chance to participate in all sectors of human endeavour without regard to race. It is our hope that the South African Government will use this mandate to address the problem of the political rights of South Africa's black majority—for the sake of the people of South Africa and southern Africa, and for the sake of its relations with the rest of the world, including the United States.

With that hope in mind, we strongly disagree with those who believe that a resolution condemning the proposed constitutional changes will make a positive contribution to the process of change. The people of the United States know from their own experience how painful and difficult the process of achieving racial justice can be. We know as well that in that process steps which break down the psychological foundations of racial animosity can make an important contribution to the ultimate goal. We realize that neither the South African Government nor the people of South Africa have attained that goal. A long road, fraught with difficult and painful decisions, lies before them. To follow the path that leads to justice will require courage, prudence and true statesmanship. The international community has an obligation to do everything within its power to encourage and fortify those within South Africa, black and white, willing to display and act upon these qualities. We believe that the resolution before us, especially in its harsh preambulatory language and in the language of paragraph 1, will have the opposite effect—that it will dishearten those working for positive change and encourage those who oppose it. Therefore, precisely because we believe that constructive, evolutionary change is the imperative of South Africa's better destiny, we cannot join in supporting it.

Resolution 38/11, Adopted by the U.N. General Assembly, November 15, 1983 [88]

U.N. General Assembly Rejection of the Proposed New Racial Constitution of South Africa

The General Assembly,

Recalling its many resolutions and those of the Security Council calling on the authorities in South Africa to abandon apartheid, end oppression and repression of the black majority and seek a peaceful, just and lasting solution in accordance with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, [89]

Reaffirming that apartheid is a crime against humanity and a threat to international peace and security,

Gravely concerned that the so-called "constitutional proposals" endorsed, on 2 November 1983, by the exclusively white electorate in South Africa further entrench apartheid,

Convinced that the aim of the so-called "constitutional proposals" is to deprive the indigenous African majority of all fundamental rights, including the right of citizenship, and to transform South Africa into a country for "whites only", in keeping with the declared policies of apartheid,

---

[88] Source: U.N. General Assembly, Official Records, Thirty-eighth Session, Supplement No. 47 (A/38/47), pp. 22–23. This resolution was adopted by a vote of 141 to 0, with 7 abstentions (including the United States).

[89] Resolution 217 A (III). [Footnote in the source text.]

Aware that the inclusion in the "constitutional proposals" of the so-called "coloured" people and people of Asian origin is aimed at dividing the unity of the oppressed people of South Africa and fomenting internal conflict,

Noting with grave concern that one of the objectives of the so-called "constitutional proposals" of the racist régime is to make the "coloured" people and people of Asian origin in South Africa eligible for conscription into the apartheid armed forces for further internal repression and aggression against independent African States,

Welcoming the united resistance of the oppressed people of South Africa against these "constitutional" manoeuvres,

Reaffirming the legitimacy of the struggle of the oppressed people of South Africa for the elimination of apartheid and for the establishment of a society in which all the people of South Africa as a whole, irrespective of race, colour or creed, will enjoy equal and full political and other rights and participate freely in the determination of their destiny,

Firmly convinced that the implementation of these "constitutional proposals" will further aggravate the already explosive situation prevailing inside apartheid South Africa,

1. Declares that the so-called "constitutional proposals" are contrary to the principles of the Charter of the United Nations, that the results of the referendum are of no validity whatsoever and that the enforcement of the proposed "constitution" will inevitably aggravate tension and conflict in South Africa and in southern Africa as a whole;

2. Rejects the so-called "constitutional proposals" and all insidious manoeuvres by the racist minority régime of South Africa further to entrench white minority rule and apartheid;

3. Further rejects any so-called "negotiated settlement" based on bantustan structures or on the "constitutional proposals";

4. Solemnly declares that only the total eradication of apartheid and the establishment of a non-racial democratic society based on majority rule, through the full and free exercise of adult suffrage by all the people in a united and non-fragmented South Africa, can lead to a just and lasting solution of the explosive situation in South Africa;

5. Urges all Governments and organizations to take appropriate action, in co-operation with the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity and in accordance with the present resolution, to assist the oppressed people of South Africa in their legitimate struggle for a non-racial democratic society;

6. Requests the Security Council, as a matter of urgency, to consider the serious implications of the so-called "constitutional proposals" and to take all necessary measures, in accordance with the Charter, to avert the further aggravation of tension and conflict in South Africa and in southern Africa as a whole.

Transcript of the Department of State Daily Press Briefing, November 29, 1983 (Extract) [90]

U.S. Opposition to the Magopa Village Move

. . . . . .

Q. John, as you know, in South Africa, an African village near Johannesburg was ordered to be demolished or evacuated by the South African Government recently. [91] It caused quite a bit of comment. It's the village of Magopa, I guess is how you pronounce it. The evacuation of 300 families because evidently they were in the wrong place as far as the South African Government is concerned.

---

[91] On November 18, 1983, the residents of Magopa village in South Africa were informed of a Presidential decree ordering them off the land under the terms of legislation enacted in 1927 on the administration of black people in South Africa. That legislation provided that the President of South Africa could move black people from one location to another, and also barred blacks from ever returning to the location whence they were moved.

Does the Department have any comment on what is happening in that place?

A. Yes. The United States has consistently made clear its view that South Africa's problems cannot be addressed constructively by the arbitrary relocation of peoples on an ethnic or racial basis within South Africa. The South African Government is aware of our view that political progress within South Africa will continue to depend on a dialogue among all its citizens. Statements by senior South African Government officials, including Prime Minister Botha, in the wake of the November 2 referendum, would suggest a commitment on the part of the South African Government itself to such a dialog. But we believe the relocation of the residents of Magopa would not contribute to the prospects for a constructive outcome of that dialog. We deplore any action by any government to remove citizens from their homes forcibly or to destroy their property.

Resolution 38/36 B, Adopted by the U.N. General Assembly, December 1, 1983 [92]

Implementation of Security Council Resolution 435 (1978)

The General Assembly,

Indignant at South Africa's refusal to comply with Security Council resolutions 385 (1976) of 30 January 1976, 431 (1978) of 27 July 1978, 435 (1978) of 29 September 1978, 439 (1978) of 13 November 1978 and 532 (1983) of 31 May 1983 and at its manoeuvres aimed at gaining international recognition for illegitimate groups which it has installed in Namibia, and which are subservient to Pretoria's interests, in order to maintain its policies of domination and exploitation of the people and natural resources of Namibia,

Reaffirming the imperative need to proceed without any further delay with the implementation of Security Council resolution 435 (1978), which, together with Council resolution 385 (1976), is the only basis for a peaceful settlement of the question of Namibia,

Condemning the attempts by South Africa and the United States of America to continue to deny the Namibian people their inalienable right to self-determination and independence by linking the independence of Namibia with totally irrelevant and extraneous issues,

Reaffirming that the Cuban forces are in Angola by a sovereign act of the Government of Angola, in accordance with the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, and that the attempts to link their presence in that country with Namibia's independence constitute interference in the internal affairs of Angola,

Reaffirming that the only parties to the conflict in Namibia are, on the one hand, the Namibian people represented by the South West Africa People's Organization, their sole and authentic representative, and, on the other, the racist regime of South Africa which illegally occupies Namibia,

Recalling its request to the Security Council, in the light of the serious threat to international peace and security posed by South Africa, to respond positively to the overwhelming demand of the international community by immediately imposing comprehensive mandatory sanctions against that country as provided for in

Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling its call upon all States, in view of the threat to international peace and security posed by South Africa, to impose comprehensive mandatory sanctions against that country in accordance with the provisions of the Charter, [93]

Taking note of the further reports of the Secretary-General dated 19 May 1983 [94] and 29 August 1983 [95] concerning the implementation of Security Council resolutions 435 (1978) and 439 (1978) concerning the question of Namibia,

1. Strongly condemns South Africa for obstructing the implementation of Security Council resolutions 385 (1976), 435 (1978), 439 (1978) and 532 (1983) and for its manoeuvres, in contravention of those resolutions, designed to consolidate its colonial and neo-colonial interests at the expense of the legitimate aspirations of the Namibian people for genuine self-determination, freedom and national independence in a united Namibia;

2. Reaffirms the direct responsibility of the United Nations for Namibia pending its achievement of genuine self-determination and national independence;

3. Reiterates that Security Council resolution 435 (1978), in which the Council endorsed the United Nations plan for the independence of Namibia, is the only basis for a peaceful settlement of the question of Namibia and demands its immediate and unconditional implementation without qualification, modification or amendment or the introduction of extraneous and irrelevant issues of "linkage", "parallelism" or "reciprocity" insisted upon by the United States of America and South Africa;

4. Emphasizes once again that the only parties to the conflict in Namibia are, on the one hand, the Namibian people represented by the South West Africa People's Organization, their sole and authentic representative, and, on the other, the racist régime of South Africa, which illegally occupies Namibia;

5. Demands that South Africa urgently comply fully and unconditionally with the resolutions of the Security Council, in particular resolutions 385 (1976) and 435 (1978) and subsequent resolutions of the Council relating to Namibia;

6. Firmly rejects and condemns the persistent attempts by the United States of America and South Africa to establish a linkage or parallelism between the independence of Namibia and any extraneous and irrelevant issues, in particular the presence of Cuban forces in Angola, and emphasizes unequivocally that all such attempts are designed to delay the decolonization process in Namibia and that they constitute interference in the internal affairs of Angola;

7. Calls upon all States to condemn and reject any attempt to link the independence of Namibia with extraneous and irrelevant issues;

8. Expresses its dismay at the fact that the Security Council has been prevented by its three Western permanent members from adopting effective measures against South Africa in the discharge of its responsibilities for the maintenance of international peace and security, and considers that comprehensive and mandatory sanctions under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, if universally and effectively implemented, would ensure South Africa's compliance with the decisions of the United Nations;

9. Requests the Security Council to exercise its authority with regard to the implementation of its resolutions 385 (1976), 435 (1978) and 532 (1983) so as to bring about the independence of Namibia without further delay, and to act decisively against any dilatory manoeuvres and fraudulent schemes of the South African administration in Namibia aimed at frustrating the legitimate struggle of the Namibian people for independence;

10. Urges the Security Council to impose comprehensive mandatory sanctions against the racist régime of South Africa under Chapter VII of the Charter, in order to ensure the total cessation of all co-operation with that régime, particularly in the military and nuclear fields, by Governments, corporations, institutions and individuals;

Resolution 38/39 A and G, Adopted by the U.N. General Assembly, December 5, 1983 (Extracts) [96]

Policies of Apartheid of the Government of South Africa

A SITUATION IN SOUTH AFRICA

The General Assembly,

Recalling and reaffirming its resolution 37/69 of 9 December 1982,

Having considered the report of the Special Committee against Apartheid, [97] as well as its special report on recent developments concerning relations between Israel and South Africa, [98]

Taking note of the declarations of conferences organized or co-sponsored by the Special Committee, namely, the International Conference of Trade Unions on Sanctions and Other Actions against the Apartheid Régime in South Africa, held at Geneva on 10 and 11 June 1983, [99] the International Conference for Sanctions against Apartheid in Sports, held in London from 27 to 29 June 1983, [1] the International Non-Governmental Organizations Conference on Action against Apartheid and Racism, held at Geneva from 5 to 8 July 1983, [2] the International Conference on the Alliance between South Africa and Israel, held at Vienna from 11 to 13 July 1983, [3] and the Latin American Regional Conference for Action against Apartheid, held at Caracas from 16 to 18 September 1983, [4]

Gravely concerned over the threat to international peace and security, and repeated breaches of the peace and acts of aggression, caused by the policies and actions of the racist minority régime of South Africa,

Condemning the racist minority régime of South Africa for its repeated defiance of the United Nations, its oppression of the great majority of the people of South Africa and its ruthless repression of all opponents of apartheid,

Strongly condemning the execution of Simon Mogoerane, Jerry Mosololi and Thabo Motaung, members of the African National Congress of South Africa, in defiance of appeals by the General Assembly and the Security Council,

Reaffirming that apartheid is a crime against humanity,

Strongly convinced that peace and stability in southern Africa require the total eradication of apartheid and the exercise of the right of self-determination by all the people of South Africa, irrespective of race, colour or creed,

Convinced that the racist minority régime of South Africa has been encouraged to perpetrate those criminal acts by the protection accorded to it by major Western Powers against international sanctions and by their continued collaboration with it,

Recognizing that the policies and actions of certain Western Powers and Israel are the main obstacles that have frustrated international efforts for the elimination of apartheid,

Condemning, in particular, the increased collaboration by the Government of the United States of America with the racist régime of South Africa, in pursuance of its policy of so-called "constructive engagement", which has encouraged the racist régime to entrench apartheid, intensify repression and escalate aggression against and destabilization of independent African States,

Condemning the increasing collaboration by Israel with the racist minority régime of South Africa, particularly in the military and nuclear fields,

Rejecting the so-called "constitutional proposals" by the racist minority régime of South Africa as designed to entrench apartheid,

Commending the unity of the oppressed people of South Africa in their opposition to the constitutional proposals as well as in their struggle for the elimination of apartheid and for the establishment of a democratic and non-racial society in a non-fragmented South Africa,

Taking note of the advance of the armed struggle for liberation undertaken by the national liberation movements in the face of brutal repression of peaceful protest,

Recognizing that the legitimate struggle of the South African people for liberation from apartheid is a contribution to the objectives of the United Nations,

Reaffirming that the elimination of apartheid constitutes a major objective of the United Nations,

Considering that all the organizations of the United Nations system have a duty to make a maximum contribution, within their mandates, to the international campaign against apartheid,

1. Endorses the annual report of the Special Committee against Apartheid and its special report on recent developments concerning relations between Israel and South Africa;

2. Declares that the United Nations and the international community have a special responsibility towards the oppressed people of South Africa and their national liberation movements in their legitimate struggle for the elimination of apartheid and the establishment of a nonracial democratic society assuring human rights and fundamental freedoms to all the people of the country, irrespective of race, colour or creed;

3. Again proclaims that the national liberation movements of South Africa are the authentic representatives of the people of South Africa in their just struggle for national liberation;

4. Recognizes the right of the oppressed people and their national liberation movements to resort to all the means at their disposal, including armed struggle, in their resistance to the illegitimate racist minority régime of South Africa;

5. Demands that the racist minority régime of South Africa:

(a) Release persons imprisoned or restricted for their opposition to apartheid;

(b) Allow those who have been exiled for their opposition to apartheid to return unconditionally to their country;

(c) Rescind bans on political and other organizations and media opposed to apartheid;

(d) Terminate all political trials and all repressive measures against opponents of apartheid;

6. Commends the people of South Africa and their national liberation movements for the great advance in their struggle for national liberation;

7. Commends the oppressed people of South Africa and their national liberation movements, particularly the African National Congress of South Africa, for intensifying the armed struggle against the racist régime of South Africa;

8. Calls upon all States and organizations to provide all necessary moral, political and material assistance to the South African liberation movements recognized by the Organization of African Unity at this crucial stage in their struggle for liberation;

9. Reaffirms that freedom fighters of South Africa should be treated as prisoners of war in accordance with Additional Protocol I [5] to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949; [6]

10. Strongly condemns the apartheid régime of South Africa for its brutal repression of all opponents of apartheid, its torture and killing of detainees, its execution of freedom fighters and its repeated acts of aggression, subversion and terrorism against independent African States;

11. Condemns as an international crime the policy of "bantustanization" designed to dispossess the African majority of its inalienable rights and to deprive it of citizenship, as well as the continuing forced removal of black people;

12. Condemns the policies of certain Western States, especially the United States of America, and Israel, and of their transnational corporations and financial institutions that have increased political, economic and military collaboration with the racist minority régime of South Africa despite repeated appeals by the General Assembly;

13. Again urges the Security Council to determine that the situation in South Africa and in southern Africa as a whole, resulting from the policies and actions of the apartheid régime of South Africa, constitutes a grave and growing threat to international peace and security, and to impose comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against the racist minority régime under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations;

14. Urgently calls upon the International Monetary Fund to terminate credits or other assistance to the racist minority régime of South Africa;

15. Again requests the International Atomic Energy Agency to refrain from extending to South Africa any facilities which may assist it in its nuclear plans and, in particular, to exclude South Africa from all its technical working groups;

16. Calls upon all States that have not yet done so to accede to the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid; [7]

17. Decides to continue the authorization of adequate financial provision in the regular budget of the United Nations to enable the South African liberation movements recognized by the Organization of African Unity—namely, the African National Congress of South Africa and the Pan Africanist Congress of Azania—to maintain offices in New York in order to participate effectively in the deliberations of the Special Committee and other appropriate bodies;

18. Commends the anti-apartheid and solidarity movements, religious bodies, trade unions, youth and student organizations and other groups engaged in campaigns for the isolation of the apartheid régime and assistance to the South African liberation movements recognized by the Organization of African Unity;

19. Urges all Governments to lend all appropriate assistance, including financial assistance, to such groups, especially in countries which continue to collaborate with the apartheid régime;

20. Appeals to journalists, writers, artists and other professionals working in the mass media, as well as their professional associations, to foster the role of the mass media in the dissemination of information commensurable with the urgent need to eradicate apartheid;

21. Requests the Secretary-General:

(a) To instruct all relevant units of the Secretariat and all United Nations offices to promote the international campaign against apartheid in co-operation with the Special Committee;

(b) To take all necessary measures to deny any facilities to, and to refrain from any investment in, corporations operating in South Africa;

[7] Resolution 3068 (XXVIII), annex.

(c) To enter into urgent consultations with the International Monetary Fund and the International Atomic Energy Agency to secure their full co-operation in action against apartheid, in accordance with the resolutions of the General Assembly;

(d) To prepare, in consultation with the executive heads of the organizations of the United Nations system, proposals for concerted action by all the agencies in the international campaign against apartheid;

22. Requests the Special Committee:

(a) To prepare a report reviewing the implementation of the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council on the problem of apartheid and the acts of aggression by the racist régime of South Africa, and the policies and actions of States which have failed to co-operate in international action;

(b) To review developments concerning collaboration by the United States of America, Israel and other states with the racist regime of South Africa, and to report from time to time, as appropriate;

(c) To pay special attention to mobilizing public opinion and encouraging public action against collaboration with South Africa.

MILITARY AND NUCLEAR COLLABORATION WITH SOUTH AFRICA

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its resolutions on military and nuclear collaboration with South Africa, in particular its resolution 37/69 D of 9 December 1982,

Recalling its resolutions concerning the denuclearization of the continent of Africa,

Recalling also Security Council resolutions 418 (1977) of 4 November 1977, 421 (1977) of 9 December 1977 and 473 (1980) of 13 June 1980,

Recalling that the Security Council determined in resolution 418 (1977), under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, that the acquisition by South Africa of arms and related matériel constituted a threat to the maintenance of international peace and security,

Having considered the reports of the Special Committee against Apartheid, the International Conference on Sanctions against South Africa [8] and the International Conference on the Alliance between South Africa and Israel, [9]

Taking into account the Declarations of the Seventh Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held at New Delhi from 7 to 12 March 1983, [10] and the resolutions adopted by the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity at its nineteenth ordinary session, held at Addis Ababa from 6 to 12 June 1983, [11]

Gravely concerned that, despite the arms embargo imposed by the Security Council, the racist regime of South Africa has continued to obtain from certain Western States and Israel military equipment and ammunition, as well as technology and know-how to develop its armaments industry and nuclear-weapon capability,

Noting with grave concern that military and nuclear collaboration by certain Western States and Israel with South Africa has enabled the racist régime to develop its arms production and become an arms-exporting country,

Recognizing that the stepped-up arms buildup and nuclear-weapon capability, as well as escalating acts of aggression by the racist régime of South Africa, constitute a grave threat to international peace and security,

Expressing alarm at the growing violation of the arms embargo, as well as the continued nuclear collaboration by the United States of America and some other Western States and Israel with the apartheid régime,

Condemning the actions of those transnational corporations that continue, through their collaboration with the racist régime of South Africa, to enhance its military and nuclear capabilities, as well as the failure of the Governments of the home countries of those corporations to take effective action to prevent such collaboration in accordance with the relevant resolutions of the United Nations,

Considering the urgent need for mandatory decisions by the Security Council, under Chapter VII of the Charter, to prohibit any military and nuclear collaboration with the racist régime of South Africa,

1. Urges the Security Council to take mandatory decisions, under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, to ensure the total cessation of all military and nuclear co-operation with the racist régime of South Africa by Governments, corporations, institutions and individuals;

2. Strongly condemns the actions of certain Western States and Israel which have provided the racist régime of South Africa with an enormous arsenal of military equipment and technology, as well as assistance in its nuclear plans, and which have allowed corporations under their jurisdiction to invest in the armaments industry in South Africa;

3. Also condemns the recent decision of the United States of America approving the request from seven corporations to provide technological and maintenance service to the nuclear installation of racist South Africa;

4. Further condemns any manoeuvres to create military pacts or arrangements with the participation of the racist régime of South Africa;

5. Calls upon all Member States:

(a) To monitor effectively and to reinforce the mandatory arms embargo against South Africa;

(b) To prohibit all military and nuclear co-operation with South Africa by Governments, corporations, institutions and individuals;

6. Calls upon all Governments that have not yet done so to terminate all military and nuclear collaboration with South Africa and to take all necessary measures for preventing corporations and enterprises under their jurisdiction from engaging in any such collaboration.

Statement by the Alternate Representative (Keyes) Before the U.N. General Assembly, New York, December 5, 1983 [12]

U.S. Reservations About U.N. General Assembly Resolution 38/39

Mr. President, the members of this distinguished body have heard my government's policies on the issues of southern Africa explained a number of times, most recently in this chamber on November 18. [13] We all abhor apartheid. We are all morally obliged to pursue policies that encourage its elimination.

Given this broad common ground among the members of this assembly, we are disappointed that once again these resolutions were presented without any serious attempt to negotiate their content and language which specifically impugns the good faith of the United States and other U.N. members on this issue. Moreover, they appear to us to be based upon a general approach to the task of eliminating apartheid that will make that task more difficult and more violent.

Further, we must object this year, as in previous years, to the continuing attempt to politicize in this manner such technical bodies as the International Monetary Fund and the International Atomic Energy Agency. We particularly note the paragraph in the resolution on the Situation in South Africa [14] which requests the IAEA to refrain from extending to South Africa any facilities which may assist in its nuclear plans and, in particular, to exclude South Africa from all IAEA technical working groups. We consider this to be an unwarranted intrusion into the internal affairs of the IAEA, an independent international organization with its own statutory requirements. Perhaps more significant, we do not understand how the attempt to keep southern Africa free of nuclear weapons can be advanced by barring South Africa from any contact with the organization especially charged with assisting in this effort. In this respect, the resolution in question is a paradigm of much that we find unhelpful, indeed, seriously damaging to a realistic effort to address the problems of South Africa.

Finally, Mr. President, we cannot but find objectionable the strident criticism of my government and a few others which a number of these resolutions contain. Why have the authors of these resolutions ignored the facts that are before them and disregarded the consideration that normally prevails among friendly governments in this forum? In this respect, I cite as an egregious but not unique example the charges contained in the resolution on Military and Nuclear Collaboration with South Africa,[15] and especially the accusation referring to the approval by the U.S. Government of bidding by American companies on a contract to provide advice and technical services to a South African firm whose commercial nuclear reactors provide electricity to a nationwide power grid. The approval represents not the slightest infringement of the arms embargo.

This issue was addressed by us in this chamber on October 14.[16] No one has since attempted to challenge the information provided at that time. The fact that the United States alone has been cited, although, as this Assembly has been informed, companies from a number of member states have bid on the same contracts, forces us to conclude that the paragraph in question was inserted not as a contribution to the anti-apartheid effort, but as an unjustified attempt to single out the United States for criticism.

In closing, I wish to express our desire to continue to cooperate with all men of good will in positive efforts to bring about an end to apartheid. We look forward to the day when resolutions framed in a truly constructive spirit will deserve and obtain the unanimous support of all who, like ourselves, are committed to the promotion of justice in South Africa.

Resolution 545 (1983), Adopted by the U.N. Security Council, December 20, 1983 [17]

U.N. Security Council Condemnation of South African Occupation of Parts of Angola

The Security Council,

Having heard the statement of the Permanent Representative of Angola to the United Nations,

Deeply concerned at the continued occupation of parts of southern Angola by the South African military forces in flagrant violation of the principles and objectives of the Charter of the United Nations and of international law,

Gravely concerned at the massive loss of human life and extensive destruction of property brought about by the continuing attacks against and military occupation of the territory of the People's Republic of Angola,

Recalling its resolutions 387 (1976), 428 (1978), 447 (1979), 454 (1979) and 475 (1980),

Bearing in mind that in accordance with Article 2, paragraph 4, of the Charter of the United Nations, all Member States shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the Charter,

Conscious of the need to take effective measures to maintain international peace and security in view of South Africa's continued violation of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Strongly condemns South Africa's continued military occupation of parts of southern Angola which constitutes a flagrant violation of international law and of the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Angola;

2. Declares that the continued illegal military occupation of the territory of the People's Republic of Angola is a flagrant violation of the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of Angola and endangers international peace and security;

3. Demands that South Africa should unconditionally withdraw forthwith all its occupation forces from the territory of Angola and cease all violations against that State and henceforth scrupulously respect the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the People's Republic of Angola;

4. Considers, moreover, that Angola is entitled to appropriate redress for any material damage it has suffered;

5. Calls upon all Member States to desist from any action which would undermine the independence, territorial integrity and sovereignty of the People's Republic of Angola;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to monitor the implementation of the present resolution and report accordingly to the Security Council;

7. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

Statement by the Representative at the United Nations (Kirkpatrick) in the U.N. Security Council, December 20, 1983 [18]

Explanation of the U.S. Abstention on the Angolan Complaint Against South Africa

Mr. President, my country, together with a good many others, has been deeply involved for a number of years in the quest for peace in southern Africa and the quest for independence for Namibia, and the quest for the pacification of that troubled area. We remain today deeply involved in that quest. This effort has been and remains an issue of high priority for the United States. In the course of our quest we have consulted closely with Angola, South Africa, and other interested states in and out of the region, who also seek peace in the region. The Namibian political parties, our Contact Group partners, other African governments, the Secretary-General—all of us have spoken together again and again in the search for peace in this troubled region. The Secretary-General's role in this process has been particularly constructive. We are all indebted to him for his constructive involvement in this search for peace in the region.

Mr. President, the South African commitment to begin a disengagement of its "forces which from time to time conduct military operations against SWAPO in Angola, on January 31, 1984," was announced in a letter of December 15th [19] and represents, in our judgment, a major new step in this arduous process. We welcome this public announcement of a readiness to disengage its forces. We believe this step has the potential to contribute substantially to a climate that could facilitate further movement in southern African negotiations, and we hope that conditions on the ground will permit a cease-fire as soon as possible.

A durable settlement of the problems of southern Africa clearly depends on mutual respect for the essential principles of sovereignty and territorial integrity of all states in the region. We further believe that such a settlement, if it is to be achieved, must take account of the security of all in the region. We would, therefore, hope that once a cease-fire comes into effect it would extend beyond the initial 30-day period proposed by the South African Government, in order that these conditions have a chance to take hold.

The South African announcement underscores the validity of the effort in which we and our Contact Group partners have been and are involved. We continue to believe this effort provides the best hope of bringing lasting peace to the area. The questions before us now are essentially these: Do we seize on this significant new development, this hopeful and encouraging first step, and allow it to be considered and tested by those most directly involved? Or do we reject it out of hand as meaningless and choose instead to engage in this forum in fruitless recriminations? The alternatives are clear and so should the answer be clear—to all who genuinely seek peace in the region.

[19] In the letter of December 15, 1983, from South African Foreign Minister R.F. Botha to U.N. Secretary-General Pérez de Cuéllar, South Africa offered to disengage its forces from operations in Angola for 30 days beginning January 31, 1984, and to extend the disengagement on condition that Angolan forces, SWAPO, and the Cubans would not exploit the situation by "actions which might threaten the security of the inhabitants of SWA/Namibia." (U.N. document S/1629, p. 2)

The position of my government is, in any case, clear: We are deeply concerned with the escalating cycle of violence in southern Africa. We are particularly disturbed about the problem of crossborder violence. We have urged and will continue to urge military restraint and respect for national boundaries. We do not believe there are military solutions to the conflicts in southern Africa. The policies of the United States are grounded in the belief that negotiated solutions are both possible and essential. Crossborder violence cannot be condoned, whether it be in the form of terrorist attacks by externally based organizations or a violation of the territorial integrity of Angola by South African forces. Neither contributes to the process of building a structure of peace which is so ardently desired by all those who live in the region.

Our own effort to pursue peace in southern Africa is moving forward actively through contacts with the states most directly involved. We are in close and regular touch with the states of the region. We will do nothing which will jeopardize this delicate and, we believe, hopeful peace process. Our position in this debate is shaped primarily by our commitment to achieving results in the ongoing negotiations.

Mr. President, each of us must decide whether to pursue the new hope toward peaceful reconciliation, or to bury it in mistrust and condemnations. For my government the choice is clear: We do not intend to let this opportunity pass us by. Thus, we have abstained on the draft resolution. [20]

U.S. Call For an End to Violence in Angola To Permit Disengagement To Occur

. . . . . .

[MR. HUGHES.] I have an announcement on Angola. We've seen reports suggesting apparent conflict between military activity in southern Angola [22] and diplomatic efforts to produce a disengagement of forces and an overall settlement. The South African Government has proposed a disengagement of forces in southern Angola with an effective date of January 31.

The United States believes that this development offers an opportunity to begin a process of disengagement of conflicting military forces and a reduction in the levels of violence. The United States has seen nothing to suggest that this opening is unacceptable to any of the parties, and we believe it should provide a useful basis for exploring practical ways of implementing a cease-fire which should be the first step toward a broader settlement leading to implementation of U.N. Security Council Resolution 435.

An atmosphere of confidence is crucial at this important juncture of events in the region. We're concerned at reports of wide-scale fighting inside southern Angola and hope that all sides will exercise restraint so as not to jeopardize the prospects for exploring the disengagement proposal.

The United States is willing to assist this process in any way it can and is so indicating to the various parties, including our Contact Group partners.

. . . . . .

Q. The Angolan Government at the United Nations—I think it was early last week or late the week before—said they weren't interested in pursuing this proposal at this time and took the position which is backed by the Security Council that South African forces have no right in any case to be in Angola. [23]

What is your position on this, especially in light of the reports of the recent fighting by a considerable number of South African aircraft and forces?

A. Clearly that the fighting is not helpful, and that we and others will do whatever we can to bring that to an end, but we do not believe that the South African Government's initiative is barren. We have not seen anything which indicates that it is no longer valid.

Q. Do we have any statement with respect only to the South African Government's military presence and recent offensive in Angola? Why aren't we condemning that particular initiative by them and instead using this very general thing which takes South Africa's position in terms of how a disengagement can—

A. I think you're misrepresenting what we said. I don't think that the condemnation of violence excludes the current activity.

[23] Reference presumably is to the statements by Angolan Representative Elisio de Figueiredo in the U.N. Security Council on December 16 and 20, 1983; for texts, see U.N. Documents S/PV.2504, December 16, and S/PV.2508, December 20, 1983. In a letter of December 31, 1983, to U.N. Secretary-General Pérez de Cuéllar, Angolan President José Eduardo dos Santos stated that Angola "would not oppose the establishment of a truce of 30 days after 31 January," if SWAPO agreed to it, and if South Africa "withdraws its military units from Angolan territory and solemnly promises to initiate the implementation, within 15 days after that period, of resolution 435 (1978) on Namibia, without extraneous considerations in that context." Testimony by the Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs (Crocker) Before a Subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, March 8, 1983 (Extracts) [1]

Reasons For U.S. Support For Zimbabwe

. . . . . .

SENATOR HELMS. Mr. Secretary, I do not want to be critical of you, and I am not, but think back over your responses to the questions I have asked and you have not even implied any criticism of the Mugabe regime. Do you have none?

MR. CROCKER. If you ask the question in those broad terms, I am fully prepared to answer, sir. We have made clear, whenever we have seen practices and policies that we have problems with, we have made clear to the Government of Zimbabwe in the diplomatic channel, as we prefer to do, precisely what our concerns were. We have done so at the highest levels of our Government.

That concerns issues such as the rule of law, the right of defendants to legal counsel, the right of people to a fair trial, all sorts of due process kinds of issues which have arisen, as you know, during the past year. We have made clear those concerns at my level and above, and I would emphasize that our Vice President was there within the past few months, and very clearly made our views known on a number of these issues of rule of law.

As concerns other things that are being done in Zimbabwe that we read about in the papers more recently, we have also made very clear our concerns. We cannot condone and do not condone the use of government force, violent means, against civilians, which appears to be going on recently. We have said so both publicly and privately. So I do not think it would be fair to characterize our position as having nothing critical to say about the Zimbabwe Government.

[1] Source: Security and Development Assistance: Hearings Before the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session (Washington, 1983), pp. 441, 443–444. Crocker testified before the Subcommittee on African Affairs.

SENATOR HELMS. Now, you are asking for $75 million in economic support funds. I guess what I am driving at, Mr. Secretary, is would this money go to support a one-party Marxist system that Mr. Mugabe is building?

MR. CROCKER. Senator, I think that we should step back for a moment to look at what we pledged to support in 1981. We made a 3-year commitment at the Zimcord Conference in Zimbabwe of $75 million a year for 3 years. We made it in the context of Western donor effort, overwhelmingly Western donor effort, to seek to stabilize that economy and assist it during the transition that it was undergoing.[2]

We believe that our program in Zimbabwe has had significant impact and in fact has become a model program in the eyes of many other donors, precisely because it has been fast in its effects in getting resources to the foreign currency starved private sector, and bolstering what we believe on balance is a pragmatic economic program which means a mixed economy.

And despite the public statements often made that this will be a Marxist system, if you look at the actions and the policies in practice, there has been significant evidence of a desire by the government to reassure the private sector, to reassure the white minority. This has produced, in fact, dramatic results in increased agricultural output by both the white farming community and the black farming community so that there are some results from our program.

Looked at then, if I could summarize, in the economic sense we believe the program has been remarkably effective. Obviously, we are not interested in supporting one-party police states when there are better alternatives. We have made our views known about any trend toward government repression, and we do not believe that those sorts of means will solve Zimbabwe's problems. We have said so.

[2] On March 24, 1981, the Reagan administration announced a commitment to give $75 million in economic aid to Zimbabwe over a 3-year period, subject to congressional approval. The pledge was made on the second day of the Zimcord conference, held in Harare, March 23–27, 1981. The conference was attended by representatives of 31 nations and 26 international organizations. Visit of Zambian President Kaunda

SENIOR STATE DEPARTMENT OFFICIAL. Let me tell you a little bit about this visit and its genesis. It's part of the continuum of consultations that we've had with the Zambians over the years. Kenneth Kaunda is no stranger to Washington. I think it's his fourth trip here.[4]

This is an official working visit. The emphasis will be on substance. He will arrive this afternoon from Paris. He has been in Paris, he's been in London, he's been in Cyprus. He will go on from here to Cape Verde, and then to Algiers.

He will arrive here this afternoon. He meets with the President tomorrow, meets with the Secretary tomorrow. The Vice President will give him a dinner the next day. He will meet with other high-level administration officials, with Congressmen, [3] Source: Department of State files. The briefing was conducted on background by a senior Department of State official and by a senior administration official. President Kaunda visited Washington, March 29–April 2, 1983.

[4] President Kaunda visited the United States on an informal visit on April 19, 1975, and on a state visit, May 16–22, 1978.

with officials of the international financial institutions before departing I think early on Saturday morning.

Kenneth Kaunda is the first southern African leader, or frontline states leader, to visit the United States in this administration. He is one of Africa's senior statesmen. His views on southern African issues are respected and sought by this government, and that's the reason why he's coming.

This is not going to be a negotiating session on southern African issues. It is going to be an exchange of views, a consultation, and part of a series of consultations that began when Vice President Bush went to Lusaka last November.[5] We're looking forward to having him here, and the community here will spend a lot of time listening to his views.

I think that is all I want to say at the outset. I think economic issues will come into the discussion as well, but the focus will probably be on the southern African issues.

Let me throw the session open and bring my colleague up here to provide some broader context of his own.

SECOND SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I might just add that, as my colleague has said, President Kaunda has been the leader of his country since its independence. Some would say since before its independence. He's a major figure in the nonaligned movement, obviously, as well. He has many things he'll want to talk about that go beyond immediate issues in his own neighborhood, I'm sure of that.

Everyone who's followed African events closely over the years is well aware that he's been a central player in the search for a negotiated peaceful change in southern Africa for decades, a major player in the Rhodesian conflict era, a major victim of that war, as a matter of fact—Zambia—and has an important interest as well in another neighbor, namely, Namibia.

He is a leader who has in the past taken important stands for peace, even when it meant that he was out front of some of his friends. He is a man of, obviously, considerable experience. We intend to profit from hearing his views directly. And he is in every sense a major figure among the frontline leaders, although he is not the Chairman of the frontline, a title that is reserved for the President of Tanzania.[6]

He lives very close by to many of the more important conflicts in southern Africa; therefore, he's intimately involved in all these questions.

I think I'll just stop there, and then my colleague and I will be happy to take any questions there might be.

Q. Is there any special urgency about this visit or is it just one of those things that turns up on the diplomatic calendar?

SECOND OFFICIAL. No. I wouldn't say there's any special urgency about it. There's been preparation for some time on it. The invitation for it I believe—correct me if I'm wrong—was actually transmitted during the Vice President's visit, is that correct?

FIRST OFFICIAL. In November, yes.

. . . . . .

Q. Since we're on background, could one of you tell us what President Kaunda's position is on the question of Cuban troops in Angola?

FIRST OFFICIAL. He has made no secret of his sense that the linkage, as it's put by the frontline states, between these two issues is extraneous to the Namibian independence process. That is the standard frontline states' position and he adheres to that.

. . . . . .

Q. Is there any U.S. aid to Zambia?

FIRST OFFICIAL. Yes. We have been providing over the last several years an average of about $30 million a year. In some years it's been higher; in some years it's been lower. This year it will be about that, focused on agriculture. The Zambian Government is trying to develop their agricultural sector, and the United States is working with them to support that emphasis. Our aid takes the form of P.L. 480 food assistance, commodity import assistance—primarily fertilizer—and technical aid in the form of advisers who are stationed in Zambia to provide help on planning, research, marketing, that kind of thing. This year the figure will be about $30 million, and the mix will be about half P.L. 480, about half commodity import, something like that.

[5] See American Foreign Policy: Current Documents, 1982, p. 1235.

[6] Julius K. Nyerere.

The figures over the last 6 or 7 years come to an aggregate of about $200 million since the middle seventies.

In addition, we are providing another $13 million for a road-building and a road-repairing project between Kafue and Chirundu. Let me translate that for you. It's actually the main road between Lusaka and Harare. It's a regional project funded under SADEC [SADCC?] auspices, and it's not part of our bilateral program with Zambia, but it does impact directly on the economy there.

Q. No military aid?

FIRST OFFICIAL. No military aid.

Statements by President Reagan and Zambian President Kaunda, March 30, 1983 [7]

U.S.-Zambian Relations Characterized by Cordiality and Mutual Respect

THE PRESIDENT. Well, it's been our pleasure to welcome to the White House President Kenneth Kaunda of the Republic of Zambia. President Kaunda is no stranger to this House, nor to the people of the United States. As one of Africa's senior and most respected statesmen, he plays an admirable role in international events.

Our talks today covered a broad range of shared concerns and were conducted with the same cordiality and mutual respect which characterizes the relations between our two countries.

I welcomed this opportunity to discuss personally with President Kaunda the vital issue of Namibia. As the leader of one of the frontline states, his counsel and his experience are highly valued during these crucial negotiations. We share a common commitment for the prompt implementation of United Nations Security Council Resolution 435, and look forward to the day when we can celebrate a free and independent Namibia.

Mr. President, we also recognize and applaud your tireless efforts for peace and regional stability in Africa. Your special attention to African unity and to the organization that gives concrete expression to that concept is greatly admired here. The Organization of African Unity is indispensable to the pursuit of stability and development throughout Africa.

I know that your own country, Zambia, is suffering severe economic hardship as a result of the depressed prices of your primary export commodities. The United States itself is now emerging from a long period of economic uncertainty. We are convinced that our recovery will lead to a healthier world economy and should strengthen demand for Zambian and other producers' minerals.

In the meantime, we support the emphasis that you are placing on developing the agricultural sector of your economy. We are proud to have cooperated with you in that development. Our strong bilateral relationship will be maintained and will evolve as we continue to work together.

I understand that you will be conferring with a wide variety of people during your stay here in Washington. I am certain they will benefit, as I have, from your views on our bilateral relationship as well as on regional and global issues.

It's a pleasure, Dr. Kaunda, to have you as our guest in the United States of America. It's been a great pleasure.

The remarks were made on the South Lawn of the White House at 1:22 p.m. prior to President Kaunda's departure.

PRESIDENT KAUNDA. I am delighted to have this opportunity to express, on behalf of my delegation and on my own behalf, our profound gratitude to President Reagan for inviting me to visit the United States at this time. It is a pleasure to be here once again.

We appreciate immensely the warm hospitality which the President and his people have accorded us since our arrival in this beautiful city yesterday. The friendly reception which has been given to us is a reflection of the good relations which happily exist between our two countries and peoples.

I want to particularly thank the President for the discussions which have just ended. These have gone on very well. We have covered a wide range of issues, including Zambia-U.S. relations, Southern Africa, the Middle East, and world peace and security. We are both happy at the state of our bilateral relations which are warm. Both President Reagan and I recognize the need to continue to consolidate and strengthen the ties that exist between our two countries, for we believe that it is in the interests of our countries to develop further these relations.

As might have been expected, our discussions on problems of South Africa and Namibia were extensive. We share an abhorrence of the apartheid system, which is being practiced in South Africa. We are both of the view that an early end to this system will be good for peace, stability and rich harmony in the southern African region.

On Namibia, I have explained to President Reagan how we in Zambia see the solution to the problem in that country. I have also listened very carefully to President Reagan's views on the problem. We both believe that this is a serious problem to which an early solution is imperative.

We agree that the basis of the solution to this problem should be Resolution 435 of the United Nations Security Council. In this connection we have agreed that our two countries should continue to consult each other on these problems.

We also had occasion to exchange views on the problem in the Middle East and the Arab Gulf States. We are concerned about the absence of peace and stability in the area.

We hope that solutions can be found that can lead to durable peace and security in that important area of the world.

Let me once again thank you, Mr. President, for the generous hospitality which you have extended to us. I hope that the discussions we have had will form a strong foundation on which to build our future relations.

Thank you, Mr. President.

Presidents Reagan and Kaunda's Exchange of Views on Southern Africa

[SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL.] This meeting was really the high point, so far, in what I would call a continuum of consultation, and this series of consultations will continue. Both men agreed to keep in constant touch as we work our way toward a solution of the really pressing issues in southern Africa.

I think that the Zambian side as well as the American side were very well satisfied with the exchange.

Q. Why?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. They were satisfied because there was a very strong effort on both sides to listen, to understand, and to try and devise common approaches to the problems that face them.

Q. And did they?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Yes.

Q. On Namibia? Did they agree to separate the Angolan-Cuban issue from the Namibian independence issue?

---

[8] Source: Office of the Press Secretary to the President. The briefing was conducted on background by two senior administration officials in the Briefing Room of the White House, beginning at 1:43 p.m.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I'm not going to go into the specifics of what was actually said. All I can say is that both sides understand each other's positions very, very clearly, and share very much the same objectives.

Q. How about the meetings?

Q. Well, but that's exactly where they were before they started.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. That's where they are now.

Q. So they have made no progress?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. These negotiations—these talks were not negotiations. These were consultations.

Q. But there was advance indication that Dr. Kaunda would be asking the United States to put more pressure on South Africa, for instance. Did he?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I think it's fair to say that Dr. Kaunda, President Kaunda, spoke from the heart about the importance of getting an early settlement of the Namibia problem, an early return to greater stability in southern Africa as a whole, to get some momentum behind the hope that we all have for peaceful change in that part of the world. And it was a very heartfelt statement.

We also, on our side, the President, the Secretary spoke from the heart. We have committed ourselves to seeing this process through. We remain convinced that it can be done. We exchanged notes on how we see the current state of play and how the process could be advanced more rapidly. Neither of us has any interest in delay.

Q. It's fair to assume, isn't it, that President Kaunda doesn't think you're doing enough? I mean, this speaking from the heart was—he really was saying that the United States should put more pressure on, wasn't he?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. If I can take an overview of this broad question—because it's very difficult to disentangle South Africa, southern Africa, the whole region, and Namibia and Angola are all part of that. It is the view of the Zambian leadership, as has been repeatedly stated, that the West has a vital role to play in advancing the peace process, in turning the corner away from heightened violence and in leading to a more just and stable region.

I'm not putting words in anyone's mouth when I say that. This is the standard, longstanding Zambian position—that the West has an historic responsibility that it must play. It is our view that we are playing precisely that role, a serious engaged balanced diplomacy in the region.

That is what President Reagan is committed to, and that's what we've already begun.

Q. What can Zambia contribute to resolving the Angola question?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I think it's fair to say that we—both sides exchange—and these exchanges will be continuing this afternoon, by the way—analyses of the state of play in the negotiation. We both put ideas forward. I'm not going to be revealing diplomatic exchanges here as to how that process could be moved more rapidly.

Obviously, President Kaunda, who has been on the scene in—among the frontline states longer than any other leader of the frontline states, with the exception of President Nyerere of Tanzania, is a seasoned statesman who has been through many of these things before.

To the extent that he is assured that we are going to stay the course, it enables him to carry that message, it enables him to carry that message to his colleagues.

It is in part a question of keeping channels open, of keeping communications going at a time when most of the focus is amongst relatively few parties, and others are watching with interest, with concern, and with impatience.

Reagan Administration Justification of Aid Request for Zaire

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. Secretary, the administration is requesting a supplemental for Zaire of $7 million in ESF and $8 million in FMS. In my opinion Zaire is easily one of the most corrupt and despotic countries in Africa; the FMS program has been one of the worst in the world; the government is constantly reneging on its debt payments; and yet the administration is making this request.

How in the world can such a request be justified?

A. The administration is requesting supplemental funding for Zaire because it is in the U.S. national interest to demonstrate concretely U.S. support for Zaire's moderate and responsible policies in important areas. Zaire has been a consistent and good friend of the United States. It has demonstrated this in the Security Council, of which it is currently a member, through its support on such diverse issues as Afghanistan, Puerto Rico and Nicaragua. Zaire has been particularly supportive on issues concerning Israel with which it recently renewed diplomatic relations [10] and has begun a security assistance relationship. Zaire is also an important contributor to regional security, as it demonstrated by participating in the OAU Peacekeeping Force in Chad which helped to restore stability to that country after the departure of the Libyan occupiers. Additionally, Zaire is a major producer of strategic minerals important to the U.S. and the West.

Our reliability as a partner is judged by how we treat our friends, and we cannot escape the fact that throughout Africa Zaire is seen as a good friend of the United States. This does not, of course, mean that we ignore Zaire's problems. We have consistently raised our human rights concerns in Zaire with the government there through diplomatic channels. President Mobutu's May 19 announcement of amnesty for all political prisoners and dissidents in exile indicates that this type of approach can help to persuade the Zairian Government to take positive human rights steps.

The assertion that the FMS program is one of the worst in the world is unfounded. Foreign security assistance, of which our FMS program is part, has been an important factor in discouraging a repetition of the 1977 and 1978 invasions of Zaire's Shaban mining centers by Zairian rebels in exile and their East-bloc supporters. However, recent U.S. assistance has been so reduced in a highly inflationary period that the Zairian armed forces transport capability—for which the U.S. has assumed an important role—has deteriorated. What is needed to maintain this vital capability is more FMS, not less.

The Zairian Government has not reneged on its debt obligations. Zaire acknowledges and seeks to pay its $5 billion plus debt. However, in 1983 Zaire's debt service obligation plus arrears will exceed Zaire's total hard currency earnings, a problem caused largely by a fall in copper prices, Zaire's main export. Despite its critical shortage of foreign exchange, Zaire has been making a determined effort to meet as many of its debts as possible, including making its Brooke amendment-sensitive debt service payments. Visit of Zairian President Mobutu

FIRST SENIOR OFFICIAL. President Reagan has invited President Mobutu on an official working visit to Washington to discuss both bilateral relations and regional developments in Africa of mutual interest to both countries.

As you know, the United States has long enjoyed close and mutually beneficial relationships with Zaire. All U.S. administrations since that of President Eisenhower have shared an interest in Zaire's independence, territorial integrity, security, and economic development.

The Reagan administration is committed to a strengthening of U.S.-Zairian relations in all possible ways. Zaire, by virtue of its size, its location, its population, and its resources, plays under President Mobutu's leadership an important role in African affairs.

The United States shares many mutual interests with Zaire in Africa. We have, for example, welcomed Zaire's courageous role in dispatching troops to Chad in support of the Habre government which has been recognized as legitimate by the OAU governments, and which is now under attack by Libyan-supported rebels.

Zaire, like many developing countries, has suffered the economic consequences in recent years of higher prices for its import requirements and lower prices for its exports. It also suffers from the standard problems of underdevelopment and inadequate human, financial, and infrastructure resources.

However, we welcome the steps which the Government of Zaire under President Mobutu's leadership has taken over the past year to deal with its economic problems. Budgetary controls, efforts at improved public administration, liberalization of the economy, and an intensive dialog with the IMF on a stabilization program are all encouraging developments.

We hope the Government of Zaire and the International Monetary Fund will reach early agreement which will lay the basis for consideration of debt rescheduling by official and private creditors, and open the way for renewed economic growth.

Zaire is a complex country with some 250 different ethnic and linguistic groups. President Mobutu has played a central role since Zaire's independence in forging national unity and overcoming centrifugal forces based on tribalism.

President Mobutu has recently declared a political amnesty for opponents both within and outside Zaire. This step toward political reconciliation is one which Zaire's friends, including the United States, have welcomed.

During his visit, President Mobutu will meet with the President; the Vice President with whom he just had lunch; the Secretaries of State, Defense and Treasury; the Administrator of AID; and Members of both Houses of Congress.

He will depart Washington the morning of August 6 to spend a few days in New York meeting American business leaders before returning to Zaire next week.

. . . . . .

Q. Will the help that Zaire is giving Chad reflect favorably upon our consideration of its debt rescheduling?

pursuant to a program for which funds are appropriated under this Act." For full text, see 90 Stat. 780. Similar language was enacted under subsequent foreign assistance appropriations acts.

[12] Source: Office of Press Relations, Department of State. The briefing was conducted on background by two senior administration officials. President Mobutu visited Washington, August 2–6, 1983.

FIRST OFFICIAL. I don't think that there is a direct linkage, nor have the Zairians asked us to make one. Our consideration on debt rescheduling relates to our appreciation and our understanding of the kinds of economic reform measures that President Mobutu has taken in the past year.

In his dialog with the IMF, he has agreed to certain budgetary limitations which he has followed now. We are in the seventh month of an austerity program. He has stayed well within the budgetary limits suggested by the IMF and agreed to by the Government of Zaire. They have had discussions on exchange rate reforms and so on. These are the criteria by which we will measure whether we should enter into a debt rescheduling program.

It is our assumption that if they reach an agreement—and there are signs that an early agreement may be reached with the IMF—then the creditor countries on the basis of economic performance criteria would be prepared to consider a debt rescheduling.

Q. What kind of money are we talking about?

FIRST OFFICIAL. The external debt is approximately $5 billion. How much would be up for rescheduling is a subject which still has to be addressed in the context of their projections of balance-of-payments problems. It's much, much less than $5 billion in terms of rescheduling.

Q. How much is the United States owed?

FIRST OFFICIAL. Debt to the United States—about $800 million, I think. I'm just giving you that off the top of my head. Someone can check that figure if you need it precisely.

Q. Does the $5 billion figure include short-term debts owed to private creditors?

FIRST OFFICIAL. It includes both private creditors and public debt. Essential creditors. But the bulk of it is to other governments and international institutions.

. . . . . .

Q. How about additional military aid to Zaire? What are they asking for and what are we prepared to give?

FIRST OFFICIAL. They have no specific request. The administration has for the last couple of years asked the Congress to approve additional security assistance, funds for Zaire, not related in any way to the Chad situation. But just looking at their own security problems and the very extensive borders that they have, it has been the judgment of this administration that we should provide more support than we now do.

Unfortunately, we haven't gotten congressional approval for higher levels of security assistance.

Q. What are the levels?

FIRST OFFICIAL. Levels have been running in recent years about $10 million in FMS credits, about $10 million in development assistance, and about $10 million in P.L. 480 assistance. In addition to that we have a Peace Corps program there with about 240 volunteers, and some small Title II, P.L. 480, program.

. . . . . .

Q. To what extent are allegations of corruption or actual corruption in Zaire a complicating factor to all of these economic questions you've discussed?

A. Let me just say a word about this. President Mobutu last December, when he launched his economic reform program, also called attention to problems of corruption in the Government of Zaire. Following that, a number of government officials were placed under arrest—I think about 115. Some were brought to trial and have been convicted. A number of Cabinet ministers and governors were relieved of their office.

The total impact of that, I think, has been to substantially reduce the amount of corruption that is occurring, and a kind of serious effort is underway to improve financial management in the government and the public administration.

The perception in the United States and the charges that have been made by people such as Nguza,[13] in Brussels, opponents of the Mobutu regime, have clearly had an impact in the Congress. There has been a great deal of criticism in the consideration of foreign assistance bills for Zaire—foreign assistance proposals for Zaire. One of the elements that is consistently raised in congressional hearings is the issue of corruption.

Statement by President Reagan, August 4, 1983 [14]

"A Warm and Useful Discussion" With President Mobutu

President Mobutu and I have just had a warm and useful discussion. And I am pleased to have been able to meet again with President Mobutu who has been a faithful friend to the United States for some 20 years. The President and I took this opportunity to review the state of U.S.-Zairian relations and we found a large area of agreement on the major points we discussed.

I expressed our admiration for President Mobutu's courageous action in sending troops to assist the Government of Chad in its struggle against Libyan-backed rebels. On the home front, the President has informed me of progress on his government's economic stabilization plan. Zaire is taking the difficult but necessary steps to ensure sustained economic progress. And it's important that we and Zaire's other friends do what we can to help.

President Mobutu and I also discussed his country's political situation. And I told him of the positive reaction in the United States to his recent decision to offer amnesty to his political opponents. This visit has permitted the President and me to reaffirm our common desire for peace and stability in Africa. And I am confident that the close relations between our two countries based on shared interests and perceptions will advance the cause of peace and development in Africa. And we're very pleased to have him visit us once again as he did a year and a half ago. [15]

Statements by President Reagan and Zimbabwean Prime Minister Mugabe, September 13, 1983 [16]

The State of U.S.-Zimbabwean Relations

THE PRESIDENT. I know that the press is very grateful that they are not out in the rain.

It has been a great pleasure to have had the opportunity today to meet with Prime Minister Robert Mugabe of the Republic of Zimbabwe. As the first Prime Minister of Africa's newest independent state, his wise leadership has been a crucial factor in healing the wounds of civil war and developing a new nation with new opportunities. Our discussions today have covered a wide range of topics, including our bilateral relationship and on regional issues we have spoken very frankly and in an atmosphere of mutual respect. We didn't always agree, but have all gained much from hearing your views, Mr. Prime Minister.

The statements were made to reporters in the East Room of the White House beginning at 1:23 p.m. prior to Prime Minister Mugabe's departure. The Prime Minister visited Washington, September 12–14, 1983.

I believe that our two countries will continue to cooperate on those areas where common concerns are shared and that we will come closer to an understanding on those issues where our views diverge. The United States and Zimbabwe have much in common: We both came to independence through a revolutionary process; we are both multiracial societies; and our constitutions offer protection to all our citizens, black and white, ensuring their political freedoms as well as their individual rights.

I am glad to say that since Zimbabwe's independence, relations between Zimbabwe and the United States have been very good and strengthened by this exchange of views will become even better.

We look to Zimbabwe for leadership in southern Africa. Blessed with natural resources, a hard-working, multiracial population, and a spirit of national reconciliation, Zimbabwe can provide a firm foundation of economic viability and political stability and serve as an inspiration in its part of the world.

Mr. Prime Minister, our talks today have confirmed that we also share a desire for peace and stability in southern Africa and I know that we both look forward to a time when all countries there can achieve a level of amity which will allow them to work toward economic, social, and political development, free from the threat of attack from whatever quarter. The ultimate responsibility for resolution of their problems, however, rests with the states of the regions themselves. And here, Mr. Prime Minister, you've taken a leading and constructive role. I know that you will be meeting with a number of leaders in all walks of American life during your stay here in Washington and elsewhere in our land. I am sure they will benefit as I have from your thoughtful views on our bilateral relationship as well as on regional and global issues.

I am delighted that you accepted our invitation to visit Washington and I look forward to meeting you again.

PRIME MINISTER MUGABE. Thank you.

Mr. President, ladies and gentlemen, may I on behalf of my delegation, on behalf of the Government and people of Zimbabwe, we express to you on this historic occasion of our visit—the first such by the head of Government of the Republic of Zimbabwe—express to you our heartfelt thanks and appreciation for that support which the United States has given us all along the way. And this support starts really from the time we were still struggling for our independence as the United States offered itself as party to the negotiations that were under way to bring about a democratic order in Zimbabwe.

We got pledges from your government, from your predecessors, that upon attainment of our independence the United States will not be found wanting in extending to Zimbabwe that amount of aid the United States was capable of extending to it, to enable the young state to attend to those problems created by the war which the young country felt necessary, would feel necessary to attend to.

And, so here we are, a young state that yesterday was only a toddler, but today is able to do a little more than it was able to do yesterday. And this is because of the amount of assistance—I think the United States contributes the largest amount toward our whole program of reconstruction and development. And that input into our own efforts has enabled us to make the—to create the necessary base for our socioeconomic transformation.

We have enjoyed excellent relations with your country. There has never been an occasion when we have had to complain to the United States on issues of bilateral relations falling in the political or diplomatic sphere. Yes, as you admit there have been areas of difference. We are different on the modality of bringing about Namibia's independence, the linkage with the Cuban question. But, sir, generally we have looked at issues through the same glasses, one might say. And our posture regarding international situations of conflict has been identical. We all are opposed. We both are opposed to interference in the domestic affairs of a country by another.

And I am sure this identity of viewpoint makes for the greater friendship and solidarity that we find between our two countries and our two people. We have enjoyed every minute of our stay in your country. We continue our talks with leaders of your society.

But I am very happy that the discussions we have just had have dwelled on those issues which are of mutual interest to our two sides.

READEX FICHE

As you have said, we have discussed bilateral relations, the question of economic aid to Zimbabwe, the question of our original relations, and the fact that South Africa continues to destabilize our region. We have discussed Namibia, we have discussed the apartheid system in South Africa, and there is a greater measure of agreement. There might be some difference here and there in respect of the method of bringing about change, positive change to the area.

We are very happy indeed that this visit has taken place and may I thank you and Vice President Bush who visited us not long ago for extending this invitation to me and enabling me therefore to come to this wonderful country with a wonderful people and a wonderful tradition and express to them the gratitude of the people of Zimbabwe.

We are a young country. We may make mistakes as we move forward, but we are prepared that where we err we shall correct ourselves and get back to course.

We don't intend to vitiate at all those principles which underline the constitutional order that we have created. We are determined that a nonracial society shall exist in Zimbabwe and that racism, tribalism, regionalism, and whatever other "isms," these are things of the past. What we would uphold as fundamental is that principle which binds us together and makes us one, regardless of our race, color, or creed.

And these are matters on which the United States has long made a decision, matters of principle which make for greater democracy and greater freedom in society. We are prepared that this shall also be our tradition.

May I thank you for the kindness and hospitality which has been showered on me and my delegation since our arrival. We have come as friends. We go back as greater and closer friends still.

Thank you.

President Reagan's and Zimbabwean Prime Minister Mugabe's Discussion of Their Differences

. . . . . .

Q. Did the subject of abstention at the United Nations come up and, if so, what is our position to Zimbabwe on that? [18]

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. It was raised. It wouldn't be a surprise to tell you that we were very disappointed by that abstention. The Prime Minister was asked the rationale for it. His answer was that Zimbabwe feels that it doesn't just represent itself on the Security Council, but that it represents the other states of its region.

First of all, southern Africa, to a lesser extent Africa as a whole, and in some cases the nonaligned grouping as a whole and that they had, therefore, consulted with the other governments that they feel they are representing by occupying that seat, as the Prime Minister put it, temporarily. And the seven governments they consulted were unanimous in the view that they should abstain and, therefore, they abstained.

. . . . . .

Q. It is Prime Minister Mugabe's belief that if the United States was to deal more firmly with South Africa with threats,

South Africa would not be as intransigent as it is. What is the U.S. position on that?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. The Prime Minister did express that view and has in several meetings. I suppose our feeling is that we're going about it in the right way through diplomatic channels and are trying to achieve the results that we want to achieve.

The Prime Minister, I must say, stressed political and diplomatic pressure. On several occasions he has said—and I think you reiterated this—that he was't calling for economic sanctions or anything of that sort.

Q. Yes. What is our position on Zimbabwe's progress in regards to human rights, and particularly, in the case of these six airmen? Do we feel they have acted appropriately? Are we troubled by their detention after acquittal?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Yes, I would say that we were troubled by their redetention after acquittal.[19] It's a rather delicate matter to talk to other governments about matters affecting their internal security. Those, I suppose, are the most sensitive issues that any government faces, particularly a Third World government, and one which, in this case, is now only 3½ years away from a very bitter and bloody civil war which was very destructive. They have continuing security problems.

It would not be right for us to tell them that they don't. How they deal with them is really their responsibility. We have our views, we might do things differently ourselves, but they do face certain dangers regionally and internally. There is conflict within the country. Somebody blew up half their air force. That's of concern to them. I wouldn't feel right about going to them and saying: Well, you should ignore that and just let it pass.

. . . . . .

[19] Six white officers of the Zimbabwean Air Force were rearrested following their acquittal on August 31, 1983, on charges that they allegedly aided South African agents in their destruction of 13 aircraft at Thornhill Air Base on July 25, 1982.

Reduction of U.S. Aid to Zimbabwe

. . . . . .

Q. . . . I wasn't here yesterday, and I don't know whether you were asked about the report on Zimbabwe.

Were you asked about the report on Zimbabwe and the alleged cut in aid? And is there a final U.S. position on it?

. . . . . .

[A.] The allocation for Zimbabwe in FY-84 will be $40 million in economic support funds.

. . . . . .

Q. And is there a reason for that drop?

A. The reduction in ESF for Zimbabwe and other countries was required because Congress reduced—or appropriated—less than AID had requested for its overall programs. The figures are $2.94 billion requested, versus $2.90 billion appropriated.

In addition, Congress earmarked more for other countries, causing a shortfall of about $200 million, which had to be absorbed by other potential recipients. It was in that context that the aid to Zimbabwe was reduced from the original planning figures.

Q. $200 million represented just an African shortfall, or worldwide shortfall? And what other countries lost in Africa?

[20] Source: Office of Press Relations, Department of State. Alan Romberg, Department of State Acting Spokesman, conducted the briefing which began at 12:23 p.m. Omitted from the extracted portion are brief questions and answers on what had previously been discussed on the subject of U.S. aid to Zimbabwe.

A. No, overall, I said.

Q. Overall. So, of the $200 million, they lost $35 million; is that correct?

A. I don't know how you—when you start shuffling around the numbers, I don't know if you can quite do it that way. But in any case, that's the fact.

Q. And were there any political considerations taken into account into reaching that decision?

A. Decisions on aid levels to any country are not made on the basis of single factors.

Q. I didn't suggest they were.

A. But in balancing priorities, you've got to take into account a variety of things: overall appropriations levels, relative need, status of bilateral relations between the countries. And it is no secret that there have been differences of opinion between the United States and Zimbabwe, particularly in the international arena; and we have had consultations with the Government of Zimbabwe aimed at a better mutual understanding, and we will continue to do so.

Importance of U.S. Ties With Sudan

Q. Do you have any comment on reports that the United States may have increased aid to the Sudan in the wake of the events of last week? [2]

A. The United States continues to maintain a strong interest in close political and military ties with the Sudan. The events of last week serve to underline the importance we attach to those ties. As you know, we are operating under a continuing resolution which affects the level of military assistance to the Sudan as well as many other countries. We submitted a request to Congress for supplemental funds for several country programs, including Sudan's, prior to the recent Sudan–Libya tension. There has been no change, either in the request or in the rate of delivery.

Emergency U.S. Military Assistance for Chad

President Reagan, pursuant to his authority under Section 506(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, [4] has determined that:

[2] On February 17, 1983, the United States sent four AWACS aircraft to Egypt to monitor Libyan troop movements near the Libyan-Sudanese border. The AWACS were dispatched following warnings from Egyptian President Mubarak to the United States that Libya was planning to attack Sudan. On February 18, Sudanese President Nimeiri announced that a Libyan plot to invade Sudan and overthrow the government had been discovered. On February 22, U.S. Representative to the United Nations Jeane J. Kirkpatrick cited the Libyan threat to Sudan as the reason why the scheduled joint U.S. exercises with Egypt, involving the AWACS, had been moved forward. For text of Kirkpatrick's statement before the U.N. Security Council, see document 398. For further information on the Libyan threat to Sudan and the U.S. response, see documents 396 and 397.

[4] For text of section 506(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, see section 5(b) of the International Security Assistance Act of 1979, P.L. 96–92, October 29, 1979; 93 Stat. 702; and section 110(b) of the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1981, P.L. 97–113, December 29, 1981; 95 Stat. 1526.

1. an unforeseen emergency exists which requires immediate military assistance to Chad;

2. the aforementioned emergency requirement cannot be met under the authority of the Arms Export Control Act or any other law except Section 506(a) of the Act.

Therefore, he has authorized furnishing up to $10 million in defense articles and services by the Department of Defense to Chad under the provisions of Chapters Two and Five of Part II of the Act. Congress has been duly notified.

Since President Habre assumed control of Chad in June 1982, [5] Libya has worked unceasingly to provide ousted leader Goukouni and other dissidents with the means to overthrow Habre and assume power. Colonel Qadhafi has publicly announced his determination to topple the pro-Western Habre. Habre's forces, although relatively well organized and led, have lacked the wherewithal to defeat the antigovernment forces active in Chad. Further, the need constantly to defend against insurgent activities has diverted essential energies and resources from the primary task of rebuilding the economic and political infrastructure of Chad.

Intelligence reports have indicated a constant resupply from Libya of arms and ammunition to the Goukouni forces of the north. Libyan aircraft capable of airlifting anti-Habre troops into government-controlled areas and of providing close air support to ground attacks have been positioned in the Aouzou Strip and in southern Libya. Libyan transports have been landing in territory held by the rebels to deliver supplies to them. Libyan military advisors and technicians serve with the rebel units.

Following Qadhafih's failure last month to win the OAU Chairmanship, [6] the Libyan-backed rebels launched a series of attacks on northern and eastern Chadian cities. [7] To meet the immediate threat to the survival of the Government of Chad, France rushed military assistance to Habre, and Zaire initially provided several Macchi aircraft and about 250 men for rear area security. Zaire has now sent several Mirage aircraft and another 700 men, and they have said they may deploy a total of 1,800–2,000.

The President has made available to Chad up to $10 million in defense articles and services, some of which will facilitate the introduction and support of Zaire's forces in defense of its beleaguered fellow African state. The use of this special authority by the President is necessary given the immediacy and character of the threat, and the inability of the Government of Chad to acquire the essential material through its own means. Failure to have taken the emergency action would have involved the grave risk of allowing Libya to reestablish a pliable regime in N'Djamena and to use Chad as a base for subverting neighboring states.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. There is an insurgency in Chad, and it is being helped by the Libyans who have, among other things, conducted bombing raids on Faya Largeau, a city about which there is a fight going on. So there are a number of things taking place, including concern by ourselves and the French.

MR. MONROE. Have Libyan troops gone into Chad?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. That's a question. Certainly, their planes have overflown Chad, and we have reports of some Libyans there, yes.

MR. MONROE. The United States has appeared to be encouraging the French Government to send direct air support, planes, and French pilots to help the Chad Government. The French say this morning they are not going to do that.[10] Is the United States disappointed in that French attitude?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The French have to decide what they are going to do. It is an area of prime concern to them, being a former French colony; and of course, all of the Francophone countries of Africa are watching the situation. We are in close consultation with the French, and I'm sure that they will exercise their responsibilities properly.

Letter From President Reagan to the Speaker of the House of Representatives (O'Neill), August 8, 1983[11]

Deployment of U.S. Aircraft To Assist Chad

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: In recent weeks, the Government of Chad has requested the Governments of France and the United States to assist in its self defense against armed aggression by Libyan forces and Libyan-supported insurgents in Chad. As you have been informed, in response to these requests I have directed that various forms of material assistance be provided to the Government of Chad[12] and other friendly governments assisting it in dealing with this Libyan aggression. In further response to the urgent requirements of these governments to counter this aggression, I have now directed the deployment of certain U.S. aircraft to the region to be available for the purpose of collecting and providing essential information, including surveillance data and early warning. In accordance with my desire that the Congress be kept informed on this matter, and consistent with Section 4 of the War Powers Resolution,[13] I am hereby providing a report on the deployment and mission of these U.S. Armed Forces.

On August 7, 1983, two Airborne Warning and Control Systems (AWACS) E3A and eight F-15 (Eagle) all-weather fighter aircraft with air and ground logistical support forces began to arrive in Sudan. These forces will be available to operate in close coordination with the Government of Chad and other friendly governments assisting it. The mission of the F-15 aircraft, which are equipped for combat, is to be prepared to provide pro-

It is not possible at this time to predict the precise duration of this deployment of U.S. Armed Forces in the region. They will remain for only a limited period to meet the urgent requirements posed by the present situation. I will keep the Congress informed as to further developments with respect to this situation.

This deployment of the U.S. Armed Forces is being undertaken pursuant to my constitutional authority with respect to the conduct of foreign relations and as Commander-in-Chief of the United States Armed Forces. I believe that this action will support the objective of helping to preserve the territorial integrity, sovereignty, and political independence of Chad.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN

U.S., African, and French Support for Chad

Libya's forces are centrally involved in the fighting in Chad. In fact, if it were not for Libya's forces—both through advisers and combat elements and air power—there wouldn't be the kind of fighting that we are seeing in Chad.

The precise numbers in a situation like this are hard to come by but our estimate is that there are 1,500–2,000 Libyan troops in Chad, and that this represents a significant increase over the number present in the weeks before the rebel attack on Faya Largeau. There is no question that the Libyan troops are there, including mechanized units. Nor is there any question of repeated Libyan air attacks against various northern centers including Faya Largeau. We have reports that the Libyan troops and Libyan-supported rebels besieging Faya Largeau have a substantial number of Libyan armored vehicles and heavy artillery for bombardment, and that their air attacks have included both bombs and napalm. We consider the situation at Faya Largeau serious and threatening. The Libyan Government seems to be seeking to portray what's happening in Chad as a civil conflict, and to portray the Government of Chad as not having legitimacy. The fact of the matter is that the Organization of African Unity has recognized the legitimacy of the Habre government. The most recent OAU statement was one issued in mid-July by the OAU Summit bureau calling for an end to foreign interference and appealing for a cease-fire. [15] There is no question in the eyes of the OAU and the majority of African states that Habre's is the legitimate government. Libya would like to have it otherwise. Libya would like to overturn that government and substitute its surrogate as the Government of Chad. Were this to happen, if Qadhafi were able to set up an established government simply by using its overwhelming military might to do so, that this would have consequences beyond the borders of Chad.

Our view is that we have provided limited materiel support for the Government of Chad. We have done so in the context of other African support for that government, and in a far larger French effort. In all of our contacts, we have no information to suggest that in fact France has changed its position on support of Chad. A French statement over the weekend was subsequently clarified in Paris, [16] and we understand the French position to be that they will make appropriate decisions in light of the situation in Chad. We are operating in the context of African and

"I Don't See Any Situation That Would Call for Military Intervention by the United States [in Chad]"

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. President, how far are you willing to go militarily to save Chad from falling into the hands of the rebels backed by Libya?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, Helen [Helen Thomas, United Press International], [18] Chad, actually, you might say, is in a sphere of interest of the French. France, because of its historic relationship with that area, has made it plain that they consider this their principal place. We're in consultation with them and we have, in answer to request, provided weapons and some trainers in the use of those weapons.

We are, at the same time now, because of the concern of all the northern African States there, or the central African States about the Libyan intervention—Qadhafi and his adventuring down there have them all concerned, and for that reason, many of the African States are providing troops. We have volunteered to some of them to aid in the transportation of those troops, but we're not in any way in line for participating militarily other than that.

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. President, would the United States allow Chad to fall to Qadhafi and the Libyans rather than intervene?

THE PRESIDENT. As I've said before, it's not our primary sphere of influence; it is that of France. We remain in constant consultation with them, but I don't see any situation that would call for military intervention by the United States there.

Statement by the Deputy Representative at the United Nations (Lichenstein) in the U.N. Security Council, August 11, 1983 (Extracts) [19]

Denunciation of Libya's "Unprovoked Aggression" Against Chad

Mr. President, the Security Council today is confronted with a most grave threat to international peace and security and a brazen, contemptuous challenge to the bedrock principles of the U.N. Charter. This threat, this challenge, comes primarily from one source—and let there be no doubt on this score. Libya is engaged in open, flagrant, unprovoked aggression against the legitimate government of the sovereign nation of Chad. Libyan ground and air forces have invaded Chad. These forces, with Libyan tanks, Libyan aircraft, and Libyan artillery, attacked and overwhelmed the key military outpost of Faya Largeau. That town has been subjected to vicious bombardment by Libyan war planes manned by Libyan pilots—indiscriminate bombardment with napalm and high explosives on both civilian and military targets.

This is Libya's war. It is Libya that is guilty of aggression. It is Libya that stands in contemptuous disregard of its obligations under the Charter. And one more basic fact that must be confronted, Mr. President: In this assault on the very concept of nonuse of force in the reconciliation of differences among states, the outlaw regime of Muammar Qadhafi is supported, supplied, and encouraged by a Permanent Member of this Council, by the Soviet Union.

And now, Mr. President, the Soviet Union joins Libya in an attempt to obfuscate the clear issue we must confront—the fact of Libyan aggression against Chad—with a smokescreen of patently diversionary countercharges. They allege U.S. intervention, U.S. interference in the affairs of African nations. And so it is necessary, as a first order of business, to sort out these various issues even as we keep our principal focus on the overriding issue of Libyan expansionism.

One of the peripheral issues, injected into the debate as a deliberate diversion, is that of joint training exercises in the Middle East in which U.S. forces will be engaged along with those of several other nations (even I might note as the Soviets and Libyans engage in such exercises—as recently, indeed, as June 30–July 4 of this year). These exercises have absolutely nothing to do with the events we confront in Chad, as the Libyans and Soviets know perfectly well, and as the U.S. Government made perfectly clear in its letter of July 22, 1983, addressed to the President of the Security Council and reiterated in its letter dated yesterday and circulated as a document of the Security Council (S/15919). [20] I quote from that letter:

"The purposes and scope of these joint exercises are clearly set forth in my letter to you, contained in Document S/15887 of 22 July 1983, [21] and in advance announcements by several of the Governments whose forces are participating in the exercises. These training exercises threaten no one, are wholly defensive in nature, do not involve contested land or sea space, and are entirely consistent with international law and the United Nations Charter.

"The United States unequivocally states that the exercises pose no threat to the security of any country in the African/Middle Eastern region, and that the exercises are not a response to any other situation or activity which may be taking place in any neighboring country or countries.

"These exercises were scheduled and planned before Libya launched its invasion of Chad with ground and air forces. No amount of obfuscation on the part of Libya can disguise the fact that Libyan conspiracies, threats, and aggressions against its neighbors—now graphically demonstrated by Libyan armored battalions and warplanes operating deep within the territory of Chad—have upset the peace and security of the region."

A second issue intended simply and solely to divert attention from Libyan aggression is that of alleged U.S. intervention in northern Africa, as charged in a tandem of complaints by Libya and the Soviet Union earlier this week. The U.S. Government also has replied to these utter fabrications in a letter to the President of the Security Council dated yesterday, August 10, 1983, and circulated as a Security Council document (S/15920) [22] from which I wish to quote:

"The statements contained in these two documents are clearly designed to divert attention from the fact that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya itself bears the primary responsibility for tension and conflict in Chad and the surrounding area. It has been conclusively demonstrated that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya is engaged in the unlawful use of armed force against the territorial integrity and political independence of Chad. Over an extended period, aircraft of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya have conducted an intensive campaign of bombing cities in Chad using incendiary as well as conventional bombs. Units of the Army of Security Council President Barre de Nanteuil indicating that military exercises involving the United States and other countries in the eastern Mediterranean were planned and scheduled before the Libyan invasion of Chad.

[21] Reference is to U.N. document S/15887, dated July 27, 1983. Ambassador Kirkpatrick's letter of July 22, 1983, to U.N. Security Council President Ling Qing indicated that military exercises in the eastern Mediterranean were held at the invitation of the host governments and had been publicly announced.

the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya have penetrated deeply into Chad and are now engaged in offensive military action against armed forces of Chad.

"These Libyan forces have been equipped by the Soviet Union with highly sophisticated military equipment, including aircraft, helicopters, tanks, armored personnel carriers, missiles and artillery which is being used against military targets and civilian populations in Chad.

"The United States and other concerned countries have responded to this unlawful use of force. At the request of the Government of Chad, a country with a very limited, purely defensive military capacity, the United States has provided logistical support and assistance in monitoring the situation to aid in its struggle to defend itself against the unprovoked acts of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. The Council should be aware that we are dealing with a case of aggression by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya which constitutes a major threat to the peace and security of the region.

"All of the actions of the United States have been designed to assist the Government of Chad to exercise its inherent right of self-defense. These actions are wholly consistent with international law and the United Nations Charter."

Now, Mr. President, let us return to the realm of harsh reality—to the factual record of Libyan aggression against Chad, which is and must remain our primary focus today, as it also constitutes the sole present threat in that region to peace and security.

On June 24 of this year, Libyan-supported rebel forces led by Goukouni Oueddei captured the key outpost of Faya Largeau from the army of Chad, led by its President, Hissene Habre. The town of Abeche fell to rebel forces on July 8th. But then, to Libya's apparent consternation, the Army of Chad recaptured Faya Largeau on July 30 (as it had retaken Abeche on July 12)—and it was this dramatic turnabout that sparked a sudden escalation of Libyan involvement in Chad, which was extensive before that battle and has been critical to the insurgents all along. Since August of last year, Libya had been building up the insurgent forces of Goukouni, principally at a training base at the town of Sebha in Libya.

Elements of 15 Libyan battalions have been active in northern Chad, going back to last August. These include commando, mechanized infantry, armed reconnaissance, artillery, and tank battalions. The artillery that was used with such devastating effect in June in the battle of Faya Largeau, for example, was manned by Libyans.

The insurgents have been massively armed with new and sophisticated Soviet equipment by Libya. Almost everything the insurgents have, from heavy artillery to shoes to food, has been provided by Libya.

Insurgent administration, logistics, and operational planning have all been under the authority of the Libyan commander at Sebha.

During the last 2 weeks in July, just before the recapture by the armed forces of Chad of Faya Largeau, several Libyan units were dispatched to Ounianga Kabir and Ogoui, both located in northern Chad but well to the south of the contested Aouzou Strip—in the territory of Chad, that is to say, even by Libya's own definition—to permit the insurgents, with Libyan advisers, to concentrate on Faya Largeau. Libyan transport aircraft in this period made daily flights to Faya Largeau with arms and supplies. But at this point in the campaign Libya had not yet committed major ground forces, on a scale comparable to the 7,000 to 9,000 Libyan troops sent to Chad in 1980 (and then withdrawn in 1981). Apparently the Libyans thought Goukouni would win without them.

The immediate Libyan reaction to the retaking of Faya Largeau on July 30 was bombing raids on Faya, using Soviet-supplied SU-22 ground attack aircraft from the Libyan airbase near the town of Aouzou in the Aouzou Strip. On this day there was a squadron of SU-22s at Aouzou airbase, as well as several SF-260 attack aircraft and Soviet-supplied MI-24 attack helicopters. In the initial attacks the SU-22s used napalm, cluster bombs, and high-explosive bombs, and concentrated their attacks on the center of Faya Largeau. There were comparable air attacks virtually every day after July 30 until Faya Largeau fell on August 10th.

On August 1st, SF-260 attack planes and MI-24s were moved to airfields at Ounianga Kabir and Ogoui in northern Chad, much closer to the front. During the night of August 1-2, two Mirage F-1s flew sorties over Faya Largeau, dropping both napalm and high-explosive bombs.

The attacks continued throughout this first week of August, carried out by SU-22s, TU-22s, and (for nighttime raids) Mirage F-1s. During the night of August 2-3, three F-1s were employed; on the night of August 3-4, four F-1s. The first wave of SU-22s at dawn on August 3 dropped no fewer than 48 bombs—and on that same day the government forces brought down their first SU-22, whose Libyan pilot was captured and has since confirmed that the air attacks—using napalm—were carried out by Libyan planes, flown by Libyan pilots, operating under Libyan command.

Meanwhile, at the Sebha and Kufra barracks in southern Libya, artillery and armored convoys were formed and began moving into Chad. An entire Libyan mechanized infantry battalion was sent to Ogoui on July 31, and another had arrived there by August 4, with more than 30 armored personnel carriers and both T-54 and T-55 tanks. As we meet here today, upwards of 2,500 or 3,000 Libyan troops have overwhelmed and now occupy Faya Largeau in this Libyan war against its neighbor Chad.

These are the plain, grim, undeniable facts, Mr. President. They constitute the tangible scenario of open and unprovoked Libyan aggression that mocks the Charter of the United Nations. And the message seems clear to my government: If that aggression is permitted to go unpunished, then this Council is revealed as impotent and Qadhafi's brutal "new colonialism" will threaten even more urgently the security of northern and north-central Africa.

. . . . . .

What then is to be done? The immediate, urgent requirements are simple enough to state:

First, the unprovoked, flagrant aggression of Libya must be labeled for what it is—a direct challenge to the Charter of this institution and a grave threat to international peace and security.

Second, there must be an end—now, today—to this latest in the longstanding pattern of Libyan lawlessness, by whatever appropriate means are available to the Government of Chad and to those nations in Africa and elsewhere which have responded to that government's appeal for help.

With an end to Libyan aggression, the enduring problems of this embattled nation can be addressed in a reasonable way, in a spirit of reconciliation that will promote international peace and security.

With an end to Libyan aggression, all things are possible. As long as this lawless behavior continues, it must be condemned and it must and will be vigorously opposed.

U.S. Consultations With France Regarding AWACS Planes Deployed to Sudan

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. Secretary, the French have been putting out an interesting line about lack of consultation from the United States on the deployment of our AWACS to Sudan. [24] If we didn't consult with them, why did you decide to send those planes over there or have we had some consultation?

A. We decided to send them over there because the French indicated they wanted them. I think possibly Paris has the same problem Washington does; there are many voices that are all labeled the "French." We had talked with various military people, Minister of Defense, and various other people in the Ministry of Defense and there was a clear indication that if they should want or commit their air force for counter activities to the Libyans and to protect the Chadians who were being attacked by the Libyan Air Force, that they would need some intelligence, some monitoring and we responded to that and got our AWACS in position to do that very quickly. We did it within 20 hours and they are there and they are ready should they be called on. They have not been called on but there was full consultation with the French Government and the French Government, I think, is satisfied as to that point. But there are some people who are saying there wasn't consultation.

Q. Did they say they were going to send in their air force—is there some confusion?

A. No, I don't think there's any confusion. The possibility of their using their air force to protect the Chadians and Zairians and others who are helping the Chad Army, was expressed, was discussed and we talked with them about it and they did indicate that they would need some additional intelligence capability and were the AWACS available. The AWACS are not only available; they're there ready should they be called on.

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. Secretary, when you say that the French Government was consulted, I got the impression from what you said a little earlier on that the consultations were at the Defense Ministry-U.S. Defense Department military level. Were these consultations at a higher level, say with their Foreign Minister?

A. Here they were, in the United States. My understanding is they were in France, but they certainly were here.

Statement Read by Department of State Acting Spokesman (Romberg), August 23, 1983 [25]

U.S. Withdrawal of AWACS Aircraft From Sudan

We continue to monitor closely the situation in Chad and to cooperate with concerned friends and allies on the dangers posed by the Libyan aggression against that country. Our assessment of the current situation is that, for the immediate future, we need not keep our Air Force assets deployed in Sudan. After consultations with concerned governments, the United States has therefore decided to begin redeploying the aircraft and personnel to the United States. Nonetheless, as was demonstrated by the deployment, appropriate assets can be rapidly moved to the area should the situation warrant.

The AWACS were deployed to Sudan August 7 after consultations with the Governments of Chad, Sudan, and France to perform a monitoring role should that become necessary. We believe the deployment clearly demonstrated U.S. concern over the events in Chad. It also demonstrated once again the close ties between the United States and its friends and the ability of the United States to respond quickly and appropriately when circumstances dictate.

The United States has expressed its appreciation to Sudan for its assistance in this operation in response to overt Libyan military aggression in Chad. In this context we have also reaffirmed our concern for Sudan's security in the face of Libya's military intervention in Chad. We are continuing our $25 million emergency assistance program to Chad.

We are continuing to work with the Government of Chad, and other concerned governments, to effect the withdrawal of Libyan forces from Chad and to protect Chad's territorial integrity. There can be no doubt that regular Libyan Army units are occupying territory well within Chad's borders and that Libyan Air Force units have bombed Chad.

We are encouraged by the French deployment of substantial forces to Chad. The United States again condemns Libya's blatant act of aggression and affront to international order, and calls upon Libya to withdraw. The United States maintains its support for Chad's territorial integrity and sovereignty, and does not wish to see a resolution of the conflict resulting in a partition of Chad.

Statement by the Deputy Representative at the United Nations (Lichenstein) Before the U.N. Security Council, August 31, 1983 [26]

Failure of the U.N. Security Council To Act on Chad's Complaint Against Libya

Mr. President, and so, exactly 28 days since we heard the massively documented complaint of the sole legitimate Government of Chad against the flagrant aggression of Libya, fully 4 weeks since we listened to the appeal of Chad for urgent help in combatting that aggression, this Council meets one more time—and for what reason? To affirm its fundamental irrelevance to the realities of international gangsterism, to admit its utter futility as an effective instrument of international peace and security.

Indeed, Mr. President, this is not a proud day for the United Nations Security Council. The losers in the proceedings of this past month are many. There is of course the Security Council itself which has been cynically manipulated—and worse, which has permitted itself to be cynically manipulated. There is the United Nations Charter which has been so contemptuously violated. There is that group within the Council which has been throughout an entire month of negotiation the victim of the most radical among its members. And again, what is worse is that this group has been a willing victim, and that the negotiations have been dishonest from the beginning: Every concession by the honorable and the reasonable has been frustrated by yet another nonnegotiable demand by the extremists—encouraged from within the Council's permanent membership, we do not for one moment doubt, by Libya's great benefactor and protector, the Soviet Union.

It is tempting, if only for the sake of symmetry, to balance off losers with winners—and thus to credit Libya with a victory for its naked, unprovoked aggression. But to draw any such conclusion from the charade of the last month in the Security Council—and let there be not a moment's doubt on this score either—to draw any such conclusion would be a very, very great mistake. For there were some, among this Council's own membership, who did not wait for the Council or rely on the Council to respond to the urgent appeal of Chad. There were those who realized that aggression had to be deterred, who accepted their obligation under the Charter indeed to help Chad defend itself, who were prepared to make that commitment. My government was one of those. Zaire was another. France was a third. Our commitment to the freedom and independence of Chad is strong and tangible—and, we would urge the aggressor and those who encourage aggression to pay particular heed: that commitment continues.

There are we believe other winners in this process, however contemptible its outcome to date may be. Chad surely is one. Its posture throughout has been courageous and dignified. Its spokesmen have treated the lies and the invective of Libya with the quiet contempt they deserve. Zaire also has been a winner—in its immediate, powerful response to Chad's appeal for help, and (in concert with the representative of Togo) [27] in its genuine search for consensus within the Council's nonaligned group. The fact that this effort was unavailing, that indeed it never had a chance of success in view of the prevailing cynicism and the deliberate manipulation of the Council's consultative process—well, none of this reflects discredit on either Zaire or Togo.

[27] Atsu-Koffi Amega.

We believe there has been another clear and significant signal given in the course of the Council's consideration of Chad's complaint: and that is the virtually unanimous voice of Chad's African neighbors in condemnation of Libyan aggression and in courageous support of the Government of Chad, the government of President Hissene Habre. It was an impressive display of adherence to the principles that are supposed to impel this Organization to effective action, and of a clear-eyed realism that not to oppose aggression is quite simply to incite more, and more flagrant, aggression—graver threats to international peace and security, closer and closer to home.

Mr. President, if ever there was a documented case of unprovoked aggression, that was it. We cannot conceive of a situation in which the aggressor was more unmistakably identified. Equally, we find it impossible to imagine an appeal more meritorious than that addressed to us—on August the third—by Chad.

By the very same token, our response should have been unequivocal and immediate. On August the fourth we should have been prepared to vote on a resolution that condemned Libyan aggression, that demanded the cessation of fighting and the immediate withdrawal of Libyan forces from the territory of Chad—thus clearing the way for Chad to reconcile its own internal differences, to control its own destiny as a free and independent nation, utilizing the good offices of the Organization of African Unity or possibly of the United Nations itself in this effort of self-determination.

Would such a resolution have succeeded? Almost surely not. But such a resolution would keep faith with the mandate of the Charter—and would serve one very important purpose additionally: It would identify for all the world to see those who reject the use of force as an instrument of international relations, and those who not only condone the use of force but even support and encourage it.

As I have said already, Mr. President, the absence of such a resolution makes this far from a proud day for this Council and for this world Organization. But, more than that, it is a day of the gravest danger—and particularly for those small and relatively defenseless nations, like Chad, which are the actual or the intended or the potential victims of aggression.

In a very important sense, the United States does not need the United Nations—certainly not for its protection or its defense. But for many nations around the world, particularly those which constitute the nonaligned group within this Council, an appeal to the United Nations may represent its ultimate and essential recourse. Universal adherence to the principles of the Charter may be its only guarantee against the adventurism of a Qadhafi or against global imperialism—imperfect, yes, but the best this imperfect world has yet been able to devise.

The inherent authority of this approximation of a world community is not, however, self-enforcing. It requires the courage of the Member States' avowed convictions, and the will to resist aggression, and the willingness to stand up and be counted.

We must therefore pose this question: By their inability or unwillingness to act, by their readiness to be victimized and manipulated, by their contribution to the undermining of the effectiveness of this Council and of the United Nations generally, are the members of the Security Council helping to arm their own executioners?

We are appalled by the answer that, so far, this proceeding appears to provide.

Presidential Discussions With Sudan

THE PRESIDENT. It's been an honor and a pleasure to welcome President Nimeiri

President Reagan spoke at 1:21 p.m. to reporters at the South Portico of the White House. Earlier, the two Presidents met in the Oval Office and held a working luncheon, together with U.S. and Sudanese officials, in the State Dining Room. President Nimeiri visited Washington from November 19 to 22, 1983.

to Washington once again. President Nimeiri is a friend. Few can match his courage and foresight as a peacemaker in Africa and in the Middle East.

I place great value on his insights and wise counsel and appreciate this opportunity to speak with him directly. In our discussions, we found ourselves in basic agreement on critical issues in the Middle East and the Horn of Africa.

President Nimeiri and I reviewed efforts to find a solution to the conflict in Chad. We're agreed that the first step necessary to achieve that end is the withdrawal of Libyan forces from Chad. Likewise, we're of one mind on the need to support African countries threatened by Libyan-supported aggression.

We also discussed the urgent need to reach a just and comprehensive peace for the Middle East. A key to this is a settlement that would permit all states in the region to live in peace with secure borders, while at the same time protecting the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people.

I thanked President Nimeiri for his continued support of our current peace initiative.[29] On bilateral issues, I reaffirmed our willingness to help the Sudan meet the economic and military challenges that it faces. We applaud the Sudan's efforts to reinvigorate its private sector and reform governmental policies that hinder economic progress.

Economic development is of utmost importance to the people of the Sudan. And in this endeavor, the United States is happy to lend a hand to a friend.

President's Nimeiri's visit underlines the significant role that Sudan is playing in Africa and the Middle East. The people of America are proud to stand with the people of the Sudan as friends and partners for peace and progress.

PRESIDENT NIMEIRI. I would like to thank President Reagan for his invitation to me to come to visit once again the United States, and I would like to say to him that we are very pleased by our friendship to the people of the United States.

President Reagan and myself have discussed bilateral relations between our two countries, and reviewed ways and means to strengthen them. We are hoping that the important role played by the United States toward refugees will continue and expand at a time where we, in the Sudan, face and cater to ever-increasing numbers from our neighboring countries, especially Ethiopia.

In Africa, we have been—and still are—very concerned about the destabilization policies presented by Libya, and its intervention in the internal affairs of others. Libya is undermining the unity of Chad by invading and occupying its territory, and plotting against the unity and stability of the Sudan. Ethiopia and Libya are both playing a very dangerous role, and executing policies serving the interests of a superior power.

On the Middle East, the Sudan is fully committed to a just solution to the Palestinian problem. In this context, the Sudan stands firm behind the Fez resolution.[30] And it, also, supported the Reagan initiative as a step toward a more comprehensive solution. We deplore and regret the continued bloodshed in Lebanon, and call on all parties to save Lebanon and its independence.

We, also, condemn all policies and practices aimed at liquidating the PLO, and deplore the shedding of Arab blood by Arab hands.

Israel remains the cause of the problem in the Middle East. We call on President Reagan to exert his utmost to stop the Israeli expansion policy, and play the role becoming a great power that has such a great interest in the Arab world.

And we call, also, on the Soviet Union to assist in peace progress in the Middle East.

And thank you.

U.S. Concern With Sudan's Security

. . . . . .

Q. How serious does the administration view the military threat to the Sudan, specifically from Ethiopia and also from Libya?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I think the seriousness with which we view it is best reflected in the fact that twice during 1983 we have been directly supportive of Sudan when it has faced or been the neighbor of threats to Chad, particularly from the Libyan side.

The situation on the Ethiopian border ebbs and flows. There have been recently some warnings and some threats from the Ethiopian side of which we would, of course, take seriously. I wouldn't exaggerate the extent of any conflict or across-border activity at this point. But we obviously watch it closely, particularly in light of the fact that Ethiopia receives very substantial assistance in some of its own policies from the Libyans, including both advisors who come in from Libya as well as Libyan funding and hardware.

But I wouldn't want to overdramatize the situation that we face—that Sudan faces at present.

Yes?

Q. Is there—do you have any evidence of Ethiopian, Cuban, or Soviet support to the insurrection that seems to be building in the southern Sudan?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I think there's not too much question that there has been support channeled to Sudanese dissident groups that have gone across the border into Ethiopia. This involves both Ethiopians and Libyans.

Q. What about in Eritrea? Is there any evidence that the Sudan is still giving support to the EPLF government, the ELF against Ethiopia?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I think I might ask my colleague to address that question. I would just add a general word on it is that, I think, Sudan believes in a good-neighbor policy, has pretty consistently adhered to that point of view, and, of course, in the context of the many internal difficulties in Ethiopia and other countries, it has been a haven of receiving refugees from neighboring countries. There are a substantial number of refugees in Sudan. But I would look at that in a humanitarian context.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I would add to what my colleague said that one nation's insurgents are another nation's refugees. And Sudan has got one of the larger shares in the world of refugee populations—some 600,000, the majority of which come from across the border in Ethiopia.

. . . . . .

Q. What kind of assurances did President Reagan give President Nimeiri on U.S. support, should Libya or Ethiopia invade Sudan?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. It's really not necessary to give such assurances, because they are there publicly, to be seen, a matter of record. Twice this year, we have—in a moment of Sudan's need—come to the country's assistance. That kind of public performance is a very sufficient earnest of our willingess to stand by Sudan if it is overtly threatened by aggression without.

Q. Does that mean then the United States would permit [commit?] weapons and manpower to defend Sudan?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No, no, no. It doesn't mean that precisely at all. It means that Sudan understands that we will do—that we are concerned with its security and its stability. And how we do it, that is one of the things that we have a government for. They can come up with lots of different recipes, lots of different approaches to assure that. You have seen a couple of the solutions that we have come to on that point already this year.

E. Horn of Africa

Document 591

Prepared Statement by the Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs (Crocker) Before a Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, April 27, 1983 [1]

U.S. Policy Toward the Horn of Africa

The Horn of Africa is an area of substantial and growing interest to the United States. Its proximity to the Middle East and the shipping lanes to the Persian Gulf give it strategic importance and a role in our efforts to improve our ability to project power in southwest Asia. We have formal military access agreements with Kenya and Somalia. [2] These strategic interests increase our concern over the stability and political orientation of the states of the region. At the same time, the region remains an area of significant humanitarian concern to us, having one of the largest concentrations of refugees in Africa and conditions of poverty and instability which create great human suffering.

The region is beset by serious political and economic problems. Somali irredentism has led to three wars in two decades involving Somalia, Ethiopia and Kenya, including a major Somali invasion of eastern Ethiopia in 1977–78. At the time of this invasion, made possible by large scale Soviet arms supplies to Somalia, Moscow switched sides and opted for massive infusions of Soviet aid and Cuban troops on the Ethiopian side. In return for their help, the Soviets have acquired access to naval and air facilities in Ethiopia. A large Soviet bloc presence remains in Ethiopia, including some 11,000 Cuban troops. The Ethiopian Government continues to pursue military solutions to serious internal dissidence or insurgency in parts of Ethiopia, with adverse consequences for stability in the region as a whole.

Since 1977–78 the balance of military power in the region has shifted dramatically in Ethiopia's favor. Ethiopia now has the largest standing army in sub-Saharan Africa. Unfortunately, Ethiopia has recently used this strength to destabilize some of its neighbors. The signing of a tripartite pact in August 1981 between Ethiopia, Libya, and South Yemen [3] was soon followed by a campaign of terrorist and guerrilla attacks from Ethiopian territory against Sudan and Somalia. More recently, in the summer of 1982 Ethiopian forces accompanied by smaller numbers of Somali dissidents seized and occupied salients around two towns along the disputed Ethiopian-Somali border. Ethiopian troops still occupy those salients. The Somali dissidents involved in the incursions were trained and armed by the Ethiopians with considerable Libyan help, as have been Sudanese dissidents being directed against Sudan.

I should stress that our own activities in the area, including our acquisition of access rights in Kenya and Somalia, are not directed at any states in the region. Our strategic interests in the Horn of Africa are strictly corollary to our broader interests in southwest Asia and the Indian Ocean, and our military activity in the Horn, including our acquisition of access rights in Kenya and Somalia, is directed at protecting these larger interests. We harbor no hostility toward Ethiopia, a nation with which we have a history of long and close ties even if we have had differences in recent years; we recognize and fully support the sovereignty and territorial integrity of all the states of this region, including Ethiopia. We have, furthermore, stated our strong support for the OAU principle of respect for borders and made clear our opposition to any Somali claims on Ethiopian or Kenyan territory or any Somalia military activity across the generally recognized borders of those countries. Consistent with the views of Congress we have made clear that U.S. military assistance to Somalia is provided with an understanding that Somalia will not send its military units into Ethiopian territory. Somalia has in fact moved to improve its relations with Kenya, and recently President Siad announced that Somalia had no territorial claims against its neighbors.

Tensions, mistrust, and deep-seated historical animosities still threaten peace between Somalia and Ethiopia. In this context, we are obviously and legitimately concerned about the stability of our friends in this region, and our emergency airlift of military equipment to Somalia following the Ethiopian incursions last summer should demonstrate that we are quite prepared to support our friends when they are threatened.

Given the level of Soviet military support to Ethiopia, it is a practical impossibility to create a balance of military power on the Horn through assistance to our friends. It would take over a century of our aid at the rate of the past 2 fiscal years for Somalia to match Ethiopia in military hardware. It would also be an unwise use of our own and our friends' resources to fuel a regional arms race, and thus perhaps renewed or even escalated conflict, in the Horn. But we must and will take the steps necessary to provide Somalia and Sudan with a basic capability to defend themselves against the types of conventional attack Somalia experienced last summer and Sudan almost experienced this February, and the guerrilla harassment both have faced since early last year.

We fully recognize, however, that there are no military solutions to the problems of the Horn. Only negotiated settlements can resolve the underlying tensions that have long troubled this region. The United States stands ready to contribute to such a resolution. We have already from time to time provided our good offices to Somalia and Kenya as they have begun trying to improve their relations. We are prepared to help the Ethiopians and the Somalis find a way out of the seemingly intractable conflict between the two, if such an opportunity arises. We do not believe that a solution would be easy, but it is essential for the long-term stability and prosperity of the region that the nations involved find a way out of the drain and diversion of their resources that this conflict represents.

The economic difficulties of the region may in the long run be just as dangerous as the political conflicts. Sudan has a debt service ratio of over 100 percent and is facing severe economic difficulties. We are working with a group of other concerned countries and the international financial institutions to help Sudan through what is going to be a very rough couple of years. Kenya as well is facing serious problems of structural imbalance and economic deterioration; we have been participating with a number of Kenya's other friends in an effort to help Kenya's economic adjustment.

Somalia is one of the poorest countries in the world in terms of natural resources, and long suffered from misdirected economic policies, but it has recently been making remarkable progress under a series of economic reforms started in 1981 and an IMF program. A study done in 1982 by respected development economist Eliot Berg found that the Somali economy in general and particularly the export-oriented private livestock and agriculture sectors were experiencing an energetic recovery and have the potential for considerable further improvement. The IMF is pleased with Somali compliance with the criteria of its program, and the IBRD is now working with Somalia to prepare for the first meeting of a Consultative Group in October. Nevertheless, Somalia still faces pressure on its balance of payments and foreign exchange reserves, still needs to pursue its program of economic reforms if it is to continue its recent record of recovery, and in both processes requires the close cooperation and support of its friends.

What we are looking at, then, is a broadly based, fairly complex strategy moving along several tracks at once. We are trying to bolster the security of our friends both in a military and an economic sense, and probe for openings for movement toward some resolution of the conflicts which plague this region.

The resources we are seeking are appropriate and necessary to this strategy; we are, in fact, trying to do a great deal with very little. For this coming year, for example, we are asking for $40 million in MAP for Somalia; this is not an arbitrary doubling of last year's figure, but an attempt to deal more realistically with what it will take to give Somalia a plausible capability to defend its borders. $40 million is still relatively little, however. At this level it would take more than 50 years of spending before we could approximate what the Ethiopians have received from the Soviets in the last 5 years.

The major thrust of our assistance efforts, however, is not military but economic. Two-thirds of our aid to Somalia is economic. More than two-thirds of our aid to Sudan and Kenya is economic. We are well aware that the most serious threat to these countries is from the disruption that could be caused by economic decline and crisis.

Obviously, in the Horn of Africa we are faced with a thicket of intertwined problems. Some are more urgent than others, but all are serious. We are taking a careful, comprehensive, integrated approach in coordination with our allies and other interested regional states. Our objectives are improved stability and security for our friends over the near term, an improved economic situation over the middle term, and over the longer term, the resolution of the underlying economic and political problems of the region.

U.S. Assistance to Ethiopia

MR. MCPHERSON. Thank you. Nice to see all of you again.

The policy of this administration, and indeed of the U.S. Government, for many, many years, has been to respond to disasters without regard to the politics of the government of the country involved.

I think it's very clear that a hungry child knows no politics, and so such a humanitarian response to the people as opposed to the government is exactly the right policy.

The situation in Ethiopia is one that has concerned us for some time. There is a very large area of the country which has been drought-striken for some time now. The numbers of the people affected are unclear.

UNDRO, when it issued its appeal a couple months ago, its initial appeal, concrete appeal for relief, talked in terms of 3 million people in the area that was affected by drought and some 1 million which were in danger. There has been, of course, quite a lot of discussion about those figures and the facts are that nobody really knows exactly how many people are in Ethiopia, let alone how many people are in danger.

In any case, it's clear that there's a very serious drought in the area, a life-threatening drought, and one that obviously must be dealt with. Rains have come to some parts of the area, and there is at least some growth, we know, but in any case there's going to be a lack of food at least for the rest of this year and probably on into 1984.

What has the U.S. response been to this? So far in fiscal year 1983, we have responded with some $6.7 million dollars of food. Four million dollars of this was in direct response to the drought. This food has been food that the United States could uniquely supply, so-called fortified, enriched foods, particularly soy-fortified sorghum grits and corn-soy milk.

What is involved here is that when a person is under-nutritioned, has serious nutritional or health problems as a result of lack of food, that this enriched food can fairly quickly, much more quickly than other sorts of food, bring that person back to a more healthy state. Other donors have not had this sort of food available in their usual donor program, so it seemed especially appropriate for the U.S. Government to supply this.

We have supplied the needs, as defined by a couple different groups, for this kind of food and that has been basically the $4 million that we have given for a total amount of food so far in 1983 of $6.7 million.

In addition, there has been some feeding of refugees that have fled Ethiopia into Sudan, on the Sudan side of the border. Additional food which we have provided, which we've announced, is a continuation of a feeding program going on into 1984 of $3 million more. This is a mother/child feeding program which we have had there for a few years.

Mother Teresa, for example, has a mother/child feeding program in the capital, and is part of that $3 million. There had been consideration of whether that on-going feeding program, at least all of it, would be continued at the levels that it has been but it was clear to us, upon carefully reviewing this whole matter, that the drought was so severe in affecting virtually all parts of the society and country in one fashion or the other that we should continue to do so.

A major issue in Ethiopia, in connection with the drought, has been transportation of the food. It is agreed by almost all parties at this time that there is enough food within the borders of Ethiopia to deal with this problem.

Much of the food, however, is in the ports of Ethiopia—here, here; there along the Red Sea. (Indicating on map.) They've had difficulty getting the food out of the ports. At this time, for example, a major bridge that needs to be crossed to take food into the country is now destroyed, as well as there have been some operational problems.

There haven't been allocated, or aren't enough trucks to bring the food in, for example. Let me get back to that in a moment. So there's been a request to the world by UNDRO once more to supply some of this transportation need.

I announced a couple of days ago that we would be providing some $700,000, most of it for transportation and management of our transportation,[8] and that we are working with the Catholic Relief Service to manage this component. Much of our transportation money will, in fact, go to transport our food.

There was a debate, a discussion really, to the donor community as to how that transportation money should be provided. There was some possibility that we might actually provide trucks. Trucks are physically difficult to immediately move in. They can't just sort of drop from the sky, at least not easily. We have had some people over there looking at this very carefully and felt that there were trucks around to rent. What we are going to have Catholic Relief Service do is have cash available to, in effect, rent vehicles on the spot.

The transportation thing is complicated, frankly, by coordination within the country and by, it would appear, the Ethiopian Government not allocating vehicles to this whole need that they could, I mentioned a moment ago the clogging of the ports.

There was a huge shipment in of cement which seemed to be given priority to truck into the country over having trucks being used to transport some of this food. We think, in short, and I believe in all candidness, that much of the donor community feels that the Ethiopian Government could do a good deal better in allocating the vehicles that it has at its disposal for this transportation.

I might note that while the West has done a substantial amount—for example, the West has, in total, supplied some $3½ million for transportation, about half a million of that being the United States. We don't know of transportation that the Russians have supplied. Frankly, it's pretty clear that the Soviets could be doing a great deal more than what they are.

Q. What was the Western total?

A. Three-and-a-half-million dollars. It could be doing a great deal more than they are, and we urge that both the Soviets come up to their responsibilities in this area as well as the Ethiopians in doing a better job of allocating the resources that they have available to them.

This gets to my last point, and really the principal announcement of a new effort, of an additional effort that we're putting into this. Our assessment is that what needs to take place to move this thing along, to get this job done, is stronger coordination on the ground.

We've gone through, of course, a number of disasters over the years and have pretty good experience as to what it takes to make these things work. One of the clear lessons is that you need someone on the ground who really coordinates, who coordinates the various donors' inputs and who can give regular and clear information as to what is needed where.

UNDRO, historically, has not been an operational agency. Their function has been to define need and lay out the need to the world and ask the world to come in and do it. For the first time ever, very recently, UNDRO took the responsibility in Chad to coordinate the donors' responses to the drought and the war situation there, and did a very, very good job.

This afternoon, accordingly, I've sent to Geneva, where UNDRO is located, a telegram asking them to take the lead of not only setting out to the world what the general problem is but to actually have people on the ground to coordinate this. That telegram to UNDRO, as well as the same telegram informing our fellow donors, will be available today.

That is the general situation. I think it might be of interest to you as well that there is a very severe drought in several parts of southern Africa. It goes across here (indicating) from Mozambique up into Tanzania, across into Angola surely, and several places down here. Zimbabwe, as an example, which has traditionally been a major exporter to the region of corn, is not in a position to export this year because of the problem and, indeed, has got some severe drought problems in areas of its own.

Because of that, a few weeks ago—perhaps many of you know—a few weeks ago we have allocated some $25 million as a reserve to respond to that drought, [6] and this fiscal year, to date, we have actually apportioned some $9 million. That being another example of our policy—the long-term U.S. policy that I mentioned a moment ago—of the United States responding to need without regard to our relationship to countries. Nine million dollars, for example, went to Mozambique in the last fiscal year. In fact, that was over and above that $25 million, a part of it.

We have a number of problems; Africa has a number of problems, and we continue to track those needs and respond carefully to them as best we can.

We have a responsibility, obviously, to be certain that the food we deliver to the country, or goods we provide, actually are used by the people who need them. These are fairly tumultuous situations, and often it's hard to be certain that the food actually gets to the needy person. So sometimes it takes a little work in advance before we appropriate or allocate the monies.

Q. How do you deal with the problem in a country at war? Most likely, the last person to starve will be the soldier.

A. There's no question that that historically is true—that soldiers usually eat, and even when other people may be in very bad condition. We have to be certain, as best we can, with the food that we provide, that there is not a diversion of our food.

We have a pretty good record of preventing that, but it's only because we are elaborately careful. There's no substitute to having people on the ground watching and caring for it.

Our long relationship with the Catholic Relief Services and their ability to handle this kind of thing is why we've gone to them. But it's also why we've to sort through this whole problem for a little while.

Some of you may remember a few months ago there was a story, first in the European press and then our press, that some of the food that was being then provided by European donors had been di-

[6] The Department of State announced on June 10, 1983, that the United States would send $25 million in emergency food aid to drought-stricken African countries.

verted to the Ethiopian military. And apparently in the end that story was inaccurate, but it appears to be. We don't have a full backup on that, but the facts are that it's the kind of thing that we continually have to worry about and to question if it's appropriate.

Q. On the point you made that politics can enter this thing, somebody today—I'd have to go through my notes and find out who it was—but somebody said that our effort in Somalia was much larger than our effort in Ethiopia is today; is it?

A. I don't have the total figure for the Somalia program; but over a period of the drought and refugee situation, it was certainly much larger than we've given to date. We were a very primary donor to Somalia. I would suspect that we were, by far, the largest one in Somalia. We think that that was for the whole period.

We're, of course, continuing to watch the Ethiopian matter and will be responding with the other donors.

This activity, like all these activities, should be a coordinated effort of the world community.

Q. And your point is that that is not a political difference. It's simply that we were the major donor there. A and B, it was over a longer period of time.

A. Yes. It certainly wasn't a political difference.

. . . . . .

Q. Why was the administration's P.L. 480 request for Ethiopia dropped and then reinstated?

A. The question is that why was the 1984 Ethiopia ongoing feeding program not included as a projection until—and then we announced that we were going to have a 1984 program?

It wasn't formally—it wasn't dropped; it just wasn't included. And I make that distinction because we have felt for some time that the Ethiopian Government should be doing a great deal more for its people. There is some concern for a long time that there were a lot of military expenditures where there were a lot of very hungry people.

And based upon that, we have in fact tried to signal the Ethiopian Government that we think they need to do more.

That signal was very appropriate when we made it, which was almost a year ago. We've been saying in that signal and many other ways it's time for the Ethiopian Government to do more.

The reason for the reinstatement of this program or the indication that we're going to continue with the program in 1984 was, frankly, it's clear to me that the drought was affecting almost everything in Ethiopia and that we were going to be hurting very hungry people if we didn't continue with that program.

It's one of those problems that you get when you take a position that the hungry child knows no politics that it's hard to signal as strongly as you'd like to that the government of that child should do more. And so we're caught in that quandary and we are proceeding to have a need for a program.

U.S. Food for Nigerian Expellees

On January 17, Nigeria announced that all undocumented aliens had to leave the country within 2 weeks.

---

[1] Source: Office of Press Relations, Department of State. The statement was read during the Department of State Daily Press Briefing which began at 12:23 p.m.

While the original expulsion order has subsequently been modified to extend the deadline for 4 weeks and for certain categories of aliens, several hundred thousand expellees have left Nigeria.

It appears the numbers of expellees traveling home has peaked. We do not have exact numbers, but most of those affected apparently are Ghanaians.

The Government of Ghana has estimated that over 350,000 of its citizens returned home.

We are participating in an international relief effort in which the U.N.'s Office of the Disaster Relief Coordinator, UNDRO, is taking the lead in coordinating emergency humanitarian assistance.

In Benin, where large numbers of expellees were initially concentrated, owing to closure of the Ghana-Togo land border by the Ghanaian Government, we authorized use of up to 720 metric tons of food and donated $20,000 for purchase of emergency supplies such as drugs.

In Togo we made available up to 30 tons of food and $25,000 for purchase of emergency supplies.

In Niger we have donated $25,000 to purchase fuel to transport the returnees from processing points to their home regions.

In Ghana we made an initial allocation of 60 tons of food to feed returnees.

We are coordinating with other donors under U.N. auspices on what additional aid might be needed in Ghana and elsewhere.

Ghanaian Allegations of Improper U.S. Activities Based on Forged Document

. . . . . .

Q. The Ghanaian Government has alleged that some American diplomats there have engaged in improper activities. [3] Do you have any comment?

A. Yes, I do. I might note as a preface that I understand that the charges relate to both alleged CIA activities and alleged activities by our diplomats, including the Ambassador.

In line with our usual practice, I'm not going to comment about the alleged intelligence activities. (Laughter) But, regarding our diplomats, over the course of recent months the U.S. Government and its representatives in Accra have been subjected to a barrage of unjustified charges of antiregime activity, first at official inspiration in the Ghanaian press and now by a senior government official. We have called to the attention of the appropriate Ghana-

He produced an alleged West German document reporting that U.S. Ambassador to Ghana Thomas W.M. Smith was dissatisfied with his CIA staffers, and of the opinion that they could "only prove themselves if they achieve basic changes in the country and succeed in overthrowing Rawlings." On April 2, the Federal Republic of Germany revealed that the document was a fabrication, and the United States made a formal protest to the Ghanaian Government. Mr. Tsikata's charges are patently absurd. They are based in large measure on what we have reason to believe is a fraudulent document, and otherwise are without foundation. They appear to reflect a deliberate effort to disturb relations between the United States and Ghana.

Visit of Ivory Coast President Houphouët-Boigny

. . . . . .

[SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL.] . . . we would like for this visit to result in several things. We see it as an opportunity to recognize the outstanding moderate leadership of President Houphouët-Boigny over the years to acknowledge his influence with other African leaders, to acknowledge the values which we share. It's an opportunity to reaffirm our government's encouragement to the American private sector, both commercial, business, and academic, to intensify their own activities in Ivory Coast. The country is tailor made for private sector activity.

We hope, also, that President Houphouët-Boigny will return to his country with an enhanced or a stronger stance on particular international issues which are of concern to both of us. Ivory Coast positions in the United Nations are generally moderate and generally coincide with our own.

Finally, we hope that in our discussion at several levels with the Ivorians here, during the visit, that President Houphouët-Boigny and his government, his ministers, will return with a better understanding of the U.S. Government's point of view on commodity pricing, which really is the only issue between our two governments. Ivory Coast feels, in effect, that the Western countries, particularly the world's largest consumer of cocoa and coffee, the United States, should make more of an effort to help arrange commodity pricing which will provide remunerative prices to the Africans. And we, on the other hand, have never felt and do not feel today that government intervention in the fixing of prices is a good thing. This is the subject of long discussion between us and it will continue during this visit, I imagine.

I think I'd like to ask—excuse me.

Q. Are you ready for questions?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I wanted to give my colleague an opportunity to say anything that might come to mind, and then we'd both be happy to take your questions.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I'd only add that we see the visit as an opportunity, not only to show our interest and appreciation for the cooperation which we have had from President Houphouët-Boigny and his government through the years, but also to underline the importance that this administration places on the Francophone African States. Houphouët-Boigny is the doyen of the Francophone African leaders. They are, in the main, moderates. They have been supportive of the United States, not only during the current administration, but in the past. And we've orchestrated a series of gestures to try to convey to them our appreciation for their support and to encourage it in the future.

Statement by President Reagan, June 7, 1983 [5]

Welcome for Ivory Coast President Houphouët-Boigny

We're privileged to welcome to Washington today one of the world's senior statesmen, a man of outstanding stature and the father of his country—His Excellency President Felix Houphouët-Boigny of Ivory Coast. (Applause)

On the African continent and throughout the world, he is known as a spokesman for reason and open communication as the means for resolving conflict and ensuring a better world. We share with President Houphouët-Boigny this belief in dialog. I look forward to our discussing today, and in many days to come, on the vital issues which face the African Continent and the world.

Ivory Coast itself is an outstanding example of the progress and prosperity that can be achieved in an atmosphere of peace, security, and individual liberty. The President has often emphasized these as the fundamental ingredients of economic well-being and advancement. And we share his conviction—that only in conditions of peace and liberty can a nation achieve lasting economic and social progress.

It's a particular pleasure for me to welcome today the leader of a nation which has so warmly and graciously welcomed so many of our own representatives.

Mr. President, I have received enthusiastic reports about Ivory Coast and its economic vitality and vast potential from Secretaries Baldrige and Block, [6] several Senators, Assistant Secretary of State Crocker, and others. And all of them were struck by the advances your country has made—advances reflecting your commitment to a free economy which encourages producers through a philosophy of hard work and self-help.

There is a saying in Ivory Coast, "If your stomach is empty, ask your hands why." (Applause) Well, you and your countrymen have worked hard, and in doing so, you've improved your lives and gained the respect of the world. The remarkable progress of your country's agricultural endeavors is a tribute to your enlightened leadership. By making it possible for your farmers to get a fair return for their work and by recognizing the importance of this sector of your economy, you've spared the people the deprivation that has befallen many others.

Ivory Coast has built one of the richest economies in Africa by understanding that before wealth can be divided, it must be created. Ivorians can be proud of their solid record of economic improvement since independence. At the same time, your income distribution is among the fairest on the continent.

I'm pleased that the American private sector has been able to play a role in realizing what you refer to as Ivorian well-being.

As we welcome you once again to our country, we note that many changes have occurred since your last visit to the White House in 1973. [7] Nations around the globe, including the Ivory Coast and the United States, are struggling to overcome a period of severe economic problems and uncertainty. But together, we can face the future with confidence.

Our two peoples share a desire for liberty and progress that can, and will, triumph over adversity. So today, let us renew our pledge to each other that as we walk the road to the future, we, the people of the United States and Ivory Coast, will do so as friends.

Mr. President, welcome to the White House. (Applause)

U.S. Business and Trade Relations With Nigeria

. . . . . .

Nigerian and American businessmen benefit by having, in their respective governments, a sympathetic ear for their concerns. Through nearly 23 years of independence, Nigeria has maintained a strong commitment to the vitality of its private sector. One has only to look at the market men and women, at the long and proud tradition of local, regional, transcontinental, and even world trade among its people to realize that free enterprise is the very backbone of Nigeria.

It is precisely because of this longstanding commitment to free enterprise in both countries, and the prospect that business issues will be treated with sympathy in our respective governments, that I raise the following points.

One issue, which affects Nigerian and American businessmen alike, is additional facilitative payments. This is the item most often cited by American business as the constraint in instituting or increasing commercial activities in Nigeria.

Of course, all businessmen are accustomed to paying commissions for legitimate services which help them deal with new situations and environments. What American businessmen are less accustomed to is acceding to repeated requests from individuals for commissions for services which are normally within their salaried duties. An additional difficulty for American businessmen is the constraint placed upon them by the strict provisions of American law.

I know that this issue affects Nigerians as well. After all, it is a central theme of a great novel by a great Nigerian writer, Chinua Achebe's No Longer at Ease. In that novel, bribery had tragic personal consequences for the hero. Perhaps, in the world of international business, the consequences are not tragic in the same way. Nonetheless, they are serious, and they affect Nigerians as well as Americans, if, among them, we find businessmen deciding that the monetary and psychic costs of this activity are too much to bear.

A second problem is that of delay in payments. I recognize that payment delays and import control requirements are enormously complicated, with roots in the liquidity problems that have affected Nigeria as a result of the world-wide oil glut. Nonetheless, it is important to note the serious effect of this question on the well-being of the entire commercial nexus which binds Nigeria to the rest of the world.

It extends beyond existing joint venture companies which are forced to cut back or cease operations in Nigeria because they can no longer import from low-cost, reliable U.S. suppliers wary of nonpayment. Companies that had been considering initiating business with Nigerians are also discouraged. Failure to resolve this question could affect not just current operating capacity in Nigeria, but the very attitudes of businessmen, which might take years to reverse.

As before, I have no easy solutions. Only the suggestion that, besides working together to make known how these issues adversely affect business, Nigerian and American businessmen might consider how they, as business experts, might assist in improving the level of efficiency.

Let me touch very briefly on two further issues. One has to do with imports, the other with the financing of trade. America's commercial ties with Nigeria are concentrated in construction, petroleum, and finance. There is less American representation in the manufacturing sector, despite the expertise we can offer to assist Nigeria in this crucial aspect of its economic development program.

In order to attract American investment in this sector, there must be a prospect of assured supplies of the necessary materials and spare parts. Interruptions in these supplies are, I know, attributable largely to the economic downturn in Nigeria and the difficulty of managing many competing import priorities. Once again, I offer no easy solution other than the observation that businessmen in the manufacturing sector—Nigerian and American—will need to make their case for a strengthening of Nigerian industry in order to make their claim for import licenses within a rational system of import priorities.

Concerning the financing of U.S.-Nigerian trade, this is perhaps the most complicated, but certainly also the most fundamental issue to be raised. I am encouraged to hear of progress in negotiations between Nigeria and Western commercial banks on a portion of Nigeria's short-term trade arrears. The U.S. Government is supportive of these negotiations between the private banks and the Nigerian Government, which meets the needs of all concerned parties.[9] . . . We understand that the banks will be looking closely at the progress of Nigeria's discussions with the IMF as a signpost of improved economic head [circumstances] by which to measure the risks of increased exposure.

These issues that I have raised should be considered challenges, not obstacles. Nigerian and American businessmen are fortunate to have governmental systems, strongly supportive of their activities, willing to listen to their concerns.

Nigerians and Americans, in public life and in business, have a unique opportunity to work together on matters of vital importance to our economic well-being to demonstrate that private initiative and the well-being of our nations are bound together inextricably. The success of this joint venture could very well set an example of energetic commercial cooperation for all of Africa to follow. Thank you.

[9] Negotiations between Nigeria and 24 Western banks to refinance $1.6 billion of Nigeria's short-term foreign debts were successfully concluded on June 14, 1983.

The U.S. Response to the Coup in Upper Volta

. . . . . .

Q. What was the Embassy in Ouagadougou reporting about the coup in Upper Volta [11] and Libya's involvement in that?

. . . . . .

[A.] Captain Sankara announced, as you know, that he led the move to depose the former government. He is the Chairman of the National Revolutionary Council, and we have no further information on the composition of a new government.

At a meeting of the diplomatic corps on Saturday, [12] Captain Sankara read a statement in which he said, inter alia, that the National Revolutionary Council wants good relations with all nations and that in foreign affairs the nation would follow the path of nonaligned nations.

The United States welcomes this indication of a desire for good relations and the intention to follow nonaligned foreign policy. We regret violent and unconstitutional changes of government anywhere, but the nature and form of the government is basically an Upper Volta matter.

We would hope to be able to continue a productive and cooperative relationship with Upper Volta based on mutual respect and understanding.

Statement by President Reagan, August 10, 1983 [13]

President Reagan's Meeting With Senegalese President Abdou Diouf

It's been an honor and a pleasure to welcome President Abdou Diouf to the White House today and it is especially fitting that our meeting takes place on the 100th anniversary of our American Consulate on the Senegalese island of Goree. President Diouf is one of Africa's most impressive leaders. He is a peacemaker, a problem-solver, whose fine reputation preceded him to Washington.

After meeting with him, working with him, and talking to him, I can only say it is a reputation well-deserved. In our conversations this morning and at lunch we discussed many important international problems, particularly those of Africa, the Third World, and the Middle East. On many of the issues our views converge; on others we've agreed to differ. We've always done so, however, in the spirit of mutual respect and in the context of a valued bilateral relationship. I have formed a high personal regard for President Diouf's wisdom and integrity and I value both his views and his counsel.

Senegal and the United States are relative rarities in this troubled world, democratic nations living under the rule of law and devoted to human rights, committed to the search for peaceful solutions for international problems. I've assured President Diouf of America's support for him and for Senegal. I've also expressed our admiration for his accomplishments at home and abroad. In the months ahead, I look forward to both building our personal friendship and strengthening the important ties that bind our two peoples, knowing our relationship can only further the cause of world peace.

Discussions Between President Reagan and Senegalese President Diouf

. . . . . .

[Senior Administration Official.] The relationship between the United States and Senegal has been excellent for many years. It is—I would think it's accurate to say—a relationship which has been getting progressively deeper and more substantive in recent years. And we believe that is all to the good.

. . . . . .

The kinds of topics discussed obviously included the question of developments in Africa. We, the two sides, discussed in some detail the challenge that Qaddafi of Libya poses to Africa, including in the Chadian context, although not limited thereto.

They discussed a good deal the question of the interrelationship between security, on the one hand, and economic development on the other, the two objectives which the Senegalese President argued are those of Africa. And on the U.S. side, there was full agreement that, indeed, those are the two objectives that we should be working together on to try to strengthen both security and development and that the two depend upon each other. In that general sense, there was an absolute identity of views.

There was also considerable discussion and our President asked the Senegalese President for an analysis of the internal economic situation in Senegal. And President Diouf explained at length the difficulties facing the Senegalese economy and the nature of the most extremely difficult decisions that he is in the middle of now, he and his collegues, in terms of helping Senegal address that economic agenda. It involves a whole series of things, including budget planning, including subsidies internally in the economy, including agreement with the IMF, and so forth.

As I mentioned, there was discussion, as well, of the Chadian situation, of the OAU in the wake of the recent summit meeting in June in Addis Ababa, the 19th summit, at which President Diouf played a very central role. [15] And, in addition, the question of developments in southern Africa and our common desire for movement towards Namibia's independence as soon as possible.

[15] The 19th Meeting of the Organization of African Unity was held in Addis Ababa, June 8–12. President Diouf was instrumental in preventing the breakup of the meeting over the Western Sahara dispute.

Chapter 15. Latin America

A. Regional Policies

Document 601

Remarks by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Inter-American Affairs (Sanchez) Before the Palm Beach Republican Club, Palm Beach, Florida, February 22, 1983 [1]

U.S. Security Interests in Latin America

This evening I want to focus on Latin America, a region that is important to the security interests of the United States. If there is one point made abundantly clear by trends in this region, it is that we need to devote more attention—not less—to this region. I will address the Soviet/Cuban threat to Central America and the Caribbean, note some of the implications of that threat and Soviet expansion in the region, and finally discuss our policy response to the threat.

Over the past 22 years, the Soviet Union has successfully reinforced the penetration it made into this hemisphere when Fidel Castro came to power in Cuba. The Soviet Union has been able to establish a permanent presence in the Western Hemisphere and through its surrogate—Cuba—to challenge the stability and security of a region too long taken for granted. The Soviet Union maintains almost back-to-back deployment of its long-range Bear bombers to the region. Soviet naval combatants recently participated in joint training exercises with the Cubans. This was the 22d visit to Cuba since the first visit in July 1969. The Soviet brigade which is stationed near Havana provides a palace guard of approximately 3,000 men. Soviet presence also includes about 2,500 military and 8,000 civilian advisors.

The Soviet Union has provided a stream of military equipment to Cuba. In 1981 alone, Moscow provided 66,000 metric tons and $600 million in military assistance. This was the highest total since the buildup in 1962—the year of the missile crisis. However, deliveries in 1982 exceeded the 1981 level by 2,000 metric tons and amounted to more than $1 billion of military assistance.

The growing Cuban military strength has enhanced its capabilities dramatically over the last few years. Its military capability is now far in excess of actual or perceived defensive needs. Cuban armed forces include an army of over 225,000, a navy of about 11,000, and air defense forces of 16,000. These figures do not include hundreds of thousands of paramilitary forces which in many cases are better trained and equipped than the regular armed forces of its neighbors in the Caribbean and Central America.

Cuba has over 2.3 percent of its population in the regular armed forces. One of every twenty Cubans participates in some kind of security mission. By comparison, the United States has less than 1 percent of its people in the regular armed forces.

The Cuban army includes 9 active and 18 reserve divisions. With about 21 times the population of Cuba, the United States in contrast has only 24 divisions—16 active and 8 reserve. Cuban ground forces have over 650 tanks and 90 helicopters, including the MI-24 Hind—the world's foremost assault helicopter.

Cuba has about 50 torpedo and missile attack boats, including the modern Turya hydrofoil torpedo boat—exported only to Cuba. With Soviet assistance, Cuba is gradually acquiring a blue-water navy. Since 1978, the Soviets have provided two Foxtrot attack submarines, a Koni-class frigate, and two amphibious assault ships. If Cuba were interested in defensive needs only, it would have no need for such projection forces. The Soviets are expected to continue to expand the Cuban blue-water capability and upgrade other capabilities.

The Cubans have well over 200 MIG fighter aircraft. Just this year enough MIG-23 Flogger aircraft were delivered to [1] Source: Department of Defense files.

Cuba to form at least a second and perhaps a third squadron.

We have been exceedingly tolerant of the Cuban threat, possibly because we believe—perhaps incorrectly—that this island could be isolated from the rest of the Caribbean. However, proliferation of the Cuban threat globally, and specifically throughout the Caribbean Basin, becomes a significant threat to the vital security interests of this country.

With its population of less than 10 million and a land area of about 44,000 square miles, Cuba is involved globally—providing military and technicial advisors and assistance in Africa, in the Middle East, and as far away as Vietnam. Castro currently has about 65,000 Cubans serving overseas, including 40,000 military and 25,000 civilian technicians. Most are involved in construction activities but many specialize in subversion. Cuba has about 25,000 troops in Angola alone and about 12,000 in Ethiopia.

Why does the Soviet-supported Cuban buildup and foreign intervention concern us? What are the implications of the expanding Soviet-supported Cuban threat to U.S. security interests in Latin America—especially in Central America and the Caribbean? This Soviet surrogate sits astride critical sea lines of communication. In peacetime, 44 percent of all foreign trade tonnage and 45 percent of our imported crude oil pass through the Caribbean. In wartime, half of NATO's supplies would depart our gulf ports and pass through the Florida straits to Europe. Critical reinforcements for NATO would also depart our gulf ports destined for Europe.

Many consider the Caribbean to be the Achilles heel of NATO. We must assume that the Soviets have noted our vulnerability. Certainly, the Soviet presence in Cuba and activities in the South Atlantic indicate Soviet appreciation of the importance of our vital sea lines through the Caribbean. In 1970, Soviet naval vessels spent about 200 ship days in the South Atlantic. In 1980, the number of Soviet ship days in this area had increased thirteenfold to 2,600 ship days.

More disturbing than the Soviet-sponsored Cuban military buildup is Cuban assistance in transforming other countries such as Nicaragua into Marxist states and in the export of subversive activities to opportune targets in Central America and the Caribbean—especially El Salvador.

Castro is actively engaged in converting Nicaragua into another Cuba. There are approximately 5,000 Cuban civilain advisers and about 3,000 Cuban military and security advisers in Nicaragua. Nicaragua is also being assisted by advisers from the Soviet Union, East Germany, Bulgaria, North Korea, and the PLO. Cuba and other Communist allies are helping to build the Sandinista Armed Forces from their currently estimated strength of 138,000 into a 250,000-man armed force with 50,000 in the active forces and 200,000 in the reserves and militia. Once achieved, this will mean 1 in 19 Nicaraguans will be under arms. Thirty-nine percent of those 18 and older who are fit for service are already in the military. However, even at its present strength, the Sandinista Army represents the largest military force in the history of Central America.

Approximately 70 Nicaraguans were sent to Bulgaria for training as pilots and mechanics. According to a Sandinista official, the first class of 30 pilots was due to complete its training in December 1982. Existing landing strips in Nicaragua are being lengthened and will be able to accommodate the most sophisticated Soviet jet aircraft. Soviet advisers are deeply involved in directing the effort to upgrade the Nicaraguan Air Force. Although there is no evidence of MIG's in Nicaragua at present, they could be flown in quickly from Cuba.

The buildup in Nicaragua also includes 36 new military garrisons, over 1,000 East German trucks, about 100 anti-aircraft guns, and Soviet 152-millimeter Howitzers that can achieve ranges over 27 kilometers. With a second delivery of Soviet T-54/T-55 tanks to Nicaragua in late 1982, the Sandinistas now have approximately 50 tanks—enough to form a second battalion. Their naval force consisting of 15 patrol boats has been active and the source of friction with Nicaragua's neighbors.

The frightening implication of the Cuban, Soviet, East European, and PLO-supported Nicaraguan buildup is that it provides a platform for spreading subversion and supporting guerrillas in neighboring countries, especially in El Salvador. One of those neighbors, Costa Rica, has no regular armed forces to defend itself. Nicaragua has routinely violated the territory of another neighbor—Honduras—in supplying the Salvadoran guerrillas. In sharp contrast to the buildup of military forces and capability in Nicaragua, the Hondurans have a force of 17,500—which includes 5,000 police and security forces—and a 7-patrol boat navy. In the face of a Sandinista force of 138,000, the Hondurans are hard pressed to defend their borders and coastlines and to try to stop the continuing violation of their territory and adjacent waters. In the past, Honduras has relied on its small—and now antiquated—force of Super Mysteres and F-86's to deter aggression. It obviously would not be a match for the growing threat in Nicaragua.

In El Salvador, Cuba acted as the catalyst to organize and unify the groups of the far left, to include helping to organize a guerrilla combined military command in 1980. It assisted the guerrillas in developing a military strategy and initial war plans. It was Cuba that encouraged and assisted the guerrillas to launch the ill-fated, so-called "final" offensive in January 1981. The hand of Cuba continues to be seen in the support of the latest guerrilla offensive last month—conveniently timed to occur just prior to the Presidential certification of El Salvador. The Cubans have been instrumental in arranging for the acquisition and delivery of weapons to the Salvadoran guerrillas from Vietnam, Ethiopia, and Eastern Europe by way of Nicaragua. Guerrilla recruits have been transported to Cuba and elsewhere for extensive training.

Cuba has not devoted its attention and resources only to Nicaragua and El Salvador. Convincing evidence of Cuban activities has surfaced in virtually every Caribbean Basin country. In Grenada, Cuban influence has reached such a high level that it can be considered a Cuban protégé. The Cubans are constructing air and naval facilities there that far exceed the requirements of that tiny island. The Grenadian Minister of National Mobilization, Selwyn Strachan, has boasted publicly that Cuba will eventually use the new airport in Grenada to supply troops in Angola. He also indicated that because of its strategic location, the airport may be used by the Soviet Union. The St. George's Medical School may have to be relocated due to an extension of the runway.

Cuba has, over the past 2 years, significantly upgraded its presence in Grenada. Cuban goals in Grenada are military and political—aimed at ensuring the viability of the Bishop government, while serving as a base for Cuban propaganda dissemination in the Eastern Caribbean. Cuba has, for example, constructed a military camp in Grenada. The camp includes barracks, administration buildings, vehicle storage sheds, support buildings, and a training area with a Soviet-style obstacle course. Recent clearing activity indicates that additional training facilities may be built near Petit Calivigny Point and by Point Egmont. The camp is built to house a battalion-size unit and is being built by the Cubans.

Although there is no hard evidence of significant Cuban presence in Suriname—a former Dutch colony in South America, the Castro touch is evident in recent events there. The Cuban Ambassador is a senior intelligence officer who was formerly Chief of the Caribbean Section of the Americas Department of the Cuban Communist Party. The Americas Department is responsible for Cuban covert activities. The Cuban Ambassador has a very close relationship with LTC Bouterse—Suriname's military leader. In December, Bouterse cracked down on his opposition who were trying to restore democracy to Suriname. He firebombed labor union headquarters and radio stations and arrested 15 prominent labor leaders, journalists, the bar association president, and student leaders. All were later tortured and killed. A subsequent military purge resulted in the death of Bouterse's own deputy.

Moscow is assisting the activities of its Cuban proxy by underwriting Cuba at a cost of about $4 billion annually and by supporting efforts to collect funds, arms, and supplies from the Communist bloc for guerrilla activities in Central America and the Caribbean. As I mentioned earlier, such Soviet support includes blatantly delivering equipment directly to Nicaragua on Soviet bloc ships. What are the implications of this Soviet-funded Communist expansion—from its proxy Cuba to Nicaragua, Grenada, and elsewhere?

I think we can readily see that such Communist expansion could lead to an extensive Soviet permanent presence in the region with significant military consequences. It could literally place hostile forces and weapon systems capable of striking targets deep in the United States on our borders and adjacent waters. Soviet strategic capabilities—already substantial—would be increased significantly. It could provide air and naval bases—such as those under construction in Grenada—for the recovery of Soviet aircraft after strategic missions. It might also furnish missile sites for launching attacks against the United States with short-and intermediate-range missiles. It would provide bases which could be used for covert operations against the United States and our neighbors. The Soviets, always annoyed at our use of the forward basing concept in Europe, could use the same concept to preposition Soviet equipment, supplies, and ammunition in this hemisphere. Both the Soviet Pacific and Atlantic fleets could operate near our shores without having to return to the Soviet Union for maintenance.

The threat to our sea lines of communication—necessary particularly for reinforcement of Europe in time of war—is well-documented, especially the vulnerability of the Panama Canal. Because of the volume of goods passing through the Caribbean Basin, it would endanger the economic well-being of our nation. Perhaps more importantly, Soviet/Cuban expansion in Latin America would require significant alternation in current U.S. forward deployment strategy since a major threat would now exist in an area previously considered militarily secure. Such changes would require additional resources at significant costs and diversion of resources from other areas.

Considering the extent of the Soviet/Cuban/Nicaraguan threat and the serious nature of the security problem, you are probably wondering what the United States is doing to meet this growing challenge to our security interests so close to home. Our defense policy is designed to help our neighbors to restore stability and security to their nations and the region as a whole.

While each country in Latin America faces a slightly different situation, virtually every country has been challenged by Soviet, Cuban, and Nicaraguan-sponsored subversive activity. That subversive activity attempts to take advantage of the social, economic, and political problems that underlie the instability of the region. We place a high priority on support for democracy, economic development, and reform—but without a secure environment, these objectives are not likely to be attained. Consequently, the U.S. policy response to the regional threat involves helping individual countries—through security assistance programs tailored to their needs—to defend themselves. Our security assistance seeks to train and equip host country forces to maximize their effectiveness in combatting the Marxist guerrillas who have been trained, equipped, and supported by Cuba, Nicaragua, and the Soviet Union. Unlike Soviet assistance programs for Cuba and Communist bloc assistance to Nicaragua, the United States does not attempt to create large military forces that our friends do not require and could not maintain without extensive sustained external support. Neither do we desire or attempt to impose our presence. In 1982, the Soviets and Cubans had 50 times as many military advisers in Latin America as did the United States. Last year, the Soviets increased their military advisers in Cuba by 500 while the Cubans doubled their military advisers in Nicaragua. Perhaps of greatest significance, our security assistance programs are tailored to defensive needs which do not upset the regional balance.

U.S. security assistance to the entire region has been modest compared to military equipment and economic aid provided by the Soviets. Our security assistance to Latin America has increased under this administration, but it still amounts to only about 2 percent of U.S. security assistance worldwide. Unfortunately, U.S. security assistance to Latin America is far below what it should be and, even so, we normally have an uphill fight for these meager levels.

Perhaps the most visible examples of the influence of U.S. security assistance are the three U.S.-trained and equipped Salvadoran quick reaction battalions—two were trained in El Salvador and one in the United States. These battalions are the mainstays of the Salvadoran Army, but they are not enough to give the armed forces the edge over the guerrillas. Unfortunately, U.S. training has touched only about 10 percent of the Salvadoran military forces.

U.S. training has stressed the importance of good civilian-military relations in order to deny the support of the people to the guerrillas. The complimentary remarks made by one of the commanders of the People's Liberation Army guerrilla group indicated that such training has been very successful. He noted to a correspondent after an encounter with a U.S.-trained battalion that it was not only a better trained unit than any he had faced, but that the officers and soldiers know how to gain the support of the people. We believe the success of the U.S.-trained units justifies support of Salvadoran plans to organize and train a fourth quick reaction battalion.

We also trained 477 officer candidates at Fort Benning, Georgia. When these U.S.-trained officers are all integrated into units, they will double the officer corps. This will do much to alleviate the critical shortage of junior leaders and should improve command and control considerably.

The acquisition of transport vehicles and UH-1H helicopters from the United States has materially upgraded the mobility of the Salvadorans. We have also provided A-37 light attack aircraft, C-123 cargo transports, and O-2A forward air control aircraft. The A-37's have proven especially effective in dislodging guerrillas from their base camps and fortified positions.

The addition of secure communications equipment has allowed coordination of military activities without providing valuable information to the guerrillas. At the same time, improvements in tactical intelligence and especially its exploitation have contributed to Salvadoran successes.

The introduction of radar and military air traffic control procedures could aid Salvadoran efforts to interdict guerrilla air supply deliveries—which have been increasing.

We also provide mobile training teams where specific needs are identified but these teams leave as soon as their job is completed.

Our program in El Salvador is more extensive than U.S. military assistance programs elsewhere in Central America because the guerrilla war there poses such an immediate threat to El Salvador's survival as a free country. However, the defense needs of all Central American countries are generally similar.

We have increased our aid to Honduras in the face of the major buildup by neighboring Nicaragua and the continued violation of Honduran borders and territory by the Sandinistas.

Even Costa Rica is sufficiently concerned by terrorist activities and violation of its territory to ask for security assistance. Two million dollars in grant aid was approved in the FY-82 supplemental appropriations bill. We also see a need for security assistance to Guatemala where hopefully the positive trends achieved by the Rios Montt government will impress those who have conditioned security assistance on improvements in observance of human rights.

Unfortunately, one of the serious problems which impedes obtaining resources for Latin America involves our traditional paternalistic attitude toward the region. We tend to take Latin America for granted and give it attention only when a crisis forces us to focus on it. When we do deal with problems in Latin America, we apply a double standard—far more demanding of our Latin friends than, for instance, our friends in the Middle East and other parts of the world.

As certification hearings have demonstrated, some Congressmen have demanded perfection of Latin America when they reviewed the progress made in human rights, control of violence, and political and economic reforms—some of which we would have difficulty implementing in this country. Other Congressmen have expressed a genuine understanding of the nature of regional problems and what constitutes reasonable expectations. One congressional leader recently reminded the critics of our policy toward El Salvador that although the Government of El Salvador may not be perfect, it is certainly better than having a Marxist government there. I do not want to imply that we do not consider human rights and reform important. I only want to point out that if we are sincerely concerned about human rights, reform, and control of violence, then we should be worried about the possibility of El Salvador or any other country in Central America under a Communist government.

When Marxist guerrillas succeed, they do not improve civil rights, they eliminate them. Nor do they improve the economic situation. Cuba had one of the highest per capita incomes in Latin America before Castro. According to the World Bank, Cuba's per capita annual growth rate averaged a negative 1.2 percent between 1960 and 1978. Cuban economic performance ranked in the lowest 5 percent worldwide and was the worst of all socialist countries. After 20 years under Castro, rationing still exists in Cuba.

Communist revolutions do achieve political reform as did Castro's. Unfortunately, the Cuban Revolution only replaced one dictator with another. No amount of rhetoric or charisma can hide the realities of the Cuban Revolution. It resulted in an exodus of over 800,000 refugees—roughly 10 percent of Cuba's population—and the execution in the 1960's of at least 7,000 people, most without trial.

If the growing Soviet/Cuban/Nicaraguan threat continues unchecked, we should be prepared for additional waves of refugees. It would be virtually impossible to prevent such massive emigrations and to deal effectively with refugee problems. Both human and monetary costs would be high.

The Caribbean Basin has been a relatively cost-free zone, but the United States will have to devote more resources to this area. The Department of Defense is fully committed to steady real growth in security assistance funding because we believe the program is one of our most cost-effective and indispensable instruments for protecting our national security interests. As I mentioned earlier, only 2 percent of U.S. funding for security assistance worldwide is devoted to Latin America. Since defense spending amounts to only about 28 percent of total Federal spending—compared to over 40 percent a decade ago—we believe that we can and must afford the cost when our security interests are at stake.

It is obvious that the Soviets and Cubans are attempting to spread the malaise of Marxism to other countries—especially in Latin America. They would impose dictatorships, economic decline, and human suffering on the people. We support a different alternative—stability, democracy, economic growth, and respect for the individual.

Thank you, very much.

Address by the Secretary of State (Shultz) Before the Council of the Americas, June 1, 1983 [2]

U.S.-Latin American Relations

On April 27, President Reagan took the unusual step of addressing a joint session of the Congress to call for a bipartisan approach to sustain the independence and freedom of the countries of Central America.[3] Since last August, economic leaders—public and private, North and South—have been working hard to resolve liquidity problems from Mexico to South America in ways that will preserve the capital flows essential to future growth. And last year at this time, the Republic of Argentina and the United Kingdom were locked in an unexpected war we had sought to prevent.

In sum, whether the issues are local self-determination, international finance, or conflict among nations, Latin America has moved to center stage on the already crowded global arena.

Few people are more aware of this phenomenon than those of you gathered here today. The Council of the Americas and its members have extensive experience throughout Latin America. That means you also have important contributions to make to the policy debates now underway in this country. So I would like to give you a brief overview of where our relations stand today, and how we will be approaching them in the months to come.

I.

U.S. relations with Latin America and the Caribbean are being debated more vigorously now than at any time since the rise of Castro and the early days of the Alliance for Progress almost a quarter century ago. Yet the debate, as I hear it, often seems to be cast in terms—I might even say in stereotypes—that are much the same as those of 25 years ago.

[3] See document 623.

Images of Latin American underdevelopment, of dictatorship, and of U.S. "interference" have shaped a lot of debate in the past. And they seem to have survived virtually intact. But do they capture what is going on? Let me take a moment to explore whether they do.

Take "underdevelopment." Until the global recession struck them hard last year, Latin America's economies had grown in real terms at an average annual rate of 6 percent for 20 years. It is true that population also grew rapidly. In 1950 the total population of Latin America was less than that of the United States; today it is 60 percent larger. Even so, social conditions improved. Between 1960 and 1980, infant mortality fell from 82 to under 50 per thousand, and life expectancy increased from 56 to 64 years. Most Latin Americans now live in urban areas. Argentina ranks third in the world after the United States and Canada in the percentage of its population which has at least some college education.

Production of manufactured goods in Brazil, Mexico, Argentina, and Colombia has expanded at a remarkable rate. Some Latin American manufacturers are becoming serious international competitors, even here in our own market. At the same time, U.S. sales to Latin America have been larger than to Japan, and about the same as to the European Community.

True, some of this progress is fragile. The debt crisis has led to harsh retrenchment, and more difficult adjustments are likely. But "underdevelopment" describes the real issues less and less. Even the vulnerability to Communist intervention in Central America stems less from stagnation than from economic growth and social change that generated expectations and tensions that were not met or resolved.

Let's now take "dictatorship." As development has taken place, national and local institutions and the workings of the market place have necessarily become more complex. Educated groups whose livelihood does not depend directly on agriculture are making new demands on governments and social institutions. Traditional authorities—which the stereotypes identify as the landed aristocracy, church, military—can no longer manage the new complexities alone. And they have themselves shared, even sometimes led, the process of change.

One result is that Latin America's long experience with authoritarian rule is gradually ending. The five Andean countries all enjoy constitutional democratic rule today—a circumstance that has only one brief precedent in history. In fact, 20 of 30 members of the OAS are constitutional democracies—and some of the others, including Argentina, Brazil, and Uruguay, are moving toward democratic systems. Some of those that are not—Nicaragua is the most worrisome example—are new dictatorships of the radical left.

In fact, it has been the self-proclaimed "Model" of change—Cuba—that has been economically and politically stagnant. But its Soviet ties have led to significant expansion in one area: military growth and the capacity to project Communist power in Africa and in this hemisphere. Gone is the amateurism of the Guevara days. Cuba's subversion is professional and thorough. Using every tool from arms to xenophobia, Cuba is exploiting and stimulating political instability and the tensions of growth.

The fact is that today in Latin America, dictatorship is an imposition from both left and right on societies that are in the process of doing better. Democracy still faces enormous obstacles, but it is no longer just an aspiration.

Finally, let me make two observations about U.S. "interference." The first is that although our influence in Latin America is clearly very important, it has declined in both absolute and relative terms. Latin America's exports to the United States are now less than 30 percent of its total, compared to over 55 percent 25 years ago. Japan's trade in Latin America is 17 times what it was in 1960. In arms transfers, the United States is now only the fourth or fifth largest supplier of weapons, while Brazil has become a major world exporter and Argentina is not far behind. The number of U.S. military assistance personnel in all of Latin America has fallen from about 750 in 1970 to fewer than 200 today.

My second observation is that our support remains critical to advance an entire range of objectives that our neighbors share with us, from security to development to democracy. The real issue is the nature, not the fact, of our involvement and support.

I believe that both you in the business community and we in the government have been aware of these facts. But we have not done as good a job as we should of transmitting them to the American people and Congress.

II.

That the health of the U.S. economy is vital to Latin America's development prospects has long been accepted. What is new is that today the well-being of our neighbors also affects us in turn. This past year has demonstrated that Latin America's economic achievements are vulnerable to the fluctuations of the international economy. For example, our exports to Mexico declined in 1982 by about 37 percent. We estimate that this loss in sales has cost us some 250,000 jobs here in the United States. It has been reported that the nine largest U.S. banks have, on average, an exposure in Latin America equal to more than 100 percent of their equity.

Last summer, Mexico was struck by a severe liquidity crisis brought on by a combination of internal policies with declining oil revenue, high interest rates and a major recession in the United States, Mexico's most important market.

In Brazil, a similar liquidity problem developed for slightly different reasons. Brazil relies heavily on imported oil. When the price rose sharply in 1973–74 and 1979–80, Brazil chose to rely on borrowing to continue its pattern of growth. This strategy made sense when it was adopted, but it was undermined by the worldwide recession, high interest rates, and a sudden decline in availability of credit.

Nor are these cases unique. From Central America to the Andes, to the Southern Cone, other countries face similar problems requiring international cooperation and mutual adjustments.

We and other concerned nations, in cooperation with the IMF and the commercial banks, responded to help overcome the immediate crisis. Mexico, Brazil, Argentina, and others have developed programs with the IMF that promise to enable them to resume noninflationary growth, provided they make the necessary adjustments.

But Latin America will continue to need the support of the international financial and economic community. A high priority must be to encourage conditions that will help Latin America and the Caribbean return to strong, sustained economic growth. A major contribution, on our part, can be right here at home: a robust economic recovery and low interest rates. The long-term creditworthiness of most Latin American countries is not open to doubt. Their gross savings, we should remember, now average about 22 percent of gross national product, a rate among the highest in the world.

The United States has proved itself the most open and least restricted market for Latin America among the industrialized nations. We intend to keep it that way. And that means that all of us—we in the Government and you in such private organizations as the Council—will have to do a better job of helping the American people understand that protectionism only protects in the short run.

The trade components of the Caribbean Basin Initiative, for example, are predicated on the idea that opening our market—and assuring potential investors that it will stay open for 12 years—is the most powerful stimulus we could offer to the economies of our Caribbean and Central American neighbors. It was undertaken in close cooperation with them and with Canada, Colombia, Mexico, and Venezuela as contributing partners. It fulfills a long-felt requirement for economic development—underscored repeatedly to us over the years by many Latin Americans: trade, not aid.

Yet trade alone is not enough; economic assistance is critical to help countries combat poverty—and in some cases to resist the economic warfare of guerrillas. Against prevailing headwinds, we have doubled our bilateral economic assistance to Latin America and the Caribbean, from $440 million in FY 1980 to $884 million in FY 1983. We are now considering special emergency assistance for the Andean countries of Ecuador, Peru, and Bolivia. Quite aside from the troubles of global recession, these countries face a heavy additional burden from the severe disruption of normal rainfall patterns, disruptions causing both floods and droughts with disastrous consequences for social conditions as well as food production.

III.

Hemispheric security relationships—or their absence—are as important as economics. We have a particular stake in stable and balanced relations among the countries of this hemisphere. The lesson of the Falklands/Malvinas war is that peace can never be taken for granted. The lesson of the Central American experience is that we must help our neighbors shield themselves from the irretrievable damage of violence and totalitarianism.

As the President has repeatedly emphasized, security assistance is an essential shield for democratization, economic development, and diplomacy. Central America faces a massive crisis in which Communist military intervention, much of it covert, is spreading violence and destruction that threaten to impose totalitarian minorities organically linked to the Soviet Union. Our national interests and the interests of the hemisphere's majorities are that this aggression be checked.

A security shield makes it possible for us to support dialog and negotiations—both among the countries of the region and within each country. With such a shield, we can achieve a political solution in Central America that will serve both the democratic process and our own security.

Let me repeat what the President told the Joint Session of Congress:

"The United States will support any agreement among Central American countries for the withdrawal—under fully verifiable and reciprocal conditions—of all foreign military and security advisers and troops.

"We want to help opposition groups join the political process in all countries and compete by ballots instead of bullets.

"We will support any verifiable reciprocal agreement among Central American countries on the renunciation of support for insurgencies on neighbors' territory.

"And finally, we desire to help Central America and its costly arms race and will support any verifiable reciprocal agreement on the nonimportation of offensive weapons."

Today the "Contadora group"—Colombia, Mexico, Panama, and Venezuela—is actively engaged in the search for peace with the countries in Central America. We have welcomed this development. Our interests cannot be separated from those of our democratic neighbors.

IV.

Economic recovery and improved security conditions, however, are only elements of a strategy with a greater goal. In the Americas man is viewed as far more than just a cog in an economic machine. Human values—individual self-respect and freedom, kinship ties, religious conviction—weigh far too heavily in our aspirations to be ignored in our respective national goals. They must be taken into account in our relations and our foreign policy.

It is for these reasons that our purpose is to support democracy and freedom as offering the citizens of our hemisphere the best opportunity for both stability and individual freedom. That is why we must assist countries threatened by those who would impose a rigid totalitarian discipline and that is why we must at the same time be patient with those countries seeking to work their way to freedom.

It may be, as a recent report argues, that democracy cannot be exported—but only if by that is meant the wholesale copying of any particular set of practices. In this administration, we believe it is not only possible but necessary to cooperate actively to strengthen the institutions of freedom. Nonintervention does not require passivity.

The movement toward democracy now underway throughout the hemisphere could be held up by prolonged economic crisis or by civil conflict. But it is irreversible in the long run. Let us not forget that democracy took root and emerged out of civil conflict—in Venezuela, Colombia, the Dominican Republic. It is to these examples that we look in supporting elections and other democratic institutions as the way to reconciliation, economic recovery and peace among neighbors in Central America.

V.

In conclusion, let me say that I think we are all aware that public policies alone are not enough. This is not a time for the private sector to be timid. Bankers and businessmen should not impose unrealistic credit requirements or seek protection behind new trade barriers. Even more importantly, you of the Council of the Americas owe your existence as an organization to the recognition that you should reach beyond immediate operational requirements to broader issues such as those I have been discussing today.

Let me close with a few words about two men whose service to their country has earned each of them the deepest gratitude of their President and Secretary of State, and should command the respect of every American.

Ambassadors Deane Hinton and Tom Enders have served magnificently and with great professionalism in two of the most difficult, often frustrating, always challenging positions in American diplomacy.[4] Positions, I should add, that neither sought. In the best traditions of the Foreign Service, they have gone where needed and given their very best.

Deane Hinton has played a central role in formulating and carrying out our basic policy objectives in Central America for more than 2 years now. In San Salvador, he has been literally on the front lines of our country's efforts to be loyal to and supportive of our friends and true to our peaceful, democratic principles. Deane's personal commitment to the nurturing of democratic institutions in El Salvador has been more than matched by his personal and intellectual courage.

Tom Enders' job, Assistant Secretary for the American Republics, is as tough as any in this Department. Yet that did not inhibit Tom from giving the task all the courageous leadership and bold initiative it demands. He has done the job as well as anyone in memory. A tough, fair-minded professional of Tom Enders' exceptional quality will be called on by Presidents and Secretaries again and again. I know Tom will bring to his new assignment the same personal and intellectual gifts and the same deep commitment to fundamental American values that have served us so well over these past 2 years.

Deane Hinton and Tom Enders are the best the Foreign Service produces, and have earned the utmost admiration and gratitude of their colleagues. They have served their country with courage and wisdom; we are all in their debt.

[4] Enders was subsequently named Ambassador to Spain, and Hinton was named Ambassador to Pakistan. Langhorne A. Motley, who was then serving as Ambassador to Brazil, succeeded Enders as Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs. Hinton was succeeded by Thomas R. Pickering, who was then serving as Ambassador to Nigeria.

Prepared Statement By the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Motley) Before Two Subcommittees of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, July 21, 1983 [5]

"We Cannot View Latin America's Economic Development in Isolation From Our Own"

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for the opportunity to address these two subcommittees on Latin America's economic crisis. I look forward to developing a close and candid relationship with the members of these two subcommittees and other concerned members of Congress during my tenure as Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs.

In my testimony this afternoon I will focus my remarks not only on our assessment of the economic situation in Latin America but also on the efforts that the United States Government is undertaking to help deal with it. I believe that it is appropriate that my first appearance before Congress following my confirmation will offer me the opportunity to discuss this vital subject. Because I have just returned from serving as Ambassador to Brazil for 21 months, I will draw on that country's particular problems and opportunities to illustrate my remarks.

I would like to begin by looking briefly at some of the external shocks to which the economies of Latin America have been subjected, almost simultaneously, during recent years. Each of these shocks would have been difficult enough alone, but together their impact has been devastating. The sharp petroleum price increases of 1973–1974, and 1978–1979, were the major culprit in producing a dramatic change in the terms-of-trade and the balance-of-payments outlook for most developing countries. We have also seen a sharp drop in commodity prices other than oil, such as sugar, coffee, bauxite, copper, etc., which occurred during the recent world economic slowdown. This drop has drastically reduced the export earnings of virtually all our neighbors to the south. The economic slowdown also curtailed demand for Latin America's limited but important exports of manufactured products. Brazil was particularly adversely affected in this regard, as it is well along in pursuing its export diversification strategy. Brazil's exports of industrialized products fell by 18 percent in value terms between 1981 and 1982. I note, however, that Brazil's exports to the United States rose by about 5 percent between these two years. I believe that this demonstrates that, even during an economic slowdown, our large and diversified market remains relatively open to imports. The economic slowdown also increased protectionist pressures in the developed countries and eroded their political will to contribute financial and developmental assistance to the degree needed in the developing countries. Finally, the uncommonly high real interest rates of the past 4 years undid the financial planning of many countries.

Nonetheless, Mr. Chairman, I believe that it is necessary that we avoid the pitfall of blaming all of the problems facing Latin America and other developing countries on factors beyond their direct control. Economic growth and development in the countries of the developing world rests primarily on the policies adopted, and the decisions made, by each country itself. Certain countries that got an early start on the adjustment process generally have fared better than those who delayed the beginning of their adjustment. The recognition of inappropriate policies is the first step in any country's efforts to correct them.

During the last decade, for example, we witnessed the phenomenon of persistently over-valued exchange rates in many Latin American countries. In the case of petroleum exporters, or other exporters of temporarily booming commodities, these over-valued exchange rates appeared to be affordable. However, over-valued currencies insured continued over-dependence on exports of primary products, stagnant industrial exports, and artificially cheap imports. In other countries, resistance to exchange rate adjustment was a combination of national pride, wishful thinking, and fear of inflationary results. While a major problem was the maintenance of a rigid exchange rate, various countries also adopted some variation of Brazil's "crawling peg" system of frequent mini-devaluations. Until recently, however, there were few cases where crawling peg-type currency adjustments were frequent enough or large enough to avoid an over-valued exchange rate. Part of the problem in Brazil was that adjustments in the exchange rate did not keep pace with the country's rate of inflation. In addition, however, Brazil did not fully counteract the successive devaluations of European countries, which helped cause its exports to become less competitive in third markets.

There are many examples where the persistence of over-valued exchange rates perpetuates and exacerbates distortions in the economies of our Latin neighbors. On the other hand, Mexico's and Brazil's recent adoption of more realistic rates is already beginning to have beneficial effects.

A second major area of internal problems has been the large and rapidly expanding public sector deficits in many countries of the region. These deficits arose from many factors—a reluctance to levy adequate taxes, proliferating government enterprises, and subsidies. In Brazil, spending by the public sector in 1982 rose to about 42 percent of that country's gross domestic product, while the public sector deficit rose to $54 billion, almost 17 percent of GDP. The public sector deficit here in the United States was only about one-third the level recorded in Brazil. Brazil, Argentina, and Mexico are three of this hemisphere's most poignant examples of the rapid increase in state enterprises. Part of this growth was caused by the unwillingness of these countries to accept foreign direct investment in what they considered strategic sectors. Whatever the cause, however, the end result was the same. In these and other countries, the revenues of such enterprises have been dwarfed by spending levels which rivaled in magnitude central government spending. In Brazil, for example, the deficits of state enterprises account for nearly 40 percent of the public sector deficit. These burgeoning public sector deficits have fueled inflation and forced higher government borrowing. Deficits have also caused increasing debt service burdens. In many countries including Brazil, deficits have soaked up much available local credit that otherwise would have been available for higher priority projects.

Government subsidies and price controls as well as over-valued exchange rates, are generally justified as protection for the poor and marginal segments of society. Rather, experience in many Latin American countries has shown that such policies contribute to economic stagnation or depression which falls most onerously on the poor. Agricultural price controls have stifled production, often resulting in higher import bills, and have limited employment opportunities and income of small farmers and peasants. Interest rate limits and credit controls have encouraged local banks to lend only to the largest and most creditworthy customers. One result has been an inefficient allocation of capital in both the industrial and agricultural sectors. Over-valued exchange rates have limited the earnings of the predominantly rural exporters of traditional products, and have subsidized the consumption of artificially cheap imports by urban middle and upper classes. This problem has been particularly apparent in countries that followed the import substitution-based strategy of economic development. Countries like Brazil that made an early commitment to diversifying agricultural as well as industrial exports came off better in this regard.

I would now like to turn briefly to the prospects for the future. There are some areas where improvement is likely, but others, frankly, where significant improvement is not in sight.

On the negative side, the medium to long-term price trends for the traditional export products are not encouraging. Bananas, coffee, and sugar face a persistent pattern of production outstripping consumption. Metal exports such as copper, tin, and bauxite rebound nicely during economic recoveries, but they will continue to be subject to periodic sharp declines in periods of slow industrial world growth. In short, Mr. Chairman, there is little likelihood that export of commodities and other traditional products will be any more reliable as a stable source of development finance in Latin America and in other countries exporting these products in the future than they have been in the past.

Another problem that will remain in the region is its high debt burden. The nations of Latin America owe more than $300 billion to external creditors, with Brazil and Mexico each having an external debt in the $80 to $90 billion range. Though Brazil's financial situation is especially complicated and difficult, we appear to be in a period when the region's debt problems are not as stark and fraught with danger as was the case during the second half of 1982. The recent list of successful debt reschedulings, combined with broadening economic recovery and a general decline in international interest rate levels from their 1981–1982 peak, should make it somewhat easier for most Latin American countries to meet their external debt obligations during the next few years. Debt service, nonetheless, will continue to be a significant drain on their resources. To discharge their debt service while continuing to promote economic growth, Latin American countries will require increased capital inflows from export earnings, foreign investment, other private capital flows, and official financial assistance.

The social problems facing the hemisphere will also continue to be a central issue as countries pursue appropriate adjustment policies. We continue to see the pursuit of such policies, cushioned by support from the International Monetary Fund, Multilateral Development Banks, and the governments of industrialized countries, as the preferred alternative to the abrupt and disorderly adjustment that would otherwise be forced on such countries. In some cases social problems arising from the pursuit of adjustment policies will strain the region's social and political fabric. This will be true in Brazil, where the "abertura" process, which we have warmly applauded, is leading toward presidential elections in early 1985. I must admit, Mr. Chairman, that, despite my close familiarity with the Brazilian situation, I have no easy answers to the very real dilemma posed in the short-term by attempting to balance needed adjustment policies with the need to prevent further declines in living standards.

I don't want to sound like a complete pessimist, however. There are several encouraging trends on the horizon. Despite the extreme difficulty of implementing austerity measures during a recession, we have seen many countries in the region cooperate with the IMF to devise appropriate and achievable economic adjustment plans. Such plans, aimed at restoring equilibrium to external accounts and encouraging private sector and export-led development, deserve our support. I believe that this is especially true in Brazil, which is entering its third year of recession and where the living standards of the vast majority of the population are being squeezed. In contrast to the situation that prevailed a decade or two ago, the consensus among most economic policy makers in Latin America today is that solid and sustained economic development requires a major role for the private sector (including foreign investors) and that it requires the development of efficient firms which can compete in the international marketplace. Another idea gaining widespread acceptance is that the unchecked expansion of the public sector is a danger both to financial stability and to the efficient development of the economy. Many governments are adopting policies reflecting these views. This new trend in economic policy may prove to be the most significant economic trend currently underway in the region.

I am also encouraged by the way in which governments in and outside of the region, international financial institutions, and the international banking community have worked together to maintain a workable international financial system. Such cooperation is all the more laudable in the face of the debt crisis and other strains in the past year. I think that we can genuinely say that the system has worked remarkably well up to this point. Future efforts should be devoted to a strengthening of the framework of the current system rather than its replacement by a new and untested one.

One of the most welcome encouraging trends in Latin America is an increasing emphasis on democracy, even during such a time of extreme economic hardship. The movement toward democracy that we have witnessed during recent years in such places as Peru, Ecuador, Bolivia, Honduras, El Salvador, and Brazil is truly extraordinary. Equally impressive is the fact that some freely-elected governments such as Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, Jamaica, and others have been able to devise comprehensive adjustment programs for reacting to their severe economic problems.

Perhaps of most relevance to those of us here, Mr. Chairman, is the question of what the U.S. Government should be doing to encourage the positive trends and reverse the negative trends facing the countries in the hemisphere.

The President's Caribbean Basin Initiative is the centerpiece of our efforts to help the beleaguered and vulnerable countries of the Caribbean and Central America. These proposals are based on the recognition that the economic development of the Caribbean Basin countries requires greater integration of their small economies into the U.S. and world economies. I am greatly encouraged by the favorable action recently taken by the House and earlier by the Senate on the Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act. I believe that the enactment into law of the trade incentives and the convention tax credit will prove to be significant stimulus to countries of the region. We will move vigorously to implement this legislation following its enactment. Moreover, we believe that the economic and social development of the Caribbean Basin should be a collective effort by the international community. We will therefore continue our efforts to encourage other governments and appropriate international organizations to expand their assistance efforts in the region. I am especially pleased to note that three of our Latin American neighbors, Venezuela, Mexico, and Colombia, have joined with us and Canada in providing assistance to many of the needy countries in the region.

Throughout our history, the government and people of the United States have responded positively when natural disasters have struck. Beginning late last year, a quirk of nature known as the "El Niño" weather phenomenon has had a devastating impact on the peoples and governments of Peru, Ecuador, and Bolivia. More recently heavy rains and flooding linked to El Niño have caused widespread damage in Paraguay, Brazil, and Argentina. The U.S. Government has been responsive to requests for humanitarian assistance to meet emergency needs. In the Andean countries we are concerned that these natural disasters, which compound serious economic problems, will have a negative impact on the efforts of Ecuador, Peru, and Bolivia to consolidate and strengthen their still somewhat fragile democratic systems of government. Our assistance efforts thus far have included $6.75 million in direct disaster relief, a $5 million USAID reconstruction loan for Peru, and the allocation of an additional $52.3 million in food aid to Bolivia and Peru. We have also supported requests for reconstruction loans from the Multilateral Development Banks in excess of $100 million by these governments. We are currently exploring ways in which we might provide additional resources from our limited foreign economic assistance budget. We will keep the Congress fully informed on this matter.

In the broader context, we must continue our contributions, both bilaterally and multilaterally, to the economic and social development of the Latin American region. Individual country needs vary, but modernization of agriculture and infrastructure, and improvement of health and education systems, are general imperatives throughout the region. I would like to make a special appeal for greater attention to the need for U.S.-sponsored training and education, both technical and academic. Nothing pays greater long-term dividends than to provide the present and future leaders of Latin America, whether of government, business, or the professions, first-hand familiarity with our values, our expertise, and our approach to problem-solving.

While economic and technical assistance will play a part in helping deal with the region's problems, we must realize that trade, not aid, is the surest road to economic growth. Let me again cite the progress that Brazil has made in producing and exporting a wide variety of sophisticated products. Brazil, I must admit, possesses extensive natural resources and other advantages not found in many other countries. Nonetheless, I believe that there are various elements of the Brazilian experience that can usefully be applied to other countries of the region. For example, Brazil's response to the 1973–1974 oil shock was a massive investment in both alternate energy sources and an increase in oil and gas exploration within Brazil. The Government of Brazil has also encouraged the use of fuel-efficient vehicles and provided other incentives to foster energy conservation. Brazil's state oil company has since extended its exploration activities to other countries and has provided technical assistance to the oil companies in some of its neighbors.

Assuring that the U.S. market remains open to countries seeking export-led economic growth will be one of the most difficult challenges of the 1980's. Our efforts in this regard are made more difficult by the tendency of some of our trading partners, in Latin America and elsewhere, to use subsidies and other trade-distorting practices to provide an artificial boost to exports. Maintenance of realistic exchange rate policies, support for private investment, and a reduction in often-stifling government regulation are all elements of an export promotion policy that increases the likelihood of sustained development.

I would also like to add that expansion of trade among developing countries will be an important element in promoting sustained growth within these nations. The sharp drop off in intra-Latin American trade between 1981 and 1982 undoubtedly was an important factor in worsening the region's economic slowdown. Given the limits on the expansion of Latin America's exports to the United States and other industrialized countries, the countries of the hemisphere, with Brazil in the lead, are making additional efforts to penetrate nontraditional markets.

Protectionist measures are always strong during times of domestic economic hardship, but we must remind ourselves that dollars spent on our imports from Latin America return to the United States in payment for our exports. For every U.S. job threatened by imports there is another job, or more than one job, that depends on our exports and on the ability of other countries to pay for those imports.

Our concerted participation in efforts to strengthen the international financial system should go hand in hand with our efforts to bring about an expansion of world trade. We must continue to support efforts by the IMF and other international institutions to help countries with serious financial problems. I think that it is also important that we encourage U.S. private financial institutions to maintain their prudent involvement in Latin America. As a government we must be prepared to make available short-term emergency financial assistance in appropriate cases. At home we must continue policies to ensure the solid and sustained recovery of our own economy. Latin America's economic future is so dependent on developments in the United States and other industrialized nations that we cannot view that region's economic development in isolation from our own.

Thank you very much.

Document 604

Statement by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for International Affairs (Leland) Before Two Subcommittees of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, July 21, 1983 [6]

"The IMF Is Really at the Heart of Our Whole Strategy"

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. [7]

It is nice to be back before this committee. I am not new, so I probably look a little more fatigued than the other two, although I think Ambassador Motley has been through a lot in the past 2 years as well.

I will restrict my comments to 5 minutes to maximize the time for the questioning that I am sure the committee has.

The history of where we are has been referred to by the previous speakers, how we had periods of high inflation and heavy borrowing, how the fact that even without a debt crisis many of these countries still would have severe problems, developing countries that would normally have problems that Mr. McPherson referred to. [8]

We do, of course, have a situation whereby you were talking about debt of developing countries, about $600 billion in 1982 whereas in 1973 you were talking about a number somewhere near one-fifth of that. That is a big burden.

The problem, I note, is not limited just to the Latin American region. It is probably greater there than in any other region. The fact is that available financing is a problem that exists throughout the world because the borrowing primarily came from recycling of the oil price increases.

The $200 billion of that $600 billion is owed by Mexico, Argentina, and Brazil alone. You can add another $65 or $70 billion by other non-OPEC nations in Latin America and another $40 billion by the OPEC nations in Latin America.

Now, I think handling the problem is by no means easy. I think in testifying before this committee previously and several other committees we have laid out the strategy we have, which has been referred to by earlier speakers, which basically is adjustment by the debtor countries.

The other elements of the strategy include IMF assistance in support of adjustment programs, emergency official assistance which is included in the aid we are talking about, for example bridge financing in the case of Brazil and Mexico, continued commercial bank lending, and sustained world economic growth with open markets.

Since most of these have been referred to earlier and you are familiar with them, I want to take some time on the IMF aspect because it is on our mind. I sometimes think the fact that we do not, as the Chairman noted at the beginning, seem to have the unanimous support for the IMF that I would otherwise hope for or expect, is a matter of insufficient explanation of what we are after. [9] Otherwise, I don't quite understand why we don't get fairly unanimous support for this.

The IMF is really at the center of our whole strategy. Without it you have a debt problem with no solution to it. The IMF has been central to everything that has been going on, particularly going on since IMF was created.

You have had a lot of problems, you have had times when people said Indonesia could never make it. There were times when people said Turkey could not make it.

[9] For Barnes' opening remarks, and those of Don Bonker, Chairman of the Subcommittee on International Economic Policy and Trade, see ibid., pp. 187–191.

Beginning last August we had a situation where you said Mexico could never do it, or Brazil, and in each case the IMF has been central to solving the problem.

When you look at our five-point program [10] the IMF is the central point to working with the countries to develop an adjustment program. Central to all this is adjustment. There has been an extensive amount of borrowing, an extensive amount of budget deficits that were unsustainable, and now the countries have to adjust.

In many cases for political reasons they can't do it basically on their own. They need to work together with the IMF. That is what is happening in the region we are talking about.

Mexico has embarked on a $3.9 billion program with IMF. Brazil has embarked on a $4.5 billion program. It is still having a certain amount of difficulty. In the last few days things are looking much better.

The Brazilians are seriously working toward the necessary adjustment. Argentina, Chile, Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, Uruguay, Ecuador, and Panama have all initiated IMF-supported adjustment programs in the last 6 months.

The IMF has been absolutely key because it is the IMF that first goes in and provides funding. It is because of that funding that the countries are able to make some sort of adjustment program and it is because of that that you are able to have the continued commercial bank lending.

Obviously in most of these cases you are talking about a situation in the 1980's that didn't exist in the 1960's or even the early seventies. In that period these countries relied basically on government financing. Now they have relied basically on commercial bank financing.

The commercial banks I think can and will remain as lenders to these countries. Running current account deficits, I have to note here because I think it does get forgotten, is something that is not new in history. The United States ran them for, I think 45 of the 60 years between 1800 and 1860 and 30 of the 40 years between 1860 and 1900.

Japan and Germany after the war ran substantial current account deficits. Japan did not get into a surplus until the 1960's. I think for a developing country while it is building up its economy, it is not an unusual thing.

The main point is, however, if they are not following the correct economic policies, then the banks or whatever funding source they have, tend to pull back. It is very important for us that these funding sources remain there. For that the IMF itself is key.

The IMF alone, without the world growth and open trading system the previous speakers have spoken about, won't solve the problem. I do think the statistics that came out today show the level of our own recovery is quite buoyant.

I just came back from Europe and Japan. Although I think they are not as optimistic as they might be, they do see hopes for recovery. But in this transition period we have to keep our purchasers, the countries that have been buying our product, and look to where the trade is coming from.

We have to keep them alive in this interim period until recovery comes. For that the IMF itself is the key element because it does develop the adjustment programs and through that we feel that the debt situation itself will remain manageable. We will have problems with it.

Obviously the level of debt is larger than anyone would have liked it to be; but I think with adjustment of the problems the countries will come back to being the major buyers they were before and get back to the former growth rate they were used to having in the seventies.

Thank you.

Agreement Adopted by the Organization of American States Special Specialized Conference on External Financing, Caracas, Undated [11]

Bases For Understanding

1. The present crisis is undoubtedly the worst in 50 years. The economic effects of the crisis on the industrialized countries are not the same as those experienced by the developing countries, with their lower levels of income and capital accumulation, and high population growth.

Over the past three years, per capita income in Latin America and the Caribbean has fallen by five percent, resulting in widespread poverty. In 1982, the savings coefficient shrank by three percent, exports and imports fell by 6 and 19 percent, respectively, and between 1980 and 1982, the region's terms of trade dropped a damaging 40 percent. The current account on the balance of payments registered an accumulated deficit over the last four years of US $119 billion. At the same time, net capital accumulation fell and net payments of profits and interest rose to US $34 billion in 1982, which represents approximately 40 percent of the value of merchandise exports.

The net loss of international reserves by Latin American and Caribbean countries has been estimated for 1982 at U.S. $14 billion, which is an economically depressing factor. It is causing a reduction in economic activity, real incomes and employment throughout the region, as well as increasing inflationary pressures, all of which have inevitable social and political impact.

The external debt at the end of 1982 stood at more than US $300 billion, greater than triple the value of Latin American and Caribbean exports. Clearly, the unfavorable turn that the world economy has taken makes it necessary to reassess the overall payment capacity of the Latin American economies, which at present limits their development prospects.

2. Internal factors in countries of Latin America and the Caribbean have played an important role in bringing about the present crisis; however it is recognized to be mainly the result of external factors. The increasing deterioration of terms of trade, growing protectionism, high real interest rates—a result inter alia of significant fiscal deficits in the industrialized countries, including the United States—and the sudden reduction of financial flows and public and private investment are factors beyond the control of the countries of the region and make more difficult the internal efforts and measures that have been taken, especially over the last 12 months.

3. Faced with the crisis, the Latin American and Caribbean countries are making extraordinary readjustment efforts within their economies and are taking steps to comply with their international commitments, in spite of the high social, political and economic costs involved. At the same time, anti-inflationary policies of the industrialized countries to correct their economic problems have aggravated considerably the problems confronting the Latin American and Caribbean countries.

The efforts to make adjustments must necessarily be equitable and coordinated for all who are involved in the economic phenomenon that has brought about the current situation, namely, creditor and debtor countries, multilateral financial institutions and international private banks.

4. The crisis is structural and worldwide; any attempts at resolution will need to take this into account, as well as the various specific factors that brought it about and their interrelation.

In the context of the crisis, the problems of external financing; particularly those of the external debt, financing of commerce and international trade, are of high priority. The way in which they may be resolved will depend, to a large degree, on the validity of the options that would make it possible to overcome the grave economic and social problems affecting the Latin American and Caribbean countries and maintain a rhythm of development which allows for a true level of progress, the only source of social and political stability.

A note on the source text indicates that the agreement was published during the conference as document CONFINAN/17, rev. 3. The conference took place in two stages: the first, at the level of government experts, met from September 5 to 7, 1983; and the second, at the ministerial level, was held from September 8 to 9, 1983.

5. An effort has been made by multilateral financial institutions, the International Monetary Fund in particular, to help the countries in their adjustment efforts. Also, the United States has taken extraordinary measures to help in emergency situations in some countries. Assistance, which was short-term in nature, has not been sufficient to obtain permanent solutions and, therefore, should be made adequate in order to satisfactorily contribute to a reversal of the present situation and any tendency for it to deepen.

6. The Latin American and Caribbean countries require that the internal adjustment process be gradual so that it take into account social and political conditions of each country. Thus, additional economic cooperation is needed, which will enable the region to raise the level of internal adjustment so as to prevent the destruction of an important part of installed productive capacity and maintain an adequate level of domestic economic activity, compatible with social and political stability and the requirements of development. The multilateral financial institutions should contribute to the solution of the present crisis, playing a more active role in the transfer of resources for the financing of development and trade. Such transfers should be equitable and nondiscriminatory. A joint effort between the United States, other creditor governments and debtor countries is to our mutual benefit, in order to create the conditions for sustained an orderly development in the Latin American and Caribbean countries.

7. The drastic reduction of Latin American and Caribbean imports has contributed to the recessionary process in the industrialized countries, the United States in particular. The rapid and sustained recovery of the level of Latin American and Caribbean imports will stimulate an expansive cycle of the world economy.

8. The recovery of the industrialized economies, especially that of the United States, is a necessary factor in solving the problems of Latin America and the Caribbean; for this reason the region looks hopefully at the positive signs emanating from those economies. However, it is not enough; the region also needs a reduction in fiscal deficits, a lowering of interest rates, increased capital flows, improvement in terms of trade, greater access to foreign markets, especially that of the United States (due to the importance of that market to the Latin American and Caribbean economies), as well as measures aimed at recovering and expanding intraregional trade. Solid and lasting recovery in the United States and the rest of the industrialized countries can only be achieved by confronting the problems of developing countries, Latin America and the Caribbean in particular, in such a way as to provide internal and external conditions for their development.

9. Within the context of the grave situation that has been presented here, the countries participating in this conference reaffirm the need and urgency to find permanent solutions to the problem of the external debt of the Latin American and Caribbean countries which is necessary to ensure the growth of international liquidity, consistent with the gradual process of adjustment; to improve operational procedures and review the principles of conditionality in the allocation of resources by the international financial organizations, and to avoid restrictions on access to capital markets. Such access should be under reasonable and equitable conditions. It is equally important to review international trade policies. All of this should be done with full participation of the developing countries in the decision making process.

10. Once again, Latin American and Caribbean countries express their willingness to strengthen a constructive dialogue with the United States. To this end they ratify the proposals they have made—agreed to in regional and interregional assemblies and presented subsequently in various international fora—for achieving an equitable distribution of the adjustment costs and to make possible, thereby, the adequate functioning of the international economic system, which would foster the economic and social development of the region, with special consideration given to the small states. For its part, the United States reaffirms its willingness to strengthen the dialogue with its neighbors in the hemisphere within the context of this document.

11. The Latin American and Caribbean countries consider that the present crisis should be faced realistically, rationally, and prudently, and they reaffirm their historic acceptance of their international commitments and their rejection of all pressures that might affect their independence and sovereignty.

Address by the Under Secretary of the Treasury for Monetary Affairs (Sprinkel) Before the Organization of American States Special Specialized Conference on External Financing, Caracas, September 9, 1983 [12]

"I Strongly Believe the Present and Future Prosperity of Our Peoples Are Inseparable"

I am very happy to be here to participate in the Ministerial portion of this Conference. First, I would like to thank President Herrera Campins and our Venezuelan hosts for their exceptional hospitality. Secondly, the careful preparation by the OAS Secretariat and the hard work and dedication of the participants during the past four days are also praiseworthy.

We are [here] in a spirit of genuine cooperation and shared concern for the economic and social welfare of the people of this hemisphere. I am particularly pleased that the discussions have been fruitful, while following a realistic and constructive path. I believe that the conference has been a success.

I also believe this is a significant achievement given the difficult and controversial issues we have addressed. We have established a genuine communication which we must have among members of our hemispheric family, with so many common interests, goals and economic relationships.

I strongly believe the present and future prosperity of our peoples are inseparable. It is in our own best interests that all of our neighbors prosper. This is a concept that hard-headed businessmen, skeptical legislators, and over-burdened taxpayers can all understand. The present crisis in Latin America and the sharp drop in trade has an immediate and perceptible effect on our economies. There is an obvious lesson: that the unit of analysis for the policymaker can no longer be limited to each nation's domestic economy.

A great deal of time of the Technical Meetings was spent on preparing the paper entitled, "Bases for Understanding," [13] and the resolutions for future studies, which have been submitted to this Ministerial Meeting. I believe a great step forward was made with the completion of these documents. It is evident that where we have the will, we can work together to come to agreements on problems and solutions.

While confirming the United States support for the paper, "Bases for Understanding" and the resolutions for follow-up developed by this Conference, I would like to make a few comments on our views on the present situation and progress towards permanent solutions.

The United States delegate in his statement to the Technical Meeting described the five-point strategy which was agreed to by the major industrial countries at the Williamsburg Summit. [14] As you heard, that strategy includes:

1. Adjustment by the debtor countries;

2. IMF assistance in support of effective adjustment programs;

3. Ad-hoc emergency government and central bank assistance from creditor countries;

4. Continued commercial bank lending; and

5. Sustained world economic growth with open markets.

Adjustment

I have spoken with many of you about the measures your countries have taken to adjust to the changed international environment. Our conversations have enhanced my appreciation of the political and social costs. Nevertheless, we must recognize that domestic adjustment in each country is the sine qua non of any effort to arrest a deteriorating payments situation. No amount of bridge lending or bank rescheduling or development assistance can have any enduring effect if the hard political decisions are delayed.

I would like to point out that we are not blithely urging you down a road which we have never traveled. I point this out because I believe it is important to recognize that the industrial countries, too, are faced with difficult economic adjustment and have been making progress, particularly in controlling inflation and returning to the path of sustainable economic growth. While we realize that the United States may be better able than some other nations to moderate the pressures of domestic adjustment, the social costs we have experienced have not been negligible. But our future health demanded bitter medicine. I am happy to say that the need for such corrective policies is recognized by most of the major debtor countries and in many cases they are acting with the assistance of the IMF.

International Monetary Fund

We recognize that financial resources must be adequate to permit a gradual adjustment process. Accordingly, the second element of the strategy for dealing with problem countries is to ensure continued official balance of payments financing on a scale sufficient to help the borrowers through the adjustment period. The key institution for this purpose is the International Monetary Fund, which provides balance-of-payments financing to ease the strains of adjustment. IMF support acts as a catalyst for additional commercial bank lending.

In recognition of the central role of the IMF in resolving debt problems, the member countries of the IMF are in the process of increasing the Fund's quota resources by 47 percent, and are expanding the amounts of and access to the General Arrangements to Borrow. The United States Administration is dedicated to obtaining final approval by the Congress of United States participation in the increase in IMF resources.

Inter-American Development Bank

With reference to development assistance, we have recently completed negotiations for an increase in the resources of the Inter-American Development Bank. The IDB's Sixth Replenishment will do much to ensure that the countries of Latin America and the Caribbean will have continued and increased access to external development assistance.

The proposed increases in IDB capital resources of almost $15 billion and $700 million in the Fund for Special Operations are expected to support lending 40 percent greater than in the last replenishment period.

The United States has strongly encouraged the establishment of an Inter-American Investment Corporation, under the auspices of the IDB which will focus on private sector lending to the region. Our strong support for this new facility derives from our firmly held belief that, in the final analysis, true wealth creation and economic prosperity come from the private sector. The Inter-American Investment Corporation would give priority to investments in small and medium-scale private enterprises in Latin America.

Foreign Direct Investment

We believe that in the current environment of widespread international debt problems, foreign direct investment flows take on increased importance. A free and open international investment climate can play a key role in resolving those problems. I would hope that all countries here will keep in mind that foreign direct investment could continue to be an important source of financing.

Protectionism

Of course, the most important source of foreign exchange is open trade. The relationship among trade, finance, and debt problems is becoming more evident. Obviously, debtor countries must be able to increase their exports to service their debts and improve their balance of payments situation. Protectionism cuts off the major channel for this export expansion, thus forestalling the resolution of liquidity problems.

We have been working with other industrialized countries to foster an awareness that protectionism harms the ability of developing countries to expand their economies and that noninflationary developed country growth provides an environment conducive to stable trade and financial relations.

Adequate financing for developing countries is needed to maintain essential imports. However, some debtors must recognize that they will hamper their own recovery if, in seeking to postpone their balance-of-payments adjustment they employ exchange, trade, and investment restrictions, distorting market incentives and leading to economic inefficiencies. I am convinced that resisting protectionist pressures will benefit all countries, creditor and debtor.

World Recovery

Finally, I would like to say a few words on the world recovery because I understand there is some skepticism about the strength, importance and sustainability of the recovery.

Last April during the IDB annual Meeting I was very optimistic about the United States recovery and I am happy to say our optimism was justified. We are certain world recovery has begun, especially in the United States. Inflation rates are coming down. Nominal interest rates have fallen. United States economic activity is picking up dramatically. Successful recovery in the United States is creating an environment conducive to renewed growth in the developing countries.

Outlook

I'd like to return now to the immediate subject at hand—how we assess both the actions to date and the prospects for the future.

The past twelve months have been a turbulent time for the international financial system. Last year's IMF/IBRD annual meetings in Toronto were held in an atmosphere of crisis and foreboding. [15] As we approach this year's meeting, the problem appears more manageable, and the mood is cautiously optimistic.

I believe this mood of increased confidence is justified for the following reasons: first, international monetary authorities have shown that the existing financial system can respond effectively and flexibly to unexpected major shocks. Cooperation among the BIS, the IMF, the industrialized countries' monetary authorities—and equally important, the finance ministries and central banks of the largest debtor countries—averted constriction of world liquidity and financial panic.

Second: basic economic conditions in the industrialized countries have improved. The OECD countries, the major export markets for Latin America and the Caribbean, should grow around 3 percent this year and strengthen further in 1984.

Third: our countries are, in general, making good progress adjusting; taking the difficult political and financial steps necessary to bring balances of payments into line. This will lay the foundation for renewed economic growth and development.

Fourth: progress is being made on securing the necessary resources for the IMF. Britain has passed its quota increase. So has Germany. After extended deliberations, both houses of the United States Congress have passed the authorization for the United States share of the increase, [16] although further actions will be necessary before the end of the year. The resources of the IDB are being increased and the World Bank Special Action Program and structural adjustment loans are providing additional help.

These four factors are restoring confidence in the strength and flexibility of the existing international financial system, the resiliency of markets, and the ability of governments to manage crises.

In conclusion, I would like to emphasize that we do not for a moment under-estimate the difficulty of the decisions we are making and the impact on our people.

But I also want to emphasize that this extreme situation is temporary. Once significant adjustments are made, the underlying strength and promise of our economies will re-emerge with dynamism and vi-

We look forward to working with you to hasten the arrival of that day, and to working with you thereafter in achieving the potential of this beautiful [bountiful] hemisphere.

Prepared Statement by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for International Affairs (Leland) Before a Subcommittee of the House Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs Committee, September 13, 1983 [17]

"The United States Has a Direct Stake In Resolving the International Debt Situation"

I am pleased to appear before this subcommittee to discuss the guarantee and insurance facilities which Eximbank is ready to approve for Brazil and Mexico. [18] The facilities would consist of medium-term guarantees and short- and medium-term insurance to be provided under Eximbank's exporter credit programs of up to $1.5 billion for Brazil and of up to $500 million for Mexico.

The administration heartily endorses these facilities. We believe they are necessary to maintain U.S. exports to these two important U.S. markets, and to support imports of vital raw materials, spare parts, and capital goods required to help maintain functioning Mexican and Brazilian economies. In addition, these facilities will complement the financing being provided by the International Monetary Fund, other official creditors, and commercial banks in support of the adjustment programs adopted by Brazil and Mexico.

The use of Eximbank for such purposes was not unforeseen. The facilities generally fall within the parameters of normal Eximbank programs. These facilities do, however, have two unusual features: the amounts involved and the conditions for their use.

Prior to any use of the facilities, the following conditions will have to be met: (1) the country shall be in compliance with its International Monetary Fund Extended Fund Facility; (2) commercial banks shall be prepared to give an additional financing program for the recipient; and (3) other creditor nations shall also be prepared to provide financial support. In the case of Mexico, appropriate bilateral and implementing agreements with the United States shall have been signed pursuant to any multilateral debt rescheduling arrangement.

In order to put these facilities in context, I would first like to outline the administration's policy toward the international debt problem and, in particular, the role of export credit institutions. Second, I would like to summarize the role Eximbank has played in the U.S. Government response to the international debt problems thus far. Third, I would like to briefly review the financial and economic problems facing Brazil and Mexico which have prompted the multilateral effort to assist them in their adjustment process. Finally, I want to explain the important role that the special conditions on the use of these Eximbank facilities will play, both in meeting the Bank's legislative requirements and encouraging multilateral cooperation by both private and official lenders in unwinding the current debt problems of Mexico and Brazil.

[18] On September 29, 1983, the Subcommittee on International Trade, Investment and Monetary Policy unanimously approved House Resolution 316, which expressed the sense of the House of Representatives that the Export-Import Bank should delay establishment of its Brazil and Mexico facilities "until the Congress has an opportunity to review such transactions." On September 30, the Export-Import Bank's directors voted to approve the Brazil and Mexico facilities. For information on these actions, see Export-Import Bank Facilities for Brazil and Mexico, pp. 94–104.

International Debt Problem and the U.S. Response

Over the past year, the international financial system has been confronted with serious problems as a result of (a) the size of the international debts of several key countries, (b) the inadequacy of their adjustment policies, and (c) the adverse effects of world economic recession on their debt service capacity. In response to growing concern over the international debt problem, lenders began to retrench sharply, and the borrowing countries have since been finding it increasingly difficult to raise normal amounts of trade finance to pay for essential imports. Last year, net new bank lending to non-OPEC LDC's dropped by one-third, to about $32 billion for the year as a whole, and came to a virtual standstill for a time at midyear.

There has been much discussion of whether the current debt problems of many developing countries constitute a "liquidity problem" or one of "insolvency." Most analysts, particularly in assessing the cases of the middle and upper level income developing countries such as Brazil and Mexico, have concluded that such countries are confronted with a temporary, if very serious, liquidity problem, and not one of insolvency. We share that view. We believe that, with proper adjustment policies, most troubled debtors should be able to restore their ability to service their international debts. However, orderly and effective economic adjustment will take time to accomplish, and cannot take place without some continued financial flows, especially from commercial banks.

Current account deficits sustained over long periods are not by themselves evidence of insolvency. During the 19th century, the United States ran a current account deficit which was offset by investment flows necessary to develop our economy. However, such current account deficits need to be matched by sufficiently sound economic policies to encourage the necessary capital inflows. Mexico and Brazil have run into liquidity problems because of their economic policies and large foreign borrowings.

The International Monetary Fund has a central role in our strategy for managing international debt problems, due to its ability to negotiate effective adjustment programs with troubled countries. The IMF provides temporary balance of payments financing in support of these adjustment programs, and more importantly its programs imply a "seal of approval" which gives private lenders the confidence to resume new lending.

At times, we have found it necessary to provide short-term official financing to bridge the time needed to negotiate an IMF program. For this purpose, the Treasury's Exchange Stabilization Fund (ESF) and the Federal Reserve provided $2.5 billion to Mexico and $1.9 billion to Brazil, amounts which have since been fully repaid.

Over the longer term, the adoption of export-oriented policies by debtor countries, the avoidance of protectionist measures in both debtor and creditor countries, and world economic recovery are key elements necessary to restore stability in the international financial system and to revive the growth of world trade. Maintenance of trade finance flows can play a crucial role in allowing this strategy to work.

The United States has a direct stake in resolving the international debt situation. At the extreme, it could threaten the stability of our financial system. Even in its present form, it is having a significant negative impact.

Recent data from the Department of Commerce illustrate the severe impact of the liquidity problems of Brazil and Mexico on U.S. exports and consequently U.S. employment:

(1) U.S. exports to Mexico, our third largest trading partner, declined sharply in 1982 and have continued their steep decline in the first part of 1983. U.S. exports dropped 36.5 percent from $17.4 billion in 1981 to $11.0 billion in 1982. Our exports totaled only $4.2 billion in the first half of 1983, 39 percent lower than the level of nearly $7.0 billion for the first half of 1982. Most of the decline was in exports of manufactured goods. U.S. agricultural exports to Mexico have not declined significantly because the Commodity Credit Corporation (CCC) responded to the contraction in trade finance and the Mexican crop failure by providing $1.3 billion in guarantees to support U.S. agricultural exports.

(2) U.S. exports to Brazil fell steeply in the first half of 1983 following moderate declines in 1981 and 1982. U.S. exports totaled only $1.22 billion January–June, 1983, 30 percent lower than the level of $1.76 billion for the first half of 1982. If the current trend continues throughout all of 1983, U.S. exports to Brazil would be almost 50 percent below 1980 levels.

Due to the extent and complexity of the liquidity problems faced by key debtor countries such as Brazil and Mexico, external financing must come from a variety of sources and in a variety of forms. The most important is increased lending and debt relief from commercial banks to countries which are following appropriate adjustment programs. However, there is also a need for official finance from sources such as the International Monetary Fund, debt relief from official creditors through Paris Club rescheduling,[19] and official trade finance from major creditor countries to ensure financing of imports crucial to debtor country adjustment.

In this context, there is an important role for U.S. Government trade finance programs, such as CCC and Eximbank, to play in responding to countries experiencing extraordinary liquidity problems. Trade finance programs can help develop market confidence, promote additional commercial bank lending check the decline of U.S. exports resulting from debt problems, and facilitate LDC adjustment efforts. Official export programs can be adapted (1) so as to catalyze U.S. private sector participation, rather than relieve the bankers and exporters of reasonable and appropriate levels of risk, and (2) so as to not distort normal trade credit patterns. We believe such facilities should be used to help reestablish private trade finance activities.

The administration foresaw an important role for Eximbank in responding to international debt problems in the 1980's. We have expected a contraction in Eximbank direct credits as the demand for subsidized export credits fades in light of falling commercial interest rates. At the same time, we have predicted a major increase in the demand for guarantees and insurance to ensure the continued availability of private credit for U.S. exports in the face of the debt problems which were making private lenders reluctant to continue extending trade finance. The implication was that the best way that Eximbank could promote additional U.S. exports would be to shift from subsidized financing to maintaining the availability of private financing.

The need to respond quickly to the economic and financial problems facing Brazil and Mexico and the adverse impact of these problems on the U.S. economy, as well as a desire to make the most effective use of the budgetary resources available to Eximbank in FY '83 and FY '84, were the primary considerations in approving these facilities at this time. These facilities coincide with ongoing multilateral efforts to deal with these countries' liquidity problems, such as the pending Brazil/IMF agreement and our efforts to promote burdensharing among commercial banks and other official creditors. Since Eximbank had excess guarantee and insurance authority for FY '83, we felt it would be appropriate to authorize these facilities at this time.

Eximbank's Response to the International Debt Problem

Generally, Eximbank has remained open for business in most markets, even in the face of the international debt problem. Eximbank has taken a country-by-country, case-by-case approach to supporting U.S. exports through its direct credit, guarantee and insurance programs. Under its normal programs, it is estimated that Eximbank will authorize almost $1.0 billion in direct credits and $5 billion in guarantee and insurance authority in FY '83.

As liquidity problems mounted in key Latin American countries such as Mexico and Brazil, and as traditional sources of trade finance began to dry up, it became increasingly evident that recent levels of credit guarantees and insurance would not be adequate to sustain the flow of U.S. exports. Additional guarantees and insurance would have the added benefit of supporting the adjustment programs and restoring the confidence of the international financial community.

Brazilian and Mexican Economies

Brazil: Brazil faces a severe financing gap during the balance of 1983 and 1984 that threatens to cause a further substantial contraction in trade. Early in the 1980's Brazilian economic policies, which emphasized an accelerated growth rate and which external creditors were willing to finance, resulted in a 33 percent increase in external debt from $63 billion in 1980 to over $80 billion in 1982. During the same period, interest and the repayment of principal on maturing debt consumed an estimated 80 percent of foreign exchange earnings. The crisis was precipitated in 1982 as (1) Brazil's economic adjustment effort faltered; (2) a worldwide recession reduced export earnings; (3) high interest rates increased the burden of existing debt; and (4) Brazil found itself unable to cut imports enough to offset these adverse developments. As a result, the current account deficit surged from $11.7 billion in 1981 to $14.7 billion in 1982. By late 1982, Brazil's need for new financing to finance the deficit and to service its international debt was considerably greater than its ability to attract new private lending. At the same time, Brazil's foreign exchange reserves were vanishing.

[19] Under the International Monetary Fund's General Arrangements to Borrow, established in 1962, 10 of the wealthiest industrial members of the IMF "stand ready to lend their currencies to the IMF up to specified amounts when supplementary resources are needed." This Group of 10 is also called the Paris Club.

In the first round of exceptional financing arrangements for Brazil, the Bank for International Settlements provided a $1.4 billion loan, and the U.S. Treasury provided additional short-term support in excess of $1.2 billion. In February 1983, Brazil and the commercial banks agreed on a four part program providing for a rescheduling of $4.8 billion in maturing medium-term debt, confirmation of $10 billion in short-term trade credits, extension of $4.4 billion in a new medium-term facility and restoration of interbank lines of credit to the mid-1982 level of over $9 billion. This package was complemented by a $4.9 billion IMF 3-year Extended Fund Facility and $1.0 billion in CFF drawings.

These financing arrangements broke down in the spring of 1983, principally because not all banks were willing to maintain target levels for interbank deposits. Also, Brazil did not meet its performance targets under the IMF program and was out of compliance by the end of May. As a consequence, the IMF withheld a scheduled disbursement of $411 million. The commercial banks in turn held back on disbursing a $634 million installment of their new $4.4 billion medium-term facility which had been linked to successful performance under the IMF program.

At midyear, in recognition of the inadequacy of its adjustment effort, the Government of Brazil began implementing many of the necessary further policy measures. Since then, wage indexation has been reduced, subsidies are being curtailed, public spending is being restrained, a tight monetary policy is being implemented, and some new taxes have been added.

This month the IMF and Brazil are expected to reach a tentative agreement on new economic targets and on performance criteria which should be presented to the IMF Executive Board before the end of October. This reinforced adjustment effort may prove to be economically, socially, and politically very difficult, but it demonstrates the determination of the Brazilian authorities to deal with underlying problems. Also, it provides the basis for the resumption of complementary financial support from official and private creditors.

The Brazilian economy is going through a very difficult adjustment process. Foreign financing obtained to cover the very large current account deficits (totaling $39 billion) experienced in the last 3 years (1980–82) has compounded Brazil's current debt burden. The measures necessary to contain and then correct the situation all imply a sharp contraction in domestic demand over the next 18 months. The current account deficit should drop to about $7.5 billion in 1983 from $14.7 billion in 1982, and next year should bring a small further improvement to about $6 billion.

Even deficits of this size present a continuing financing problem. On current estimates, additional financing of nearly $11 billion will have to be found for the remainder of this year and for 1984. Discussions are now underway within the banking community and among creditor governments in a cooperative effort to mobilize the financing needed to support Brazil's renewed adjustment effort.

Mexico: As in the Brazilian case, Mexico's debt crisis was precipitated by a combination of rapid growth in international debt, high interest rates, declining export revenues in the worldwide recession, and inadequate adjustment efforts. As private lenders became increasingly reluctant to extend new financing, Mexico experienced a dramatic drop in imports and in economic activity in the latter half of 1982. Imports fell from $9.2 billion in the first half of the year to only $5.2 billion in the last half. Total imports for the year, at $14.4 billion, were 41 percent below 1981. Most of this drop came at the expense of U.S. exports to Mexico, which fell by $6.0 billion between 1981 and 1982.

To assist the Mexican authorities while they reached agreement with the International Monetary Fund and with their creditor banks, governments in creditor nations extended a total of $3.85 billion in financial assistance. Most of this assistance came from the United States in the form of a $1 billion advance payment by the Department of Energy for the purchase of crude oil for the Strategic Petroleum Reserve (SPR), $1 billion in CCC guarantees for U.S. agricultural exports to Mexico, and $925 million in short-term assistance from the Treasury's Exchange Stabilization Fund and the Federal Reserve. An additional $925 million was provided by treasuries and central banks in ten other industrial countries. The entire $1.85 billion package of short-term assistance was repaid on schedule by August.

Subsequently, the export credit agencies of the principal creditor governments agreed to a package of about $2 billion in additional export credit guarantee lines of which the U.S. share was half. Of the U.S. share, $300 million came in new Eximbank lines and $700 million in CCC credit guarantees. The large amounts of CCC guarantees have been particularly helpful at a time when Mexico has been experiencing drought conditions and has needed to import considerable amounts of agricultural goods from the United States.

In June, Mexico's official creditors agreed to a rescheduling which will provide about $1.7 billion in debt relief through the end of this year, with a possibility of further relief later. Commercial banks in turn have extended $5 billion in net new loans in 1983 and have been rescheduling about $20 billion in medium-term public sector debt. Arrangements have already been agreed to for about $11 billion of this rescheduling, with the remainder still under negotiation.

The IMF 3-year Extended Fund Facility arrangement which was approved last December focuses on a reduction in the public sector deficit, from 18.6 percent of GDP in 1982 to 8.5 percent this year. In order to promote exports, Mexico is to manage its exchange rate flexibly in the controlled exchange market, and eventual unification of the multiple rate system is contemplated. Limits have been set on total credit expansion and, separately, on credit to the public sector. Interest rates are to be managed flexibly, aimed at efficient market allocation of credit and promotion of savings.

Thus far, Mexico has remained in compliance with its Fund commitments and has been eligible to make drawings on schedule. Greater progress has been made in reducing the current account deficit than originally anticipated. The target for 1983 was a deficit of $4.2 billion. Current forecasts suggest that there may actually be a surplus of $1–2 billion. However, to a considerable extent, this reflects slower economic activity and lower import demand than originally expected. Real growth this year is now expected to be negative, by as much as 5 percent, compared to the zero growth originally envisaged. Achievement of positive real growth next year may also prove to be difficult.

In any case, Mexico's foreign liquidity problems are not yet over. Foreign reserves remain very low and some net new financing from commercial banks may be needed next year. Also, if Mexico is to maintain a tolerable level of imports this year and next, it will need a steady flow of trade finance, in the face of continued reluctance by commercial banks and foreign suppliers to increase, or even maintain, current levels of exposure.

Eximbank Facilities for Brazil and Mexico

As I have already mentioned, Eximbank is prepared to respond to these liquidity problems by providing special insurance and guarantee facilities to ensure that financing remains available to support a continued flow of U.S. exports to Brazil and Mexico. The new Brazilian facility is directed to complement the IMF program and contribute to the multilateral financing efforts to help Brazil through its current difficulties. The Mexican facility will strengthen the Mexican recovery effort by acting both as a catalyst for continuing support by the international financial community and as a secure source of financing for U.S. exports.

Advantages of Insurance/Guarantee Facilities: The new facilities have the following advantages:

—Such facilities help ensure the availability of trade finance and thus help fill financing gaps caused by liquidity problems.

—Eximbank is requiring the full faith and credit obligation of the recipient government for these facilities. Such government guarantees would not generally be available to commercial lenders if Eximbank had not been involved. The government guarantee contributes to a finding of "reasonable assurance of repayment."

—Eximbank insurance and guarantee programs to sovereign public buyers cover 100 percent of principal and a significant portion of the interest rate.

—The facilities allow maximum flexibility to the debtor government in responding to its liquidity problem. These governments can determine the priority of products to be covered, as well as which U.S. exporters and banks would have access to the facilities.

—The facilities can be structured to generate additional liquidity support if commercial bank access to the facilities is contingent upon the banks' participation up to their fair share in other new lending, at their own risk.

—The facilities will take into account the need to support U.S. export sales to the private sector as well as sales to public sector entities.

—The facilities can be implemented rapidly.

Conditions: The new Eximbank facilities for Brazil and Mexico will only be part of a much larger multilateral effort. This effort includes (1) an IMF program; (2) additional new commercial bank financing; (3) official finance from other governments; and (4) rescheduling of existing debt. To ensure that such a multilateral effort takes place, we have insisted that four conditions be met before the facilities can be triggered. I would like to explain these conditions in greater detail, particularly in light of the specifics of the Mexican and Brazilian situations.

(1) The facilities should only be available if the debtor country remains in compliance with IMF stabilization programs.

The condition that the debtor country remain in compliance with an IMF stabilization program is necessary to ensure that appropriate adjustment policies are in place and to show that the debtor country offers reasonable prospects of repaying its debt. Compliance with an IMF program is also a precondition for the disbursement of funds by other participants in the multilateral financing effort—the IMF, other official creditors, and commercial banks.

In Brazil, disbursements under the IMF's $4.8 billion Extended Fund Facility were discontinued when Brazil fell out of compliance with IMF targets in May. The IMF management and Brazil are expected to reach an agreement this month on revised targets. The IMF Board should consider the revised agreement before the end of October, and IMF disbursements may resume late this year. Under these circumstances, it is only prudent that Eximbank await final agreement with the IMF before activating its guarantee and insurance facility. As a further incentive to remain in compliance with an IMF program, Eximbank could suspend the facility if Brazil fell significantly out of compliance with its IMF program and the IMF suspended further disbursements.

Mexico already has an ongoing fund program and is in compliance with its performance targets. If that were to cease to be the case, the Eximbank could suspend the facility, as in the case of Brazil.

(2) The facilities could be specifically linked to continued commercial bank financing. The distribution of the financing burden between private and official creditors must be equitable. It is essential that commercial banks continue to bear their share of new financing and risk-taking.

The role of private creditors is particularly crucial in Brazil at the moment. The banks are now considering a contribution to the overall financing package for Brazil on the order of $7–9 billion. Obtaining commitments of this size will be difficult, particularly with regard to the participation of smaller banks in the syndication. We expect to put existing trade finance and interbank deposits on a committed basis to ensure that official U.S. and other export insurance guarantees to non-Brazilian banks are truly additional.

In the case of Mexico, the commercial banks have already made financing commitments in the form of new credit for 1983 and debt rescheduling through 1984 which seem to be sufficient. There may be some need for additional net new financing in 1984, but the amount is likely to be smaller than in the Brazilian case.

(3) Other creditor governments should provide new credits along with the increase in U.S. credits to assure equitable sharing of the financing burden among governments.

If the United States undertakes to provide Brazil with substantial amounts of Eximbank trade finance, the question arises as to the appropriate level of support by other governments. Under most burden-sharing formulas, whether related to trade, outstanding debt, or value of service payments, the U.S. share in the financing burden should amount to approximately 40 percent. We are in the early stages of discussing with other major developed countries the contribution they might make to an overall export credit guarantee package. We do not contemplate that the special Eximbank facility will become operative until this additional financing is raised.

(4) Official debt rescheduling arrangements are expected to form an important part of the overall financing program for both Brazil and Mexico.

Brazil has recently formally requested a Paris Club rescheduling. Estimated maturing obligations to official creditors during the period from August 1, 1983, through December 31, 1984, amount to more than $2 billion. Preliminary discussion of the rescheduling is expected in Paris on September 15.

In the Mexican case, signature of bilateral and implementing agreements under a previous rescheduling arrangement is a precondition for the Eximbank facility. As mentioned before, in June, Mexico's official creditors reached a multilateral agreement to extend debt relief to Mexico through the end of this year. Bilateral and creditor agency agreements are now being negotiated by each of the creditor countries. We are hopeful that our agreement with Mexico can be completed by October. Also, the official creditors have indicated to Mexico their willingness to consider further debt relief beyond 1983, and preparations may begin later this year.

Facilities and Normal Eximbank Programs

The new Eximbank facilities are not extraordinary, except in the amounts involved and the specified conditions. These facilities fall within the general ambit of Eximbank programs and are consistent with the Eximbank Charter:

—The facilities fall within the parameters of current Eximbank insurance and guarantee programs. Coverage would only be triggered when a U.S. export occurs.

—The facilities may be used only in support of specific U.S. exports, as is normally the case in Eximbank's programs.

—Existing insurance programs are well-suited to supporting the type of multipurpose lines of credit needed to support imports of commodities, spare parts, and capital goods.

—The facilities draw on existing Eximbank guarantee/insurance authority, consistent with the administration's Eximbank budget policy to place more emphasis on guarantees and insurance. The administration has already recognized such contingencies in its request for guarantees and insurance in FY '84.

—The facilities, with the special conditions, meet the Charter's requirement of "reasonable assurance of repayment." First, the facilities require the full faith and credit obligations of the Governments of Brazil and Mexico. Eximbank has had good experiences with government guaranteed transactions, including a very high recovery rate in case of default. Secondly, compliance with an IMF program indicates that the debtor country is undertaking a major effort to adjust and work its way out of its debt problem. Finally, parallel actions by the commercial banks and other governments will provide further evidence of international confidence that the debtor country has a good chance of solving its liquidity problems.

Conclusion

The administration strongly supports Eximbank's authorization of special guarantee and insurance facilities to Brazil and Mexico in the amount of $1.5 billion and $500 million respectively. These facilities will be used solely to support U.S. exports. The prospects for both countries offer reasonable assurance of repayment with the conditions imposed for each facility. In addition, they will significantly contribute to the multilateral effort to provide Brazil and Mexico with sufficient external financing to allow the orderly economic adjustment which will enable them to overcome their current international debt problems.

Address by the Deputy Secretary of State (Dam) Before the General Assembly of the Organization of American States, November 14, 1983 [20]

U.S. Policy in Latin America

Mr. President, Mr. Secretary General, distinguished colleagues, ladies, and gentlemen:

"The historic mission of America is to offer to man a land of liberty, and a favorable environment for the development of his personality and the realization of his just aspirations."

These words, which open the preamble to the Charter of this Organization of American States, express the central ideal that has guided the New World from its inception. Today, this ideal of democracy, of human rights, and of peace is advancing steadily in the lives of millions of men, women, and children throughout the hemisphere.

As the oldest continuing collaborative effort by nations to work together for the betterment of their citizens and for the maintenance of peace, the Inter-American System has long been a symbol of international cooperation and hope. Today, we can be especially proud. More and more of the members of our system are demonstrating once again that democratic processes and institutions are the best means of fulfilling human aspirations.

One year ago this week, nearly 60 million Brazilians voted in state and local elections. President Reagan, speaking in Brazil shortly afterwards, noted that the kinship of ideals this demonstrated between our citizens also strengthened the ability of our two governments to work together on many vital world issues. [21]

Two weeks ago, the citizens of Argentina celebrated nationwide elections in an atmosphere of intense civic freedom. Today, on behalf of my government and on behalf of the people of the United States of America, I should like to congratulate the Republic of Argentina, its people and its government. When decisions are made in freedom, everyone triumphs.

We are witnessing historic events: the return to democracy by most nations of this hemisphere. What is happening in Argentina and Brazil adds to the growing list of hemispheric countries—including Bolivia, Ecuador, Honduras, and Peru—that have in recent years restored constitutionalism and democracy. Next year this process of democratic renewal will gain additional strength when El Salvador, Grenada, Guatemala, and Uruguay, among others, hold elections. Overcoming bitter periods of instability and authoritarianism, each of these countries is reasserting the hemisphere's central vocation as a land of liberty.

Recent elections in the hemisphere have made abundantly clear that, given the opportunity, all of our peoples will choose democracy over authoritarianism. Free elections are at the very heart of any search for human rights. They are the best guarantee that governments will respect and observe the rights and aspirations of their people. By allowing political views to be expressed and weighed freely, elections facilitate the peaceful resolution of differences. And they assure the popular legitimacy without which authority becomes tyranny and dictatorship.

Regimes that abuse their own citizens cannot expect to maintain the delicate internal balance that holds just societies together. And they will find it equally difficult to convince their neighbors that their foreign relations will be governed by respect for international law.

The recent crisis in Grenada illustrates the underlying importance of democracy to internal order and regional peace. This General Assembly meets so shortly after that crisis that it is important to examine some of the implications of what happened there for our countries and for this organization.

I should therefore like to review briefly the conditions that brought about the decision by seven democratic states, all members of this organization, to undertake the collective action in Grenada that began on the morning of October 25.

[21] The President traveled to Brazil, November 30–December 3, 1982.

The critical precipitating event was the breakdown of government institutions in Grenada. From that condition flowed threats both to the peace and security of the Eastern Caribbean and to the safety of the foreign nationals living there.

Grenada's government dissolved in the wake of the murder of Prime Minister Bishop and other leaders. A 16-member Revolutionary Military Council was announced, apparently with Army General Hudson Austin at its head. But it was never clear who was really in charge, or that the Council was capable of functioning as a government.

The disintegration of political authority in Grenada created a dynamic of uncertainty and fear. Further violence seemed inevitable. The actions of Bishop's murderers indicated that they would have either driven the island into further chaos or turned it into an armed fortress. In either event, the threat to those living in Grenada and to the peace of the Eastern Caribbean would have increased.

On October 24, Governor-General Sir Paul Scoon appealed to the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States (OECS) and other regional states to help to restore order on the island. We and the OECS countries accorded exceptional moral and legal weight to this appeal, for it came from Grenada's sole remaining source of governmental legitimacy.

Sometimes it is necessary to act in order to keep a bad situation from getting worse. This was such a time. Action was necessary to resolve what Article 28 of our Charter refers to as a "situation that might endanger the peace." Inaction would have made more likely a hostage situation and increased the costs in lives of any subsequent rescue operation.

Both the OAS Charter, in Articles 22 and 28, and the UN Charter, in Article 52, recognize the competence of regional security bodies in ensuring regional peace and stability. Article 22 of the OAS Charter in particular makes clear that action pursuant to a special security treaty in force does not constitute intervention or use of force otherwise prohibited by Articles 18 or 20 of the Charter. The OECS decided to act under the 1981 Treaty establishing the organization and creating a special security regime for the Eastern Caribbean.

The United States had an additional concern also recognized under international law: the same anarchy that the countries of the Eastern Caribbean saw as a direct threat to them was also a threat to the safety of some 1,000 U.S. citizens studying or living in Grenada.

For all of these reasons, President Reagan decided to act jointly with Barbados and Jamaica in response to the urgent and formal request from the OECS, which cited "the current anarchic conditions, the serious violations of human rights and bloodshed that have occurred and the consequent unprecedented threat to the peace and security of the region created by the vacuum of authority in Grenada."

The overwhelming and positive reaction by Grenadians from all walks of life has confirmed the correctness of our collective action. Today, Grenada is beginning to reestablish itself as a functioning democracy. In that effort, it has—and will continue to have—the practical and moral support of the United States. I trust that Grenada will have the support of this Organization as well.

What happened in Grenada has important implications for peace, security, and development in this hemisphere. It is important that we understand them, whether as individual states or as members of a common system grounded in law.

What, then, are the implications of Grenada?

Perhaps the first thing to note is that the collective action was undertaken to resolve a condition of anarchy, not to alter a functioning political system. It is well known that Grenada's ties to Cuba and the Soviet Union, its poor human rights record, and its abandonment of democracy had led many governments to have serious disagreements with the Bishop regime. Nonetheless, Grenada's political system is clearly a matter only Grenadians have a right to decide. Indeed, what we found in Grenada suggests that Grenadians are now in a far better position to exercise their fundamental right to self-determination.

In the second place, there is today in the hemisphere no situation factually comparable to that of Grenada in mid-October. There is, for example, no situation in which foreigners are threatened by a generalized condition of anarchy and violence or in grave danger of becoming hostage to a vicious internal power struggle.

Although these considerations suggest that what happened in Grenada was sui generis, one member state of this organization, some of its officials have suggested, feels threatened by what happened in Grenada.

The country that apparently identifies itself with Grenada is Nicaragua. This raises some troubling questions about the Government of Nicaragua.

Can it be that Nicaragua's Commandantes are launched on a path from which they fear they cannot return without risk from their fellow leaders? Do they fear that they will fall out among each other as did the leaders of the ill-fated New Jewel Movement?

Or is it that the Commandantes are beginning to worry that the very security system developed for them by their Cuban and Communist bloc associates will endanger them? That Soviet and Cuban security personnel and armaments could put the Government of Nicaragua, as they did the government of Prime Minister Bishop, into a prison from which it will be impossible to escape peacefully?

I would like to believe that neither of these hypothesis is true. I would like to believe that the Commandantes are beginning to recognize that, when diktat and imposition replace democratic institutions and legal safeguards, political differences tend to degenerate into violence. And I would like to believe that the Commandantes are becoming concerned at their neighbors' resistance to Nicaragua's export of subversion and armed violence.

If so, a remedy may be found in the commitments they made to the Nicaraguan people and to this organization in 1979.

In July 1979, the soon-to-be governing junta of Nicaragua pledged formally to the Organization of American States that its goals were democratic and peaceful. [22] Those pledges included specific commitments to take measures leading to political democracy, economic freedom and international nonalignment. On the basis of those commitments, this Organization called for the replacement of the then Government of Nicaragua.

Having accepted those assurances, this Organization has a special responsibility to encourage Nicaragua's government to keep its pledges. The United States has consistently sought to engage Nicaragua to this end, first providing exceptional amounts of economic assistance, then making repeated attempts at negotiation. Nicaragua's neighbors have made similar efforts. Yet instead of good faith negotiations, instead of the verified termination of the export of subversion, instead of genuinely fair political competition through elections open to all groups, Nicaragua today is characterized by swollen military forces, disregard for political dialog and religious freedom, and the presence of some 11,000 security and other personnel from Cuba and the Soviet Bloc.

One approach today to restoring peace and democracy to Nicaragua and Central America is that of the Contadora process. The Contadora Document of Objectives represents a consensus about what is required. [23] It is: an end to terrorism, destabilization, and guerrilla warfare; a reduction of military forces and armaments; political reconciliation through free elections and respect for human rights; the removal of foreign troops and military advisors; and the commitment of resources more for economic development and reform than for military buildup and destruction.

The United States firmly supports the Contadora Document of Objectives. Just 10 days ago, President Reagan reiterated in the strongest terms our backing for the 21 points contained in this document. We believe they provide the basis for a lasting solution to many of the region's problems. Addressed in a comprehensive manner, they would resolve both Nicaragua's fears and those of its neighbors.

The Contadora negotiations are a responsive and responsible course of action by those best positioned to assess the danger and its remedies. In that sense, Contadora embodies what may well be the fundamental lesson of the collective response to the Grenada crisis: that the best source of knowledge, and the best guidance to action, comes from the peoples and countries most directly concerned, most aware of what is happening in their own neighborhood.

We hope that the nine countries involved in this effort to bring peace to Central America will push ahead with all possible speed to transform the 21 objectives into a comprehensive and verifiable agreement. We stand ready to do everything we can to assist. And I urge all OAS members to do the same.

The troubles in the Eastern Caribbean and Central America are important and topical. But they must not be allowed to deflect our attention from the crucial economic issues that challenge the entire hemisphere, and on whose resolution the achievement of lasting peace, social justice and stability so clearly depends.

In recent years, the decline of real commodity prices and the setbacks to domestic growth have been the worst since the great depression. Copper, coffee, sugar: not a country among us has been immune to falling commodity prices. For numerous countries, debt service ratios, and inflation rates are at historic highs.

Since August 1982, the international financial system has faced an increasing variety of challenges. The system has proved more resilient than many had thought, but there are many continuing sources of strain.

Even if the global recovery continues, and even if major new increases in either petroleum prices or world interest rates can be averted, debt problems will continue to be very significant during the remainder of the 1980's.

The severity of these problems will hinder rapid recovery. But let us not lose sight of our fundamental strengths. The bases for recovery are present. Hemisphere economies are fundamentally sound; they have both the human base and the natural resources that are needed for sustained economic growth. As a whole the hemisphere achieved real annual growth rates averaging 5.5–6.5 percent during the 1960's and 1970's. Basic infrastucture was built, people trained and modern economic sectors strengthened.

For these reasons, the long-term prognosis for most of Latin America's major economies remains positive. The basic issue is economic reactivation in the short and medium term.

The U.S. Government's approach to external debt problems includes five mutually-supporting elements.

The necessary first step is a broadening of the economic recovery in the United States and other industrialized countries, combined with continued efforts to resist self-defeating protectionist pressures. I am pleased to note that evidence of our economic recovery is becoming clearer day by day.

Second, and equally fundamental, are the economic adjustment efforts by each debtor country. Orderly adjustments, combined with the other elements of our approach, offer the best hope for a return to the economic growth and development levels of the 1960's and 1970's.

Third, effective adjustment efforts must be supported by IMF assistance. The IMF's role must be strengthened by approval of the pending quota increase.

Fourth, creditor countries must provide emergency government and central bank assistance on a case-by-case basis.

Fifth, but not least, prudent commercial bank lending must continue. Credit lines must be kept open and growing.

Last September's OAS external finance conference in Caracas, Venezuela, demonstrated that the nations of the hemisphere can come together and discuss major hemispheric economic problems constructively and in harmony. The recent meeting of the Inter-American Economic and Social Council in Asunción, Paraguay, unanimously confirmed the decisions taken in Caracas and established a special committee to examine external debt, trade, and financing. This initiative is receiving our close attention.

The vital catalyst for economic growth is the free flow of capital, goods and services. Policies that foster free capital flows and encourage private investment, risk-taking, innovation, and competition will be the key to success in meeting the recovery and growth challenges we now confront. Economic reactivation depends on millions of entrepreneurs and workers in the private sector making daily decisions in their area of competence.

Governments can help extend the frontiers of economic and political liberty. They must guide with policy and, where appropriate, cooperate with information and resources. Bilateral commercial and investment treaties can help. In addition, the unavailability of arbitration mechanisms is viewed by many potential investors as a disincentive to the transfer of capital. The Inter-American Commercial Arbitration Commission (IACAC) is an independent regional body dedicated to the peaceful settlement of commercial disputes through arbitration. Strengthening the IACAC's ties with the OAS would promote the free flow of needed capital.

Finally, we have a major stake in each other's markets. In 1982, U.S. exports to Latin America and the Caribbean amounted to $34 billion—and Latin America's exports to the United States amounted to $33 billion.

The U.S. Government is committed to open trade for all nations. Despite strong domestic demands for widespread protection, the United States has refrained from imposing new trade restrictive barriers. On the contrary, we are continuing to implement the liberalization agreed upon in the Multilateral Trade Negotiations. We are seeking a renewal of the Generalized System of Preferences—which has provided very significant benefits to Latin America. And we have succeeded in achieving a virtually all-inclusive free trade status for the Caribbean Basin.

The Caribbean Basin countries will soon begin to take advantage of the trade and other provisions of the Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act.[24] Providing duty-free access to the U.S. market is the heart of the CBI legislation, which is designed to stimulate private investment in export industries in the region. An indicator of the program's value, even over the short term, is that about $500 million of presently dutiable exports from the Caribbean Basin will be freed from U.S. duties because of the CBI. As stability is restored, the benefits should be even greater.

Let me conclude by returning to the theme with which I opened these remarks.

The democratic ideal surely offers this hemisphere's best reason for optimism. But we must recognize that democracy is being restored under conditions that are far from optimal. The strains created by the inescapable need to adjust and stabilize economies are virtually unprecedented in their severity. Some observers believe these strains will prove so intolerable that they will prove incompatible with democracy.

This concern calls for closer examination. It implies that democracy is a luxury—a secondary and dependent superstructure to be erected only when certain prior conditions are met, a superstructure desirable only after basic choices have already been made. Some advocates of this view also seem to be saying that genuine democracy is not possible at all in most of Latin America.

My government holds a different view. We believe that it should be a source of confidence that the people of this hemisphere are turning to democracy not in times of plenty but in hard times—times demanding solutions to hard-to-resolve problems. In our view, democracy is a problem-solving mechanism. Democracy is not a luxury but a necessity. It is not a superstructure but a foundation.

As I noted earlier, democracy and free elections offer the best means of distributing power within a nation and therefore the surest way to prevent tensions from breaking down into internal violence. But democracy and freedom of expression also provide the best route to increased public understanding of complex economic issues and to public support for the austerity that present circumstances require. And democracy's consultative process offers the best means of translating the people's instinctive longing for peace into government policy.

My government's support for the Contadora effort is not merely a polite bow to a helpful diplomatic initiative. It is support for the substance of a process whose 21 points underscore our commitment to defending democracy where it is threatened, to helping build democracy where it does not already exist, and to insisting that the abridgment of democracy from whatever quarter must not be taken lightly by our community of nations.

I believe that historians of this period will record that the people of this hemisphere turned to democracy not as an appealing afterthought but as the best means by which their problems could best be resolved. It is the policy of the U.S. Government to support this historic movement with all appropriate means. We are convinced that democracy is possible—indeed, that for the common good, it must succeed.

Thank you.

Arms Sales to Guatemala

MR. HUGHES. Good afternoon. I do have an announcement on Guatemala.

After extended consultations with the Congress and analysis of the situation in Guatemala, the Department has decided to permit the cash sale to the Government of Guatemala of previously requested spare parts and safety-of-flight items under the Foreign Military Sales Program. This decision has been communicated to the Government of Guatemala by our Ambassador to that country.

This decision on specific FMS items is part of a broader relationship which includes the disbursement of some $10 million in economic support funds already made available under that portion of the Caribbean Basin Initiative which passed Congress during the past session. [2] This assistance addresses the pressing economic difficulties which the Government of Guatemala shares with its other regional neighbors.

The potential sales which could result from this decision would constitute the first such FMS sales to the Government of Guatemala since the late 1970s, except for $15,000 in FMS training. The decision was made in light of human rights improvements which have taken place in Guatemala since the Rios Montt government came to power in March of 1982.

In this regard, while we want to see further progress in Guatemala in promoting respect for human rights, President Rios Montt has taken significant steps in this area. Progress has been made.

Similarly, we look forward to the continuing development of the democratic process. Since General Rios Montt assumed power on March 23 of last year, political violence in the cities has declined dramatically; recently there are indications that the level of violence in the countryside has declined as well; villagers have been provided food and medical supplies along with the means to defend themselves; plans are underway for the election of a constituent assembly; the Indian population is increasingly participating in the country's political process; the President Rios Montt has been attacking corruption within the government.

The government has declared its desire to cooperate with independent human rights groups and United Nations agencies, and has permitted a number of private groups to visit the country.

These are steps which we feel should be recognized and encouraged.

Q. Copies?

A. Surely.

Q. How much are the sales worth?

A. The total, and I could make this list available, is about $6,300,000. It's about larger-items in that list a million dollars for spare parts for UH–1H helicopters; about $1,350,000 for the inspection and repair of three helicopters; about $260,000 for the overhaul of three helicopter engines; about $2.9 million for radio equipment; and after that the amounts get—about half a million dollars for earth-moving equipment, and after that the items get progressively smaller.

Q. Could we get that list?

A. Sure, we'll make that list available.

Q. Why do you say the Department has decided? Is this not a decision that would have to be made by the President?

A. No, I think it is—I can give you a little elaboration on that, I think.

I may have to go back and do a little homework on that, but I think, basically, as you know, there's been consultation with Congress, but basically it is the Secretary's decision.

Q. These are all government-to-government sales; right?

A. Yes.

Q. Is this sale expected to have any impact on any restrictions on private sales? I don't know what the restrictions on private munitions sales to Guatemala are.

A. Neither do I.

Q. Does this mean that the Department has independently investigated the reports of massacres by the Guatemalan military and found them blameless?

A. I think what it means is that the Department is satisfied that there is progress in the right direction. As I already said, we want to see more progress, but the Department thinks that the progress that has been made should be rewarded, remarked upon and that this is an incentive for further movement in the right direction.

Q. Has there been an Embassy investigation of these reports of military involvement in the massacres in some of the villages?

A. Can't answer that specific question, but, as I say, the Department is satisfied overall.

On the response to Don's specific question, the appropriate legislation is the Arms Export Control Act, [3] and the Secretary of State is assigned responsibility for decisions of this type.

Q. Does this decision, and what you've said about the broader relationship—whatever the words were—presage a much larger program of the United States military assistance to Guatemala in the future? Do you see it likely developing into something a good deal bigger than this one sale?

A. We are talking specifically about these items which I listed today. I think if there were to be further requests, they would be considered on a case-by-case basis.

Q. But as you pointed out, there has been no sale of this kind for a number of years.

A. That's right.

Q. And you're saying you see progress in the right direction?

A. That's right.

Q. It seems to me it sort of suggests that this is the beginning of a new phase in the relationship. Is that the way you see it?

A. I think we're going to stand on the language we've offered you. We see progress. We look for more progress. We have before us at the moment this decision, and we've made this decision. It's kind of hypothetical to—

Q. Do you have any other decisions under study about further aid to Guatemala?

A. To Guatemala?

Q. Yes.

A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Other than that list, have you got something else that's been submitted by that government for military assistance?

A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Arms, ammunition?

A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Any U.S. military advisors or technicians? Will they be sent down to help any?

A. I have no knowledge of any such—

Q. There is an item for inspection of helicopters and maintenance. Since it's under the FMS list, does that mean it's Pentagon people?

A. I have no knowledge of any such plans.

Q. If it's an FMS sale, it presumes, as I understand it, that the Pentagon handles the whole—they become the sales agent.

A. I guess you would have to ask the Pentagon.

Q. But that is normal on something like this, that they do have people to supervise the—

A. I don't know whether it's normal. These are very small amounts. And whether personnel would necessarily be involved or where this is going to take place, I can't answer that.

Q. These sales are needed by Guatemala for internal reasons or for outside tensions?

A. Internal reasons.

Q. What is your assessement of those reasons—what is your explanation of why they need these spare parts.

A. I guess they have helicopters that don't fly, and they need parts for them.

Q. Why do they need the helicopters?

A. I guess that's part of their—

Q. Can you tell us about the insurgency? Does the United States believe that it's Cuban supported?

A. No. I can't go beyond what I've given you today.

Q. Since the government in the past has been engaged in rather bloody scorched-earth policy, what the President himself called "the scorched-Communist policy," is the Department concerned that this reward is kind of a seal of approval on those past actions by the government?

A. No. I think the Department has made its position plain in the language we've used, that the situation in Guatemala, as in a number of countries, is not ideal, but we see movement in the right direction; and having carefully considered what has taken place, the positive developments that have taken place, the decision has been made to go with these rather limited items at this time.

Q. Is there any word about those past actions? Is there any comment about what has taken place that may have improved but at one point was something the Department may not have liked?

A. I'm sure the Department has commented over a period of time, but I don't have a collection of those comments here today.

Q. Are there any conditions to any of this? Is there any date upon which they're going to look at the situation again?

A. No. As I say, this is a one-time decision, and should further requests be made they will be looked at on a case-by-case basis.

Q. You said that this decision is made following consultation with Congress. Can we assume that since you're going ahead with it you don't expect any opposition from Congress?

A. I think we should let Congressmen speak for themselves, but we have gone ahead with the decision.

Q. When did Guatemala request these spare parts?

A. I think there were differing dates for various items. I think some of them were requested back in 1979. Some of them were requested in 1981. The dates are on this list that we'll make available to you.

Q. I think you omitted the word "helicopters" in your opening statement. Are all the spare parts for the helicopters?

A. Spare parts, but there are other items on this list. There are flight uniforms; there are tools and shop equipment.

Q. But nothing for their jet fighters?

A. There are ejection capsules for the A-37B aircraft. I don't know what the A-37B is. I don't know what kind of aircraft it is.

Mr. Romberg: Prop aircraft.

Q. Twin engine?

A. I think I know what an ejection capsule is, but I'm not sure.

Q. In your human rights report [4] issued about eleven months go, it was said that the monthly death toll in Guatemala was about 300 politically-motivated killings, mostly noncombatants. Do you have a comparable figure for 1982 against which we could judge whether there has been an actual decline in the number of killings?

A. I don't today. But I think that in due course we would be once again having a human rights report which would include that material.

Report to the Congress by the Reagan Administration, January 21, 1983 (Extract) [5]

Presidential Certification on Progress in El Salvador

Section 728 of the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1981 (Public Law 97-113, approved December 29, 1981) establishes a framework for U.S. assistance to El Salvador. This statutory framework is premised on a congressional finding, set out in section 728(a)(1) as follows:

"The Congress finds that peaceful and democratic development in Central America is in the interest of the United States and of the community of American States generally, that the recent civil strife in El Salvador has caused great human suffering and disruption to the economy of that country, and that substantial assistance to El Salvador is necessary to help alleviate that suffering and to promote economic recovery within a peaceful and democratic process. Moreover, the Congress recognizes that the efforts of the Government of El Salvador to achieve these goals are affected by the activities of forces beyond its control."

In order to assure that U.S. assistance to El Salvador remains consistent with the foregoing policies, section 728(d) requires periodic certification to the Congress, at 6-month intervals beginning in January 1982, that the Government of El Salvador—

(1) is making a concerted and significant effort to comply with internationally recognized human rights;

(2) is achieving substantial control over all elements of its own armed forces, so as to bring to an end the indiscriminate torture and murder of Salvadoran citizens by these forces;

(3) is making continued progress in implementing essential economic and political reforms, including the land reform program;

(4) is committed to the holding of free elections at an early date and to that end has demonstrated its good faith efforts to begin discussions with all major political factions in El Salvador which have declared their willingness to find and implement an equitable political solution to the conflict, with such solution to involve a commitment to:

(A) a renouncement of further military or paramilitary activity; and

(B) the electoral process with internationally recognized observers.

This report, which constitutes the basis for the third such certification since section 728 was enacted, addresses how these criteria are being met and discusses the related issues of the murders and disappearances of U.S. citizens in El Salvador.

The House also held hearings on certification; see U.S. Policy in El Salvador: Hearings Before the Subcommittees on Human Rights and International Organizations and on Western Hemisphere Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session (Washington, 1983).

Its conclusion is that, despite great obstacles, many still beyond its immediate control, the Government of El Salvador has made progress under each of the criteria specified in the law. In particular, over the last 6 months:

—Political violence continued to diminish—although at a slower rate than at the time of the previous certification—in part due to increased consciousness by the government of the importance of more effective action on human rights, including formation of new institutions for this purpose.

—Efforts to control abuses by members of the armed forces were the subject of increased attention by the Government of El Salvador and continued to show slow progress.

—The "land to the tiller" phase of agrarian reform—whose future had been a matter of concern at the time of the last certification—was vigorously re-launched, while consolidation of Phase I of the land reform continued.

—The democratic process rooted in the March 1982 Constituent Assembly elections proved resistant to minority or individual efforts at manipulation.

No major reverses were registered in the commitment of the Government of El Salvador to the criteria of certification. In addition, on October 4, 1982, El Salvador joined formally with seven democratic American states in committing itself in the Final Act of San Jose, Costa Rica, to a negotiating process on regional democratization, demilitarization, and defense of human rights. [6]

It is nonetheless clear, and this report documents, that human rights abuses continue and that the further development of democracy and the protection of human rights are not to be taken for granted. Two areas of particular concern are the systematic ineffectiveness of El Salvador's criminal justice procedures, particularly in cases originating in political violence, and the need for further improvement in military discipline, which must be strengthened within individual security force units on a nationwide basis.

These concerns emphasize the gravity of El Salvador's problems. The country faces an organized and externally-supported guerrilla war that has provoked an acute economic decline. The many divisions within Salvadoran society have been aggravated by ingrained historical reliance on force to "deal" with social disputes. During the past year, the guerrilla war has been confined primarily to the eastern third of the country, the most intense conflicts taking place outside major population and production centers. Even so, civilian casualties remained high, the Salvadoran armed forces lost 1,145 men killed and 2,398 wounded in action during 1982, and guerrilla sabotage against the economy imposed a heavy toll in unemployment, displacement and human suffering.

Despite the inadequacies identified in this report, important progress toward the objective of peaceful and democratic development has been attained during the 3 years of active U.S. assistance to El Salvador. More than 20 percent of all El Salvador's farmland has been redistributed to 65,000 poor farmworkers and their families. Civilian deaths attributable to political violence from all sides have fallen from as high as 800 a month in late 1980 to no higher than 200 a month in the last 6 months of 1982. Shortcomings in internal military discipline are slowly being countered by human rights training, improved communication, and command directives that emphasize respect for noncombatants. Representative institutions, created through direct and universal adult suffrage, are guiding the drafting of a modern constitution and preparations for presidential elections in 1984.

Document 611

Statement by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Enders) Before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, February 2, 1983 [7]

A Message to El Salvador

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. [8]

The Congress authorized military assistance to El Salvador, what we are considering here today, because the survival of that country is important to American security. What happens in the civil strife there can affect the future of the Panama Canal, it can affect the future of our immediate neighbor Mexico, and I think we are all mindful of the fact that half of our commerce passes through the Caribbean and can also be affected.

In granting military assistance, you conditioned it on periodic certification on progress in human rights, land reform, and creation of democratic institutions.

Mr. Chairman, you asked a moment ago for assessments of the certification process, [9] and I think one could argue about the procedure. It has had some side effects. Those of us who work on certifications at the other end of the avenue have found that we are not very comfortable by having to say every 180 days either that it is OK or that it is not OK and not having a third choice.

I think it is apparent that periodic certifications can have the effect of polarizing opinion here, perhaps obscuring a broad agreement that we do not want to see Central America dominated by Marxist-Leninists, but we do want to see it reform. Or they can threaten the morale of our friends in the area who fear that aid will suddenly be cut off. Or they can give an opportunity to the guerrillas who have found that a certification offensive is a natural medium for publicizing themselves. And I think we have seen a striking example of this this week.

It is also clear that such major factors as the Cuban-Nicaraguan support for guerrilla forces are left out altogether. But clearly, Congress intended to give the administration in certification a means to encourage and insure progress toward human rights, land reform, and democracy, and we have attempted to use it that way.

And no one can argue at all about the goals. Only through the emergence of legitimate institutions which all the factions can participate will the civil strife in El Salvador be overcome. Only when the political violence, including that of the government forces, has finally been ended, can representative institutions be fully effective. And only when the process of redistributing land whose ownership was once clearly unequal has been completed will there be social justice.

Now, this third certification does not say that these goals have been achieved. It does say that El Salvador continues to advance toward them. It says that the "land to the tiller" phase of agrarian reform whose future was debated in this committee room so intensively at the time of the last certification has been vigorously relaunched. This shows that in the course of the period since the election of a constituent assembly that there has indeed been a substantial reinvigoration of the land reform, where, of course, the acreage showing particularly sharp increases.

But the thing I would focus on, Mr. Chairman, is the increase in petitions, the start of the process. There has been a very vigorous relaunching of that. There are no less than in the course of the 6 months 9,638 farmers who have filed applications. And if you include family members, as we have earlier in the statistics, you are talking about a potential of 60,000 new beneficiaries from the "land to the tiller" program as these title applications go through the process.

Certification says that political violence continues to diminish, although at a slower rate than at the time of the second certification. This shows the Embassy figures that have been collected over the period. They have been collected on the same basis.

You will recall that there have been arguments about whether this is all political violence and deaths caused by political violence. I think that it clearly is not. But the figures are consistent on the same basis. And if in fact you remove deaths caused by military action, they track very closely now with those collected by other organizations.

What this shows, Mr. Chairman, is that the anarchy that characterized El Salvador 2½ years ago is gradually abating. It is abating because the government is gradually achieving control over all elements of its forces. It is also abating because the government has been relatively successful in pacifying the cities and areas around the cities. And the insurgency has largely affected 4 out of the 14 departments least populated.

The certification also says that the fragile new democracy that emerged from the massive turnout in the March elections has proved resistant to manipulation of individuals or minorities. The country is headed toward full Presidential elections a year from now, as the timetable laid out for the development of a constitution, development of political participation, and laws. And we expect that to go ahead. Little by little, democratic institutions are emerging.

And there are very serious problems. You mentioned some of them in your opening remarks. The judicial system is simply not working. Often, soldiers disciplined and turned over to it remain in detention without being prosecuted. One alleged participant in the murder of the two American land reform workers, [10] a man whose probable guilt was established by a government-appointed and army-supported commission of inquiry, was set free by judges that we believe were intimidated or bought. And two more are being detained and prosecuted, and yet another is a fugitive.

A trial process has begun, as we expected it to begin, of the accused murderers of the four American churchwomen. [11] But all of us are waiting for a verdict.

Moreover, and I would put particular emphasis on this, dissenting views in the coalition have so far prevented the government from going forward with two initiatives that are essential to moderate the conflict; a serious amnesty—and we just discussed that; and the peace commission to promote reconciliation with adversaries.

The whole concept here is one of developing political institutions in which political competition can be substituted for competition through violence. Members of the right in that country have participated in this. It is essential that members of the left also find a way so that they can be brought back into the system.

Mr. Chairman, a couple of remarks, if I could, about views that are pressed on us. Some people say to us, stop the military aid to El Salvador and the killing will end. But it will not. Cessation of the military aid would only mean that the fighting, which is now concentrated in 4 departments, would spread to 14, and the death squads and vigilantes that have gradually been brough under control will flourish again as the central government falters.

Others say we should force the government to negotiate with its adversaries and that will stop the killing. But it will not. No Latin American government has ever agreed to negotiate as an equal with its armed opposition and survived. Venezuela did not agree to do so in the 1960's. Nor did Peru or Brazil. Colombia did not this year, and it has had a long and serious insurgency.

El Salvador is not like the pre-Fidelista Cuba or the pre-sandinista Nicaragua. If we did attempt to force the Government of El Salvador to negotiate with the guerrillas as equal, we would risk its collapse, and the result could be anarchy as left, center, and right all fight for the remains. I think it is quite clear also that should in either case the guerrillas prevail, we know there will be no democracy, no respect for human rights, and no land to the individual tiller.

Mr. Chairman, I would hope that, as a result of this hearing, that there could be a message to El Salvador. I think it should be that we expect the land reform to be continued when the law authorizing it comes up for renewal this spring; that if civil justice cannot be made to work in an emergency, and clearly it is not working now, that courts of military justice be set up and used to punish those members of the security forces who are found guilty of abuses; and that the long, hard work of reconciliation must begin now with the peace commission and with amnesty; that we expect the alleged murderers of our countrywomen and countrymen to be judged and, if found guilty, to be punished; and that the survival of El Salvador is important to us, that we will support a country which reforms itself and resists enemies that we know will not support democracy or human rights or the distribution of land to the farmer who tills it.

Thank you.

Testimony by the Secretary of State (Shultz) Before the House Foreign Affairs Committee, February 16, 1983 (Extracts) [12]

U.S. Policy Toward El Salvador

. . . . . .

MR. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Secretary, last week the Washington Post ran a story on the first page which spoke about a debate within the State Department over a two-track policy in El Salvador, a policy of one-track continuing with the military options and second, pursuing negotiations with the guerrillas, perhaps somewhat more vigorously than has been done to date. [13]

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The story had no foundation in fact. Absolutely none.

MR. KOSTMAYER. I am disappointed to hear that.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I don't think, Congressman, that we want to get ourselves in a position where somebody can shoot their way into a government.

Now, reconciliation and people coming into the process of government that are there is one thing. Setting out to negotiate with people who are trying to upset a duly constituted government is an entirely different matter. And I think we have to remember that these people tried to prevent an election taking place in El Salvador, and in spite of their harassment, 80 percent of the people voted in that election. And to now say let them shoot their way into that government, no dice.

MR. KOSTMAYER. Well, I am relieved to learn that the United States is opposed to people shooting their way into power in Latin America, especially delighted to know we are opposed to overturning duly constituted governments around the world.

A day or so ago, a member of this committee, Congressman Leach of Iowa, suggested that we ought to pursue the possibility of appointing a special envoy, such as we have with Mr. Habib in the Middle East, recognizing that the Middle East is a conflict between separate states and the conflict in El Salvador is within one state, a domestic insurgency. Is there any hope that that is a possibility?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, of course, we have people who are working on the problems of Central America. We have able ambassadors in the region. The State Department fields a team there. We have recently added Senator Stone to that team, [14] and he is a vigorous and interesting person, and I am sure he will be helpful to us. But I think that we have plenty of resources devoted to it. Ambassador Kirkpatrick, who is well familiar in the area, took some time off and visited there. So these are all things we are doing which we think will help compose matters in that region.

MR. KOSTMAYER. And are these people—they are not pursuing in any sense even the possibility of negotiations, not necessarily negotiations which give the guerrillas a share of power in the government prior to the presidential elections in March 1984, but might give them some control over the electoral processes that would bring them into the electoral process. They really were not part of the electoral process in the election for constituent assembly, as you know.

[14] In February 1983, Stone was appointed Special Representative of the President for Public Diplomacy in Central America.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. That was their choice.

MR. KOSTMAYER. I think the guerrillas were somewhat alarmed and I think justifiably about their safety. You know that members of the FDR were rounded up and murdered in El Salvador. I think it is fair to say in El Salvador the guerrillas fear for their lives if they participate too openly and unconditionally in the electoral process.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The guerrillas are busy upsetting people in El Salvador, creating hell, and shooting their way around. They are responsible for the levels of violence and difficulty in that country. And if they want to take part in a civilized way in the activities of that country, they are welcome to do so.

MR. KOSTMAYER. Well, Mr. Secretary, I am looking for a middle course here. I am not a member of the committee who favors cutting off aid to El Salvador. I am not a cosponsor of the legislation to do that. I am not a proponent of comprehensive reliance on the military solution, either. I think we need to find a middle way. And I think that your attitude regarding even the possibility of negotiations is not going to lead to any kind of solution at all.

I have to tell you, Mr. Secretary, as basically a moderate on the issue, I am deeply disappointed you don't hold out any hope. This problem will not be solved militarily. I haven't gotten a letter favoring aid. Nobody is for this. The easy vote here is to vote to cut off aid. The difficult vote is to support the administration and continue military aid as I do at this time.

But if you pursue this hardline attitude, you are going to continue to lose support, not just in the committee, but in the House itself and the country. I would urge you to give us people who share, I think, your long-range objectives, give us a little hope here. You have not done that this morning.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. This activity is supported by arms that flow from the Soviet Union through Cuba to Nicaragua and to these insurgents. I think we don't have to scratch our heads very long to figure out the purpose of that flow.

MR. KOSTMAYER. That is not the basis of the dispute in Central America, Mr. Secretary. You know that hunger and poverty and injustice and inadequate education, those are the root causes.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. We are trying to attack those causes by our programs.

I agree with you that economic development, adequate opportunity, exposure to education, and so forth, are the keys. And we are long overdue in getting after those problems in Central America as far as the U.S. policy is concerned. But it is very difficult to mount really effective programs in any of those areas when you have a shooting war going on, promoted and supported by outside forces.

Now, I am sure you are familiar with the principles enunciated in San Jose some months ago that represented views of countries in Central America and surrounding democratic countries on a basis for trying to get this situation settled down. And they are pretty good principles. Those are the principles we are supporting. They represent principles that would lead to reconciliation, principles that would say, let's get offensive armaments out of here, they represent principles that say let's not have armament shipping from one country to another.

Let's get governments on a democratic basis. Those are the issues we are supporting.

. . . . . .

MR. MICA. First I would like to associate myself with the comments of Mr. Kostmayer. As one who supported the administration's policy 0in El Salvador, I continue to believe the worst thing we can do is to see another Marxist state or Soviet-dominated state exist there. But probably the second worst situation may be existing there right now.

We really need to be able to say publicly that this Government, this committee has said it many times, really does oppose the abuses of human rights, the activities of the Government and so on, and a strong, strong statement, because it is becoming more and more difficult to justify this, this aid and action that we have committed to this country.

So, I would look for and hope we can get some strong indications of statements from this Government with regard to what we deem inappropriate by the present Government in El Salvador, so that we can continue. Because I do think it would be just a tragedy to see those who are acting against the present Government to take over.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Let me just say on that, if I may, that we are certainly very conscious of human rights abuses and pay a lot of attention to that. And, of course, we have this semiannual process by which you get a thorough review of what is going on. It is a very factual, thorough effort.

The point that I was responding to particularly with Mr. Kostmayer was not any objection to that, but rather to the idea that a negotiation should be started with a group that is causing a good bit of this struggle themselves, as distinct from a process of reconciliation in which people as individuals come into the political process, the democratic political process, and argue for their points.

MR. MICA. I understand that. I hope you understand that for me, one who has cast in some cases the deciding vote, sometimes it is represented at least in the reports that we get back that there is not the concern or the attention given to human rights, to the actions of the present Government, to the way they handle themselves, the way they control their military and so on, and there really is a strong, strong concern in this Congress and on this committee.

And we just don't think, at least I don't, that it has been reflected appropriately enough. And I hope that government there does realize it because we do want to see a democratic government established there hopefully.

. . . . . .

MR. LEACH. Mr. Kostmayer raised the issue of the appropriateness of pursuing a dual-track policy in our efforts in Central America. Frankly, like he, I was a little disappointed in your response. Certainly it is true that as a general rule no one supports the notion of anyone shooting their way into power, although there might be an exception or two. George Washington might have been one such exception. I think a lot of people in this room would support the Afghan Mujaheddin. However, no one likes the notion of supporting a government which is less than humane either. I don't know many Americans who are very sympathetic to the tactics of the guerrillas, but you referred to the civilized behavior of the government bureaucracy in El Salvador. I would strongly suggest that policymakers in State not only authorize the publication of the human rights report, but read it very carefully. The Government of El Salvador is quite civilized, but with several exceptions. One is curtailment of freedom of speech, one is curtailment of freedom of assembly, one is curtailment of habeus corpus and the use of techniques of terror and indiscriminate killings. In the past 5 years, 36,000 to 38,000 noncombatants have been killed in El Salvador. By contrast, in our society, that is equivalent to about 1½ million Americans.

I don't know anyone, and I hope you are not an exception to this, who believe that in the area of noncombatant deaths the majority of killings have not come from the right.

Anyway, my concern is that the United States has overemphasized, if you look at the principle of dual track, at least the image of using a stick without much emphasis on the carrot. And in this regard, it strikes me that appointing a special envoy, a la Phil Habib, in Central America, would have the advantage particularly in terms of timing, with regard to the proposed creation of a peace commission in El Salvador, of indicating our policy is not simply one of providing arms and authorizing troop deployments for maneuvers in that region. Sometimes there is an image, as well as a structure of negotiating that has to take place. As much as many Americans would like to compromise on many of these issues, there is no structure in place for us to get the results we might want to achieve.

I think a special envoy could lend to that process, and I would hope that the Department would seriously consider it.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Thank you.

CHAIRMAN ZABLOCKI. Mr. Feighan.

MR. FEIGHAN. Mr. Secretary, let me follow up on Mr. Leach's comments with respect to El Salvador, if for no other reason but to underscore the growing concern, if not in some areas outright opposition, that members of this committee and members of this House have toward the administration's policy with respect to Central America and in particular with respect to El Salvador.

I think that as Mr. Leach indicated we all agree with your very firm condemnation of those who would attempt to shoot themselves into power. But what we find lacking so dramatically is a balance of condemnation, a balance of condemnation against the acts of violence that the Salvadoran administration or certainly forces within that administration is committing upon its own people. Last year alone, death squads and members of the armed security forces were responsible for at least 5,500 political assassinations, probably much more, because these are only the documented cases. Yet we are supporting this Government to the extent of almost $300 million a year.

I would like to ask a two-part question. First, you condemn rightfully the violence of the left, but how would you characterize the violence of the administration that we are supporting? How would you characterize their continuance of death squads? How would you characterize their continued tolerance if not direction of the violence and brutality of members of their security forces?

More specifically, since there is an apparent intransigence on the part of the administration to redirect its policy toward El Salvador, could you tell the committee and the American people how long this war is going to take? I think the American people have a right to know that. How long does the State Department think then that the war, the singleminded pursuit of a military victory in El Salvador, is going to take; what is it going to cost, and what is going to be the loss in American prestige as we continue to support repressive and authoritarian forces that commit the kind of human rights abuses we have witnessed?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, first of all, Congressman, we do submit a report every 6 months that catalogs the situation as we are able to understand it. And I think from what I can judge, quite a thorough job is done. And we try to make an assessment and submit that assessment to the Congress of whether or not there is progress—not whether or not there is exactly the kind of situation that we would like, because, obviously, there is not, but whether there is progress. And so far it has been possible to identify quite a few factors in the situation that seem to represent progress. Progress in a situation that is far from the sort of situation that we would find genuinely desirable.

Now, I think our biggest problem is the fact that you have an insurgent group that is being supplied with armaments from outside, and which is trying to disrupt that government. That presents a problem which is a severe one for that group, and we have been trying to work at it through the development and implementation of the San Jose principles that I think are excellent principles, and which we have been trying to get out in front of people and bring into effect, because it would have the effect, if they were adopted, of reducing drastically the level of violence in that area, and it would have the effect of giving people much greater opportunity to develop their economic well-being and proceed in a much more normal life. I have no way of putting a time down on this, but we certainly are following not just a two-track approach, but a multitrack approach on the one hand helping that Government have the ability to withstand the armed attacks of the insurgents, other than trying to help create conditions under which economic development can take place. And at the same time do what we can to create an environment in the region as a whole that will lead people to more sensible arrangements than now exist.

So there is an effort on the one hand to hold firm against this military challenge, from outside, and on the other hand to develop in a constructive way both economic conditions that are an improvement and a constructive alternative to what is going on at present.

MR. FEIGHAN. Mr. Secretary, I have read the reports of the administration. What I find disturbing, though, is the refusal to be candid in its assessment of what is taking place in El Salvador today, and its refusal to condemn the kind of violence from an administration that we are supporting.

In fact, as I recall, we all do, Dean Hinton, the American Ambassador to El Salvador, made a very candid statement last October criticizing the behavior of the Salvadoran Government, certainly in its tolerance of the death squads and the kind of violence taking place at its own hands.

And he was publicly reprimanded for these candid remarks. [15]

SECRETARY SHULTZ. He is supported by the President implicitly. Dean Hinton is a very respected and well-supported Ambassador.

. . . . . .

MR. GARCIA. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I will be very brief. I would like to go back to the statement on the two-track approach to negotiations in El Salvador. It was a quote from Assistant Secretary Enders. The following week, our Secretary [Ambassador] to the United Nations, Ms. Kirkpatrick, said we are staying the course. Are you saying that it was not the case at all. Was Mr. Enders misquoted?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. It is very difficult to conduct anything when there are reports circulating around all the time allegedly based on what some unnamed person said that are not correct. And we simply cannot spend all our time commenting on every newspaper story that comes along.

Now, the burden of the newspaper story, and what I sought to correct was that had the U.S. Government decided that what we needed now was to encourage a negotiation between the guerrilla and the Government of El Salvador, bringing the guerrillas somehow into the Government, that approach we reject. I don't know where that came from. It was not correct. And that is what I had in mind in commenting on Mr. Kostmayer. I don't think we should get ourselves in a position of allowing somebody to shoot their way into a government.

MR. GARCIA. I have no problem with—

SECRETARY SHULTZ. That doesn't mean we shouldn't have a policy of trying to bring about reconciliation, of setting out ideas for how a more peaceful and constructive situation can exist. But as for the shooting your way into the Government approach, we don't go for it.

MR. GARCIA. I appreciate that. But the Washington Post reported that it was a statement made by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, Thomas Enders. The same Mr. Enders was written about by a leading columnist in the New York Times, Sidney Schaumburg, on the last days of our fiasco in Southeast Asia. Mr. Secretary, if he was misquoted in the last days of Cambodia, is he being misquoted again? There seems to be a consistency within his inconsistency. The problem is that this story was written by a very reputable newspaper, and the story in the New York Times by a columnist, by a very reputable reporter. Both stories were talking about the same individual, at a crucial moment in American history.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, I am afraid there is always a problem with people saying what somebody said to somebody. I sat in the Cabinet room the other day and heard the President initiate what I thought was a pretty good rule. I try to follow it myself. That was, if somebody in this administration has something they want to say, let them say it on the record and identify themselves. Then we know what we are talking about. But there is all this constant unnamed White House source, unnamed State Department source, unauthorized and what not. And it is a will-o'-the-wisp. So if somebody has something to say, get up and say it, the way you people all do. Let's grow up, be men and women, speak for ourselves on the record.

. . . . . .

Presentation of Freedom Foundation Award to Jamaican Prime Minister Seaga

Please be seated. It's a great pleasure to welcome all of you here this morning.

Continued

We're here to honor one of the foremost statesmen in our hemisphere and certainly our good friend and my good friend, the Prime Minister Edward Seaga of Jamaica.

Prime Minister Seaga's being awarded the 1982 American Friendship Medal by the Freedom's Foundation for his efforts to further democratic institutions and the free market economy and for his courageous leadership in the cause of freedom for all people. Few people are more deserving of this tribute than Prime Minister Seaga. People often say that freedom is a worthy ideal and it works. The proof of this axiom is reflected in the achievements in Jamaica of the man we're honoring today.

Before Prime Minister Seaga, there was violence and lawlessness. Now, there's peace and growing respect for the law. Before, there was despair about the future. Now, there is hope and expectation of better times ahead. In the recent past, the economy was declining. And now, through free enterprise, it is growing. And a short time ago few new jobs were being created and now there are significant employment opportunities. Without the political and economic freedom characteristic of democratic societies, these results would have been impossible.

Jamaica's demonstrating to its neighbors who share its structural economic problems and resulting political polarization that conditions of freedom and economic opportunity lead to greater prosperity and peace for all. Prime Minister Seaga's accomplishments are not limited to what he's done in Jamaica in just over 2 years. He has long opposed totalitarian inroads in the Caribbean Basin. He has fought long for the adherence of Basin states to the principles of free elections, respect for basic human rights and other democratic ideals that we all cherish.

Long-term prosperity cannot be achieved without internal conditions of political freedom and economic opportunity. But external assistance is often necessary to help overcome structural economic problems that impede development. This is particularly true in Caribbean Basin nations whose small economies are especially vulnerable to external shocks. Prime Minister Seaga's ideas about the need for outside trade and investment incentives to foster the region's economic development were an important intellectual force contributing to the development of my Caribbean Basin Initiative/CBI proposal to Congress last year.

Prime Minister Seaga has been the CBI's most persistent and eloquent Caribbean Initiative advocate and spokesman. And I am deeply disappointed that the CBI did not pass the Senate last December. [17] Last week, I sent up to Congress some legislation—on Friday as a matter of fact—on the CBI as one of our highest priorities. [18] And I am hopeful that it will pass quickly in this session.

A footnote in the text printed in Weekly Compelation of Presidential Documents inicates that the Congress knows this legislation is essential to help the Basin countries cope with economic difficulties not of their own making if their people are to have a better future.

In giving this prestigious award to Prime Minister Seaga, the Freedoms Foundation is recognizing a true friend of people everywhere who desire a better life through freedom and economic opportunity. And for that reason, he is, also, a friend of the United States.

It is now my great pleasure to present Dr. Robert Miller, the President of the Freedoms Foundation, who will present the American Friendship Medal to Prime Minister Seaga.

Address by President Reagan Before the Annual Meeting of the National Association of Manufacturers, March 10, 1983 [19]

"It Isn't Nutmeg That's at Stake in the Caribbean and Central America. It Is the U. S. National Security"

Thank you. (Applause) Thank you, Bernie, for your kind introduction and all of you for your warm welcome. And Madam Secretary and distinguished guests here at the head table and you ladies and gentlemen, I'm delighted to be here. I know that you and your President, Sandy Trowbridge, and the entire NAM organization have been an enormous help during the last two years, not only with advice and counsel but with a roll-up-your-sleeves effort to help pass the economic recovery programs that are ending this recession. And with your assistance we also were able to negotiate a bipartisan compromise solution to save our Social Security System. (Applause.)

You know, we didn't come to Washington at an ideal time, and we've—(laughter)—certainly had our share of problems. But the signs of recovery are springing up all around us. And there's no mistaking the fact that, at long last, America is on the mend—and the courage and the vision of the people and institutions that are represented here today deserve a big share of the credit for this hard-earned but inflation-free recovery. So, on behalf of all your fellow citizens who have been freed from the ravages of runaway inflation and can look again to a future of better times and then new opportunity, I thank you. (Applause.)

America is meeting her challenge here at home. But there are other challenges, equally important, that we must face. And today I'd like to talk to you about one of them.

Late last year I visited Central America. [20] Just a few weeks ago, our Ambassador, Jeane Kirkpatrick, also toured the area. And in the last few days, I have met with leaders of the Congress to discuss recent events in Central America and our policies in that troubled part of the world. So, today I'd like to report to you on these consultations, and why they're important to all of us.

The nations of Central America are among our nearest neighbors. El Salvador, for example, is nearer to Texas than Texas is to Massachusetts. Central America is simply too close, and the strategic stakes are too high, for us to ignore the danger of governments seizing power there with ideological and military ties to the Soviet Union.

Now, let me just show you how important Central America is. Here—and you can't see it from over there because I'm in the way—but here at the base of Central America is the Panama Canal. Half of all the foreign trade of the United States passes through either the Canal—(laughter)— [21] I've been dying to give you all an economic lesson, and you show up for geography. (Laughter and applause.) But as I say, half of that trade passes either through the Canal or the other Caribbean sea lanes on its way to or from our ports.

And, of course, to the no h, as you can see, is Mexico, a country of enormous human and material importance, with which we share 1,800 miles of peaceful frontier.

And between Mexico and the Canal lies Central America. As I speak to you today, its countries are in the midst of the gravest crisis in their history. Accumulated grievances, social and economic change are challenging traditional ways. New leaders with new aspirations have emerged who want a new and better deal for their peoples. And that is good.

The problem is that an aggressive minority has thrown in its lot with the Communists, looking to the Soviets and their own Cuban henchmen to help them pursue political change through violence. Nicaragua, right here, has become their base. And these extremists make no secret of their goal. They preach the doctrine of a quote "revolution without frontiers" unquote. Their first target is El Salvador.

Important? Well, to begin with, there's the sheer human tragedy. Thousands of people have already died, and unless the conflict is ended democratically, millions more could be affected throughout the hemisphere. The people of El Salvador have proved they want democracy. But if guerrilla violence succeeds, they won't get it. El Salvador will join Cuba and Nicaragua as a base for spreading violence to Guatemala, Honduras, Costa Rica—probably the most democratic country in the world today. The killing will increase and so will the threat to Panama, the Canal, and ultimately Mexico. In the process, vast numbers of men, women and children will lose their homes, their countries and their lives.

Make no mistake. We want the same thing the people of Central America want—an end to the killing. We want to see freedom preserved where it now exists and its rebirth where it does not. The Communist agenda, on the other hand, is to exploit human suffering in Central America to strike at the heart of the Western Hemisphere. By preventing reform and instilling their own brand of totalitarianism, they can threaten freedom and peace and weaken our national security.

I know a good many people wonder why we should care about whether Communist governments come into power in Nicaragua, El Salvador, or other such countries as Costa Rica and Honduras, Guatemala, and the islands of the Caribbean. One columnist argued last week that we shouldn't care because their products are not that vital to our economy.

That's like the argument of another so-called expert that we shouldn't worry about Castro's control over the island of Grenada—their only important product is nutmeg.

Well, let me just interject right here. Grenada, that tiny little island with Cuba at the west end of the Caribbean, Grenada at the east end, that tiny little island is building now, or having built for it, on its soil and shores, a naval base, a superior air base, storage bases and facilities for the storage of munitions, barracks and training grounds for the military. I'm sure all of that is simply to encourage the export of nutmeg.

People who make these arguments haven't taken a good look at a map lately or followed the extraordinary buildup of Soviet and Cuban military power in the region or read the Soviets discussions about why the region is important to them and how they intend to use it.

It isn't nutmeg that's at stake in the Caribbean and Central America. It is the U.S. national security.

Soviet military theorists want to destroy our capacity to resupply Western Europe in case of an emergency. They want to tie down our attention and forces on our own southern border and so limit our capacity to act in more distant places, such as Europe, the Persian Gulf, the Indian Ocean, the Sea of Japan.

Those Soviet theorists noticed what we failed to notice, that the Caribbean Sea and Central America constitute this nation's fourth border. If we must defend ourselves against large, hostile military presence on our border, our freedom to act elswhere to help others and to protect strategically vital sea lanes and resources has been drastically diminished.

They know this. They've written about this.

We've been slow to understand that the defense of the Caribbean and Central America against Marxist-Leninist takeover is vital to our national security in ways we're not accustomed to thinking about.

For the past three years, under two Presidents, the United States has been engaged in an effort to stop the advance of communism in Central America by doing what we do best, by supporting democracy. For 3 years, our goal has been to support fundamental change in this region, to replace poverty with development and dictatorship with democracy.

These objectives are not easy to obtain. We're on the right track. Costa Rica continues to set a democratic example, even in the midst of economic crises and Nicaraguan intimidation. Honduras has gone from military rule to a freely-elected civilian government. Despite incredible obstacles, the democratic center is holding in El Salvador, implementing land reform and working to replace the politics of death with a life of democracy.

So the good news is that our new policies have begun to work. Democracy, with free elections, free labor unions, freedom of religion, and respect for the integrity of the individual, is the clear choice of the overwhelming majority of Central Americans.

In fact, except for Cuba and its followers, no government and no significant sector of the public anywhere in this hemisphere wants to see the guerrillas seize power in El Salvador.

The bad news is that the struggle for democracy is still far from over. Despite their success in largely eliminating guerrilla political influence in populated areas and despite some improvements in military armaments and mobility, El Salvador's people remain under strong pressure from armed guerrillas controlled by extremists with Cuban-Soviet support.

The military capability of these guerrillas—and I would like to stress "military" capability—for these are not peasant irregulars. They are trained, military forces. This has kept political and economic progress from being turned into the peace the Salvadoran people so obviously want.

Part of the trouble is internal to El Salvador. But an important part is external: the availability of training, tactical guidance, and military supplies coming into El Salvador from Marxist Nicaragua. I am sure you have read about the guerrillas capturing rifles from government, national guard units. And recently, this has happened. But much more critical to guerrilla operations are the supplies and munitions that are infiltrated into El Salvador by land, sea, and air—by pack mules, by small boats, and by small aircraft.

These pipelines fuel the guerrilla offensives and keep alive the conviction of their extremist leaders that power will ultimately come from the barrels of their guns. Now, all this is happening in El Salvador just as a constitution is being written, as open presidential elections are being prepared, and as a peace commission—named last week—has begun to work on amnesty and national reconciliation to bring all social and political groups into the democratic process.

It is the guerrilla militants who have, so far, refused to use democratic means, have ignored the voice of the people of El Salvador, and have resorted to terror, sabotage, and bullets instead of the ballot box. During the past week, we have discussed all of these issues and more with leaders and Members of the Congress. Their views have helped shape our own thinking. And I believe that we have developed a common course to follow.

Here are some of the questions that are raised most often. First, how bad is the military situation? It is not good. Salvadoran soldiers have proved that, when they are well trained, led, and supplied, they can protect the people from guerrilla attacks. But so far, U.S. trainers have been able to train only one soldier in ten. There is a shortage of experienced officers. Supplies are unsure. The guerrillas have taken advantage of these shortcomings. For the moment at least, they have taken the tactical initiative just when the sharply limited funding Congress has so far approved is running out.

A second vital question is: Are we going to send American soldiers into combat? And the answer to that is a flat no.

A third question: are we going to Americanize the war with a lot of U.S. combat advisors? And again, the answer is, no.

Only Salvadorans can fight this war, just as only Salvadorans can decide El Salvador's future. What we can do is help to give them the skills and supplies they need to do the job for themselves.

That mostly means training. Without playing a combat role themselves and without accompanying Salvadoran units into combat, American specialists can help the Salvadoran army improve its operations.

Over the last year, despite manifest needs for more training, we have scrupulously kept our training activities well below our self-imposed numerical limit on numbers of trainers. We are currently reviewing what we can do to provide the most effective training possible to determine the minimum level of trainers needed, and where the training should best take place. We think the best way is to provide training outside of El Salvador, in the United States or elsewhere, but that costs a lot more. So the number of U.S. trainers in El Salvador will depend upon the resources available.

Question four: are we seeking a political or a military solution? Despite all I and others have said, some people still seem to think that our concern for security assistance means that all we care about is a military solution. That's nonsense. Bullets are no answer to economic inequities, social tensions, or political disagreements. Democracy is what we want, and what we want is to enable Salvadorans to stop the killing and sabotage so that economic and political reforms can take root. The real solution can only be a political one. This reality leads directly to a fifth question.

Why not stop the killings and start talking? Why not negotiate? Well, negotiations are already a key part of our policy. We support negotiations among all the nations of the region to strengthen democracy, to halt subversion, to stop the flow of arms, to respect borders, and to remove all the foreign military advisors, the Soviets, the Cubans, the East Germans, the PLO, as well as our own from the region.

A regional peace initiative is now emerging. We have been in close touch with its sponsors and wish it well, and we support negotiations within nations aimed at expanding participation in democratic institutions, at getting all parties to participate in free, nonviolent elections.

What we oppose are negotiations that would be used as a cynical device for dividing up power behind the people's back. We cannot support negotiations which instead of expanding democracy try to destroy it, negotiations which would simply distribute power among armed groups without the consent of the people of El Salvador.

We made that mistake some years ago in Laos when we pressed and pressured the Laotian government to form a government, a co-op with the Pathet Lao, the armed guerrillas who had been doing what the guerrillas are doing in El Salvador. And once they had that tripartite government they didn't rest until those guerrillas, the Pathet Lao had seized total control of the government of Laos. The thousands of Salvadorans who risked their lives to vote last year should not have their ballots thrown into the trash heap this year by letting a tiny minority on the fringe of a wide and diverse political spectrum shoot its way into power.

No, the only legitimate road to power, the only road we can support, is through the voting booth so that the people can choose for themselves; choose, as His Holiness the Pope said Sunday, "far from terror and in a climate of democratic conviviality."[22] This is fundamental, and it is a moral as well as a practical belief that all free people of the Americas share.

Having consulted with the Congress, let me tell you where we are now and what we'll be doing in the days ahead. We welcome all the help we can get. We will be submitting a comprehensive, integrated economic and military assistance plan for Central America.

First, we will bridge the existing gap in military assistance. Our projections of the amount of military assistance needed for El Salvador have remained relatively stable over the past two years. However, the Continuing Resolution budget procedure in the Congress last December led to a level of U.S. security assistance for El Salvador in 1983 below what we'd requested, below that provided in 1982, and below that requested for 1984. I'm proposing that $60 million of the monies already appropriated for our worldwide military assistance programs be immediately reallocated to El Salvador. Further, to build the kind of disciplined, skilled army that can take and hold the initiative while respecting the rights of its people, I will be amending my supplemental that is currently before the Congress to reallocate $50 million to El Salvador. And these funds will be sought without increasing the overall amount of the supplemental that we have already presented to the Congress. And, as I've said, the focus of this assistance will remain the same: to train Salvadorans so that they can defend themselves. Because El Salvador's problems are not unique in this region, I will also be asking for an additional $20 million for regional security assistance. These funds will be used to help neighboring states to maintain their national security, and will, of course, be subject to full Congressional review.

Secondly, we will work hard to support reform, human rights, and democracy in El Salvador. Last Thursday, the Salvadoran government extended the land reform program which has already distributed 20 percent of all the arable land in the country and transformed more than 65,000 farm workers into farm owners. What they ask is our continued economic support while the reform is completed. And we will provide it. With our support, we expect that the steady progress toward more equitable distribution of wealth and power in El Salvador will continue.

And, third, we will, I repeat, continue to work for human rights. Progress in this area has been slow, but sometimes—sometimes disappointing. But human rights means working at problems, not walking away from them. To make more progress, we must continue our support, advice, and help to El Salvador's people and democratic leaders. Lawbreakers must be brought to justice, and the rule of law must supplant violence in settling disputes. The key to ending violations to human rights is to build a stable, working democracy. Democracies are accountable to their citizens. And when abuses occur in a democracy, they cannot be covered up. With our support, we expect the Government of El Salvador to be able to move ahead in prosecuting the accused and in building a criminal justice system applicable to all and ultimately accountable to the elected representatives of the people.

And I hope you've noticed that I was speaking in millions, not billions. And that after two years in federal office is hard to do. (Laughter.) In fact, there are some areas of government where I think they spill as much as I've talked about here over a weekend.

But, fourth, the El Salvador Government proposes to solve its problems the only way they can be solved fairly—by having the people decide. President Magana has just announced nationwide elections moved up to this year, calling on all to participate, adversaries as well as friends. To help political adversaries participate in the elections, he has appointed a Peace Commission, including a Roman Catholic bishop and two independents. And he has called on the Organization of American States and the international community to help. We were proud to participate, along with representatives of other democratic nations, as observers in last March's Constituent Assembly elections. We would be equally pleased to contribute again to an international effort, perhaps in conjunction with the Organization of American States, to help the government ensure the broadest possible participation in the upcoming elections, with guarantees that all, including critics and adversaries, can be protected as they participate.

Let me just say a word about those elections last March. A great worldwide propaganda campaign had, for more than a year, portrayed the guerrillas as somehow representative of the people of El Salvador. We were told over and over again that the government was the oppressor of the people.

Came the elections, and suddenly it was the guerrilla force threatening death to any who would attempt to vote. More than 200 busses and trucks were attacked and burned and bombed in an effort to keep the people from going to the polls. But they went to the polls; they walked miles to do so. They stood in long lines for hours and hours. Our own Congressional observers came back and reported in one instance that they saw themselves—of a woman who had been shot by the guerrillas for trying to get to the polls, standing in the line, refusing medical attention until she had had her opportunity to go in and vote.

More than 80 percent of the electorate voted. I don't believe here in our land, where voting is so easy, that we've had a turnout that great in the last half century. They elected the present government and they voted for order, peace and democratic rule.

Finally, we must continue to help the people of El Salvador and the rest of Central America and the Caribbean to make economic progress. More than three-quarters of our assistance to this region has been economic. Because of the importance of economic development to that region, I will ask the Congress for $65 million in new monies and the reprogramming of $103 million from already appropriated worldwide funds for a total of $168 million in increased economic assistance for Central America. And to make sure that this assistance is as productive as possible, I'll continue to work with the Congress for the urgent enactment of the long-term opportunities for trade and free initiative that are contained in the Caribbean Basin Initiative.

In El Salvador and in the rest of Central America, there are today thousands of small businessmen, farmers, and workers who have kept up their productivity as well as their spirits in the face of personal danger, guerrilla sabotage, and adverse economic conditions. With them stand countless national and local officials, military and civic leaders and priests who have refused to give up on democracy. Their struggle for a better future deserves our help. We should be proud to offer it. For, in the last analysis, they're fighting for us, too.

By acting responsibly and avoiding illusory shortcuts, we can be both loyal to our friends and true to our peaceful democratic principles. A nation's character is measured by the relations it has with its neighbors. We need strong, stable neighbors with whom we can cooperate. And we will not let them down.

Our neighbors are risking life and limb to better their lives, to improve their lands and to build democracy. All they ask is our help and understanding as they face dangerous armed enemies of liberty and that our help be as sustained as their own commitment.

Now, none of this will work if we tire or falter in our support. I don't think that's what the American people want or what our traditions and faith require. Our neighbors' struggle for a better future and that struggle deserves our help and we should be proud to offer it.

We would in truth be opening a two-way street. We have never, I believe, fully realized the great potential of this Western Hemisphere. Oh, yes, I know in the past we've talked of plans. We've gone down there every once in a while with a great plan somehow for our neighbors to the South. But it was always a plan in which we, the big colossus of the North would impose on them. It was our idea.

Well, on my trip to Central and South America, I asked for their ideas. I pointed out that we had a common heritage. We'd all come as pioneers to these two great continents. We worship the same God. And we'd lived at peace with each other longer than most people in other parts of the world.

There are more than 600 million of us calling ourselves Americans, North, Central, and South. We haven't really begun to tap the vast resources of these two great continents.

Without sacrificing our national sovereignties, our own individual cultures or national pride, we could as neighbors make this Western Hemisphere, our hemisphere, a force for good such as the old world has never seen. But it starts with the word neighbor. And that is what I talked about down there and sought their partnership, their equal partnership in we, of the Western Hemisphere, coming together to truly develop fully the potential this hemisphere has.

Last Sunday, His Holiness Pope John Paul II prayed that the measures announced by President Magana would "contribute to orderly and peaceful progress" in El Salvador, progress "founded on the respect," he said, "for the rights of all, and that all have the possibility to cooperate in a climate of true democracy for the promotion of the common good."

My fellow Americans, we in the United States join in that prayer for democracy and peace in El Salvador, and we pledge our moral and material support to help the Salvadoran people achieve a more just and peaceful future. And in doing so, we stand true to both the highest values of our free society and our own vital interests.

Thank you and God bless you. (Applause.)

Statement by the Representative at the United Nations (Kirkpatrick) Before the U.N. Security Council, March 23, 1983 [23]

"Somocismo and Sandinismo Turn Out Not To Be Unlike Each Other"

Sir, may I begin, as in our custom, by congratulating you on your assumption of the Presidency of the Security Council for this month and expressing what I think you appreciate—the very great esteem of my Government for the democratic traditions, in theory and in practice, for which your country stands as an example to us all. I desire also to express my Government's gratitude to the President of the Security Council for the past month, the Permanent Representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Oleg Troyanovsky, for his responsible and expeditious conduct of the office of President of the Security Council.

We are living through an extraordinary period. One of the characteristics of this extraordinary period in which we now find ourselves is a kind of proliferation of rights. New rights unprecedented in human history are invented and claimed and, as with all rights, outrage is expressed when these new rights are violated.

Twice this month we have heard a new right invoked. We have heard one country invoke the "right to aggression", and we have heard outrage expressed when its "right to overthrow a neighbouring Government" was violated. We have heard the same Government outraged again when its "right to occupy a neighbouring territory" was violated.

Now comes the Government of Nicaragua claiming yet a new right—the "right of repression of its own people", with impunity and with immunity from any consequences flowing therefrom. The Government of Nicaragua has suggested today that someone is violating its "right to repress its people" and perhaps even its "right actively to attempt to overthrow neighbouring Governments and to direct revolutions from its own territory against its neighbours", and it has come to the international community in this international forum appealing that we protect it against the frustration and bitterness of its own people while it builds a harsh new military dictatorship to rule those people, to repress those people, to which it so clearly promised democracy.

That is precisely the appeal of the Nicaraguan Government to this Council today: protect Nicaragua in the free exercise of its "right to repression", repression at home, aggression abroad.

This is a new right, which we have not heard invoked before, but the myths by which it is accompanied are, unfortunately, already familiar. Those myths are as follows: that Nicaragua is a democratic revolution, armed for the sole purpose of liberating the Nicaraguan people from the yoke of dictatorship; that Nicaragua wants to live at peace with its neighbours; and that Nicaragua is about to be invaded by the United States or Honduras or someone.

I think these three myths, because of their crucial role in the extraordinary arguments which are now recurrent, made by the Government of Nicaragua, deserve a bit of examination by this Council as we consider the proposals before us today and an appropriate response to those.

First, the myth that the Sandinista military dictatorship is a democratic revolution. God knows the people of Nicaragua have longed for a democratic revolution. They joined, almost unanimously, in a fight against the heavy-handed dictatorship of Anastasio Somoza. They joined in the struggle because they were promised democracy. The promises that the so-called Sandinista Junta made to the people of Nicaragua and to the Organization of American States (OAS) are very clear. I think those promises are interesting today, so interesting that we should examine them. They are expressed with special clarity in a letter addressed by the Sandinist National Liberation Front (FSLN) to the Organization of American States, dated 17 July 1979.[24] That is the same month that the FSLN became the Government of Nicaragua. It was on the basis of those solemn promises, voluntarily offered to the Organization of American States, that the OAS and a good many others offered their support to the FSLN in its efforts to become the Government of Nicaragua. I should like to read that letter. It says:

[23] Source: U.N. document S/PV.2420. At eight meetings, March 23, 24, 25, 28, and 29, 1983, the U.N. Security Council considered a complaint by Nicaragua about "the grave increase in acts of aggression against Nicaragua and the Sandinista people's revolution;" text of the complaint is in U.N. document S/15651 (1983). At the end of the last meeting, the President of the Security Council, Sir John Thomson (United Kingdom), ruled that the "present stage" of the consideration of the item had been concluded.

"Mr. Secretary-General"

—that is, the Secretary-General of the Organization of American States—

"We are pleased to make available to you and to the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the member States of the Organization a document containing our plan to secure peace in our heroic, long-suffering country, at the moment when the people of Nicaragua is consolidating its political and military victory over the dictatorship.

"First, we have developed this plan on the basis of the resolution of the seventeenth meeting of consultations on June 23 1979—a resolution that was historic in every sense of the word: it demands the immediate replacement of the genocidal Somoza dictatorship, which is now nearing its end, and backs the installation of a broadly representative, democratic government in our country, such as the one we have formed.[25] While saying that the solution to this problem is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the people of Nicaragua, it appeals to hemispheric solidarity to preserve our people's right to self-determination. We are presenting to the community of nations of the hemisphere, in connection with our plan to secure peace, the goals that have inspired our Government ever since it was formed. They have been set forth in our documents and political declarations and we wish to ratify some of them here:

"1) our firm intention to establish full observance of human rights in our country, in accordance with the United Nations Universal Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Charter of Human Rights of the OAS—our observance of human rights has already been made plain by the way in which the Sandinista National Liberation Front has treated hundreds of prisoners of war—our Government thus invites the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights to visit our country as soon as we are installed in our national territory;

"2) our wish that our installation in Nicaragua come about through peaceful and orderly transition—the Government of National Reconstruction would take it as a gesture of solidarity if the Foreign Ministers of the hemisphere were to visit our country and we hereby extend to them a fraternal invitation to do so;

"3) our decision to embrace civil justice in our country and to try those incriminated of crime against the people according to the regular law—by their heroic struggle the people have won themselves the right to let justice prevail for the first time in half a century and will do so within the framework of the law, without a spirit of vengeance and without indiscriminate reprisals;

"4) those collaborators with the régime that may wish to leave the country and are not responsible for the genocide we have suffered or for other serious crimes that demand trial by the civil courts may do so with all necessary guarantees which the Government of National Reconstruction authorizes as of now; the departure of these persons may be supervised by the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights and by the International Red Cross;

"5) the plan to call the first free elections our country has known in this century so that Nicaraguans can elect their representatives to the city councils and to a constituent assembly, and later elect the country's highest authorities.

"Mr. Secretary, it is now up to the Governments of the hemisphere to speak so that the solidarity with the struggle of our people that was carried forward in the name of democracy and justice can be possible in Nicaragua and become fully effective.

"We ask that you transmit the text of this letter to the Foreign Ministers of the OAS.

"Yours most respectfully, Junta of the Government of National Reconstruction, Violeta de Chamorro, Sergio Ramirez Mercado, Alfonso Robelo Callejas, Daniel Ortega Saavedra, Moises Hassan."

It is an interesting letter. Those were presumably serious commitments, seriously entered into: commitments to respect for human rights; commitments to respect for the freedom of all Nicaraguans; including minorities; commitments to free election; commitments to a government of civil law—a rule of law, regular civil law. What happened to those commitments? We cannot be indifferent to that fact.

First, let us look at the commitment to respect human rights, including, of course, that most basic human, democratic right, the right to opposition, the right to autonomous activity, which is the very basis of a pluralist society. It is particularly sad to see what happened to those persons who joined the FSLN in establishing this Government and in making those commitments. Take, for example, the private sector. In October 1981, the leaders of COSEP, the umbrella private-sector organization established to co-operate with the Sandinista revolution, were arrested and gaoled for four months because they issued a statement criticizing official policy. Sandinista expropriation of private enterprise raised the Government's share of the economy progressively, but the offence of the leaders of COSEP was not to resist that progressive incorporation of the economy into the Government but to express—presumably—criticisms of it in exercise of their right of free speech. In November 1980, Sandinista security forces murdered the private-sector leader, Jorge Salazar, who was unarmed, in what everyone in the world understood to be a transparent set-up. The private-sector organization, COSEP, and the independent political parties at that stage withdrew from the Council of State in protest. But it was not only the private sector that suffered—very quickly—the repressive policies of the Sandinista Government; labour unions were harassed when they tried to resist being harnessed and incorporated into the State; their leaders were beaten and arrested; tightly controlled government, labour, and peasant organizations were established and promptly lost a good many of their members.

The independent press, whose rights were promised solemnly by the FSLN on assuming office, was quickly repressed, with the electronic media incorporated into a tight vise of Government control, and all organs of the newspapers, except for a single independent voice, La Prensa, which for years was the opposition to the Somoza Government, were co-ordinated, as it were, by the Government. Since then La Prensa has repeatedly been shut down, and is heavily censored.

Government-controlled newspapers and media published news stipulated by the Ministry of the Interior. La Prensa is subject to prior censorship; frequently it is forbidden to publish interviews and news, and it is always virtually forbidden to publish criticism. It is also forbidden to publish information concerning what it is forbidden to publish.

Churches in Nicaragua have been progressively repressed. Archbishop Obando y Bravo, who had, like the COSEP leaders, been a supporter of the revolution and a strong opponent of the Somoza régime, was banned from performing mass on television. The Catholic Church radio was closed down several times and eventually incorporated into a system of Government control. Repeatedly clergy were subjected to really quite humiliating attacks, and the Sandinista attempt to organize a parallel people's church has followed unsuccessful efforts to intimidate the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church of Nicaragua.

A variety of Protestant sects, including Evangelicals, Mormons, Adventists, Jehovah's Witnesses, and Moravians have been attacked; their centres have been taken over by Sandinista Defence committees and their pastors have been harassed. At least 55 Moravian churches on the Atlantic coast have been burned.

It is very important to know that of the thousands of Nicaraguans today living in exile in Honduras, Costa Rica, Panama, the United States, Venezuela and all sorts of other countries, a very large number supported, assisted and joined the Sandinistas in their opposition to the Somoza Government. Among these dissidents is one signatory of the letter I have read out, Alfonso Robelo, and another, Violeta Chamorro, has long since very quickly resigned from the Government and continues to be engaged in the struggle to maintain some sort of voice of freedom inside Nicaragua.

In addition to this systematic persecution of opposition forces the Government of Nicaragua has progressively violated its commitments to elections and, of course, to freedom of opposition. It has grown progressively intolerant, disillusioning a very large number of its original leadership.

On 8 April 1982, for example, after nine months underground, former FSLN Commander Eden Pastora, the famous Commander Zero, denounced the Sandinista régime's ties to Cuba and the Soviet Union and announced that his own exile organization would challenge the FSLN's control of Nicaragua. These are the people we are today hearing described as Somozistas, I think. These so called Somozistas were in a very large number of cases democrats determined precisely to free Nicaragua from any kind of dictatorial control and to establish democratic government in that society, and they have quite naturally been dismayed as their goals have receded ever further into the future as Nicaragua's government has become progressively an even more repressive military dictatorship headed by some nine military commanders who today govern the country with an iron grip.

There is, I think, no better expression of the spirit of intolerance with which Nicaragua is governed today than the threat of Comandante Humberto Ortega when he asserted that the opposition would be hanged from lampposts outside of Managua.

The promise of elections receded ever further, and finally it was announced that elections would be held in 1985, or not before 1985, and that the discussion of candidates for those elections would be banned until some time in 1984 and punishable by imprisonment—not under ordinary civil law at all but a special martial law that accompanied the state of siege.

The repression against the Catholic Church continued apace. I think its spirit was most clearly expressed in the response to the visit of the Pope. Pope John Paul II has of course been dismayed by the efforts of the Nicaraguan Government to establish a kind of puppet popular church. That has also dismayed Catholics throughout the region and I suppose indeed throughout the world.

In preparation for the Pope's visit an effort was made to delay papal communications and finally to diminish the crowds permitted to hear the Papal Mass. The British magazine The Economist noted that the Sandinistas

> "packed the Papal Mass in Managua with their supporters, who heckled the visitor. He was spirited out of Managua to the provinces in order to keep him from appearing too often alongside Managua's anti-Sandinista Archbishop Obando y Bravo. The Pope tried his own brand of passive resistance. The picture showing him with arms folded and bowed in disapproval as Commander Ortega delivered his tirade could not be kept from the front pages. However, most ordinary Nicaraguans were kept from contact with the Pope." [26]

Perhaps the clearest expression of the attitude of the official Sandinista Government regarding the Pope's visit was made in a radio broadcast from, of course, a Government radio station, in which one of the reporters said:

> "Despite the fame ascribed to Vatican diplomacy, the Pope engaged in political aggression, delivering a speech that was really political aggression as well as aggression against the people. This is why the people responded as they did." [27]

The Nicaraguan Government has repressed so many sectors of its own population that it hardly seems fair to single out just one sector; yet it remains true that the harshness with which they have treated the indigenous peoples of the Atlantic Coast, the Miskito, Suma and Rama Indians cannot go uncommented upon in any group seriously concerned about the nature of a Government of Nicaragua.

[26] Economist 286 (March 12, 1983): 13–14. The last sentence of the quoted passage should read: "But how many ordinary Nicaraguans heard, through the barrage, his plea for individual rights?"

[27] For this statement, see Foreign Broadcast Information Service, Daily Report: Latin America, March 7, 1983, p. P27.

The Miskito Indians were forcibly driven from their ancestral homes, their churches burned, their villages burned and in a good many cases their children forcibly separated from them. Thousands fled to Honduras, where they today live in refugee camps—deep inside Honduras, by the way, and not on that border any more. Those who did not flee have been herded by the Nicaraguan Government into internment camps where they are overcrowded and underoccupied, and disease is rampant.

Actually, the Foreign Minister of Nicaragua [28] himself said that it may be just to level some criticism against the first phase, as he called it, of the settlement of the Miskito Indians in the north of the country. The resettlement was not carried out with as much force as has sometimes been claimed said the Nicaraguan Foreign Minister, but nonetheless the mistake was that it happened too quickly; greater attention should have been paid to explaining the necessity for resettlement to the Miskitos. No consent was sought from the Miskitos no explanations were offered. The Miskitos were simply forced to abandon their homes.

The charges that Nicaragua has made against the United States are no more persuasive than the commitments it made to the Organization of American States. The Government of Nicaragua has repeatedly asserted the hostility to it of the Government of the United States. We might almost say that it suffers from an obsession concerning the hostility of the Government of the United States towards the Government of Nicaragua. That obsession, as has frequently been noted, is expressed in its national anthem, in which it refers to us as nothing more nor less than "the enemies of mankind."

Nicaragua's Government has charged repeatedly that the United States supported the Government of Anastasio Somoza and offered implacable opposition to its rise. The facts are that the United States Government, which provided no economic or military aid to the Somoza régime during its struggle for survival, acted immediately to assist the Nicaraguan revolutionary Government on its accession to power. From 19 July 1979, when the FSLN triumphed, to 30 September 1979, the United States provided a total of $24.6 million in emergency relief and recovery assistance. This emergency assistance consisted of emergency food and medical supplies, often shipped by air, assistance in housing reconstruction and a grant of grain to provide for emergency food supplies. From July 1979 through January 1981 approximately $118 million in direct United States assistance was provided to the new Government of Nicaragua. In addition to bilateral aid the United States actively supported all loans to Nicaragua by multilateral lending institutions, helping them to receive from the Inter-American Development Bank $262 million in loans from mid-1979 to the end of 1980, an amount almost double what the Somoza Government had received in the preceding 20 years.

During the first year and a half of its life, the Sandinista Government of Nicaragua received more economic aid from the United States than from any other country. It is absolutely false to suggest that the Government of the United States attempted in fact to oppose and damage the Government of Nicaragua in its efforts to liberate the people of Nicaragua from a semi-military dictatorship, the régime of Somoza. It is also absolutely false to suggest that it was the Reagan Administration which terminated aid to Nicaragua. It was in fact in the last months of the Carter Administration that the decision to cease United States aid to Nicaragua was made, and it was made because the Government of Nicaragua was repeatedly and systematically found to be violating its agreement not to co-operate with or support terrorism or violence in other countries or to intervene in the internal affairs of other countries. It was also violating its commitments to establish democracy and freedom for its own peoples.

The Government of Nicaragua claims that it is a peace-loving State surrounded by threatening neighbours. The fact, again, are very different. The facts are that the Government of Nicaragua has since its accession to power concentrated on building a military machine, unequalled now or ever, in Central America. A rapid arms build-up was undertaken immediately after the Sandinistas came to power, which arms build-up threatens the security of its neighbours. With a population of 2.7 million people, Nicaragua now has active-duty forces that number approximately 25,000, at least twice the size of Somoza's National Guard, with another [28] Miguel D'Escoto.

50,000 reservists and militia. To accommodate and train this force, large numbers of military garrisons have been built and enormous quantities of arms have been imported from the Soviet bloc. Some 2,000 Cuban Military and internal-security advisers are in Nicaragua; several hundred Nicaraguans are training or have completed training in Cuba and other Eastern European countries; sophisticated weapons, including Soviet-made T-55 tanks, amphibious ferries, helicopters, and transport aircraft, have been added to Nicaragua's arsenal, giving Nicaragua a military establishment which obviously far exceeds its own defence needs and far exceeds any military force ever seen in Central America.

In contrast, Costa Rica has no standing army, and Honduras, which has a million more people than Nicaragua, has total forces of about 17,500.

Nicaragua charges that the United States, aided by Honduras, is now intervening in its internal affairs and threatening the peace of the region. This assertion has been heard here, of course, before: it was indeed about a year ago—I believe on 25 March—that we heard the complaint of Mr. Daniel Ortega Saavedra that the United States was about to launch "an imminent large-scale military intervention against his country." In his letter requesting a meeting of the Security Council he wrote of an > "ever-increasing danger of a large-scale military intervention by the armed forces of the United States [which][29] constitutes a grave threat to the independence and sovereignty of the Central American countries and to international peace and security." (S/14913, annex, p. 1)

At that time, he spoke of the interventionist strategy of the Government of the United States and he said that his Government had clear evidence of the United States intention to attack Nicaragua directly and intervene directly in El Salvador.

We assured the Government of Nicaragua at that time that we had absolutely no intention of engaging in a large-scale military invasion of its country. The facts are, of course, as we pointed out then, that Nicaragua is the country in Central America which is involved in a major effort to destabilize other governments. The efforts of the Government of Nicaragua to destabilize the Government of El Salvador are so clear that they cannot any longer be denied even by the Government of Nicaragua which, for many months—indeed, we might say years—steadfast in the face of ever-greater evidence, denied the truth of this assertion. The Government of Nicaragua has sought to destabilize the Government of El Salvador by sending large and continuing shipments of arms into that country, over 200 tons in 1981. By providing training and support to El Salvador's guerrillas and directing guerrilla military actions in El Salvador from command and control centres inside Nicaragua, Nicaragua has so repeatedly violated Honduran sovereignty and territory with covert shipment of arms over its borders that it is literally the case that one loses count of the instances. Nicaragua has also engaged in the effort to foment guerrilla forces inside Honduras and has stocked arms inside Honduras. Some 10 tons of explosives and small arms, and thousands of rounds of ammunition, sophisticated communications equipment, uniforms, propaganda, trucks, cars for transporting arms have been uncovered in safe-houses in Honduras by the end of 1982.

Nicaragua has also systematically violated the rights of Costa Rica by attempts to deny Costa Rica use of the San Juan River, it has violated Costa Rica's borders and made arrogant threats that attempt to deny Costa Rica the right to the development of its own territory.

Nicaragua has not been interested in confirming the facts about the activities or intentions of its neighbours. The Nicaraguan Government, for example, rejected an invitation from the United States and Honduras to observe the joint military exercises held in the region.

On 18 February 1983 the Honduran Government invited the Sandinista Foreign Minister to inspect exile camps allegedly located in southern Honduras,[30] and on 23 February the Sandinista régime rejected the offer.

In fact, the Nicaraguan Government has recently become quite open about its own approach to its neighbours. Radio Venceremos, Broadcasting from Managua, recently said the following:

[29] Brackets in the source text.

[30] U.N. document S/15613 (1983).

"our war is and will continue to be national, but we view our plans in the framework of a regional conflict to which there are interests of the people of Central America, the Caribbean and Latin America."

They asserted in that same programme that:

"The rebels throughout the area have imported arms through all the routes we could. We have used all of Central America and other countries for those purposes." [31]

The Washington Post commented that the broadcast appeared to support charges made by the Reagan Administration that the insurgency found in other Central American countries was encouraged, armed and participated in obviously by the Government of Nicaragua. [32]

The Government of Nicaragua has repeatedly declined to participate in efforts of its neighbours—including the United States, let me say, but certainly not only or principally us—to find peaceful solutions to the conflicts which plague the area.

On 4 October 1982, in San Jose, there was articulated the so-called Final Act in which the democratic States of the region, for the first time, set forth conditions they regarded as essential to achieve peace in Central America. Those conditions, endorsed by the democratic States of the region and, I may add, by the United States as well, provide, we believe, a standing invitation and a solution, a plan, for the resolution of the problems and insecurity that afflict the region.

Those conditions include an end to foreign support to terrorists and subversive elements operating for the violent overthrow of other countries: that is, all countries would forgo violent or subversive activities inside any other country; an absolute end to arms trafficking—all arms trafficking from outside the area would cease; a ban on the importation of heavy weapons and limitation on all armaments and forces to those required for defence would apply to all Governments; the withdrawal of all foreign military and security advisers and troops under fully verifiable and reciprocal conditions: all countries would withdraw all foreign advisers and troops; absolute respect for the principle of non-intervention and the peaceful solution of disputes; all countries would agree not to intervene in the affairs of other countries and to resolve their disputes without recourse to force; respect for human rights, including fundamental freedoms such as freedom of speech, assembly, religion and the right to organize political parties, labour unions and other organizations; and the establishment of democratic, representative and participatory institutions through free and regular elections in an atmosphere of political reconciliation within each State.

One of the most striking facts about the San Jose Declaration and the principles set forth therein as the basis for peaceful resolution of all the problems of the region is their resemblance to the commitments made by the FSLN at the moment of its accession to power—the commitments made in its letter to the OAS. In proposing to the Government of Nicaragua that it join with other countries of the region in the affirmation of the principles one proposes only that it join in the reaffirmation of the principles with which it announced its own arrival in power.

That distinguished Englishman John Stuart Mill believed that a people's quest for liberty is an irrepressible drive: it may be put down once, twice, repeatedly, but never permanently. The recent political history of Nicaragua clearly illustrates the truth in John Stuart Mill's vision.

Having valiantly fought to overthrow a despotic military dictatorship, the Nicaraguans momentarily breathed the exhilarting air of freedom. This triumph of freedom over tyranny, of the people over its oppressors, was tragically short in the case of Nicaragua. The long-suffering Nicaraguan people saw their hopes for freedom and human rights gradually suffocated by yet another form of tyranny. To a people well versed in forms of despotism, the new developments after the triumph of Sandinism were ominously familiar.

The emerging pattern was easily recognizable: a few self-appointed individuals, lacking popular support, resorted to armed violence to maintain themselves in power. Instead of popular support, the new Government increasingly relied on military means; instead of consultation, it relied on coercion; instead of respecting human rights, it chose to trample them; instead of allowing for the free play of the political forces of the society, it systematically sought to destroy them.

[31] For a different text of the quoted passages from the Radio Venceremos broadcast of March 15, 1983, see Foreign Broadcast Information Service, Daily Report: Latin America, March 15, 1983, p. P13 and p. P12, respectively.

[32] An apparent reference to the Washington Post, March 14, 1983, p. A1.

Is it any wonder, then, that the Nicaraguan people, versed as they are in recognizing tyrants would increasingly turn against those whom they originally believed to be their liberators? Is there any surprise in the fact that the Nicaraguans, thirsty for real freedom, are now once more ready to fight for it as they did in the past? I believe not.

Somocismo and Sandinismo turn out not to be unlike each other. They are both military dictatorships denying the Nicaraguan people their human rights and human freedoms, their political rights and political freedoms. The fact is that the right to repression which is sought here today by the Government of Nicaragua cannot be granted by anybody. The right to repression is not a human right or a political right.

The violation of territorial integrity and sovereignty, the right to intervene in the internal affairs of others, cannot be granted by this body to the Government of Nicaragua or any other Government. It violates the Charter of the United Nations. It violates the commitments of this body to all its members.

There were references by the representative of Nicaragua to the political will of the United States Government. There were references also to the will of the Nicaraguan people to be free and independent. I should like to say that the political will of the present United States Government is no different from the political will of the people of Nicaragua to be free and independent.

An appeal was made by the Government of Nicaragua's representative that the United States put an end to its efforts at support for internal disturbances inside Nicaragua. I should like to make an appeal to the Government of Nicaragua to put an end to its repression of its own people, to put an end to its destabilization of its neighbours, to affirm instead its political will for freedom as promised to the people of Nicaragua, as promised to the fellow members of the Organization of American States and as, indeed, claimed by the Government of Nicaragua before this body. We appeal to the Government of Nicaragua to be true to its own promises to provide its own people those human rights, those freedoms, that fundamental respect and opportunity for peace and prosperity which it promised and which we all hope so fervently it will find.

I should like, in closing, to affirm the political will of the Government of the United States to join with other members of this hemisphere, or this body, or to stand aside while other members of this hemisphere—and of Central America specifically—work out solutions which provide for precisely those guarantees promised by the Sandinista Government to its people: respect for human rights, respect for good-neighbourliness, respect for the right of peoples to choose their own governments through competitive and free elections.

Response by the Representative at the United Nations (Kirkpatrick) to a Question Asked in the U.N. Security Council, March 25, 1983 [33]

"The United States Government Has No Aggressive Designs Against the Government of Nicaragua"

I should like to reply unequivocally that the United States Government has no aggressive designs against the Government of Nicaragua, against the Nicaraguan people; that the United States indeed has no intention of invading anyone or of conducting an armed action against anyone, or of occupying any other country. The United States Government, indeed, has no interest in any territorial aggrandizement whatsoever, and as far as the people of Nicaragua are concerned, we desire nothing whatsoever for the people of Nicaragua except precisely the fulfilment of those promises which the Government of Nicaragua—the Sandinista Junta of Nicaragua—made to those people on its accession to power.

Transcript of an Interview With the Representative at the United Nations (Kirkpatrick), April 12, 1983 [34]

"The American People Should Be Confident That the U.S. Government Is Not Breaking Its Own Laws"

Q. Is the United States in violation of the law that prohibits it from giving aid to any group or individual for the purpose of overthrowing the Nicaraguan Government?

A. Of course not. The United States would never knowingly violate a law under this administration. I can assure you of that. I don't think there is any reasonable chance that we are violating this law.

Q. Would it violate the law if the United States were supporting groups which had as their aim the overthrow of the Nicaraguan Government?

A. Actually, I think there are some ambiguities, but the statement of the Boland amendment is clear. [35] The Boland amendment states that the U.S. Government should not support anyone for the purpose—the U.S. Government should not seek to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. There was another amendment considered by Congress the same day—the Harkin amendment. [36] Many people who are talking about this whole subject are discussing the Harkin amendment which was defeated in the Congress.

Q. How would you feel if the aim of the contra-forces were to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government?

A. Do I think that the United States should protect the Government of Nicaragua against the anger of its own people? The answer is no, I don't think so.

Q. Should the United States support, with financial or military aid, the anger of the people?

A. I think that we have a very difficult situation in which the Nicaraguans have been actively supporting an effort by guerrillas to overthrow the Salvadoran Government and threaten the Governments of Honduras and Costa Rica. The guerrilla war against the Salvadoran Government is directed from Nicaragua. There have been a number of efforts to pursuade the Nicaraguans to abandon their repressive internal policies and to abandon their aggression against neighboring states. All of those efforts have failed. The Nicaraguan people are unhappy at the betrayal of their democratic revolution by the military dictatorship of their country.

Q. I'm not sure you have answered my question. Should the United States be supporting with indirect or direct assistance, groups which have as their aim the overthrow of the Government of Nicaragua?

[35] Section 793 of P.L. 97-377; enacted December 21, 1982; for text, see 96 Stat. 1865. This amendment provided that: "None of the funds provided in this Act may be used by the Central Intelligence Agency or the Department of Defense to furnish military equipment, military training or advice, or other support for military activities, to any group or individual, not part of a country's armed forces, for the purpose of overthrowing the Government of Nicaragua or provoking a military exchange between Nicaragua and Honduras."

[36] Representative Harkin's amendment provided that: "None of the funds provided in this Act may be used by the Central Intelligence Agency or the Department of Defense to furnish military equipment, military training or advice, or other support for military activities, to any group or individual, not part of a country's armed forces, for the purpose of assisting that group or individual in carrying out military activities in or against Nicaragua." Regarding the Boland and Harkin amendments, see Congress and Foreign Policy 1982, Committee on Foreign Affairs, U.S. House of Representatives, Committee Print (Washington, 1983), pp. 87–88.

A. I think the important thing for the United States is to live within our laws and support policy which is sensible for us. I think that we have the moral right to support the Afghan freedom fighters. In a situation where there is a clear effort by the Soviets and Cubans to support the destabilization of virtually all of Central America, and talk about implanting missiles aimed at the United States, I think we have the moral right to do that. Whether it is politically prudential or wise in a given situation is another question. The American people should be confident that the U.S. Government is not breaking its own laws.

Q. If the United States is convinced that El Salvador is crucial to U.S. strategic interests, why shouldn't the government tell the people that more will have to be done to win?

A. I don't think anyone believes that it is in the U.S. national interest for El Salvador to have a Communist government. Nicaragua and Cuba are frank about their goals for a Communist Central America. We are going to have to level with the people about how important this region is.

Q. But this administration has not stated its goals clearly.

A. Well, I think we talk about it a great deal. The President made a major speech on it about a month ago.[37] I do a great deal of talking about it.

Q. But if El Salvador is so strategic, why not ask for troops to be sent in?

A. That does not follow. I think that this is a very strange kind of attitude. We just rushed a great deal of heavy arms aid to Vietnam (sic).[38] because of the Vietnamese challenge on the Thai border. We send trainers to Lebanon. We can use American power without sending troops. We do it all the time.

Transcript of a Press Conference by the Secretary of State (Shultz), April 12, 1983 (Extract)[39]

"We Also Have To Think About Our Own Security"

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. Secretary, if I could take you to a different part of the world, you and other people in the administration have said to the Congress and publicly that the administration is not violating the Boland amendment, which says that the U.S. Government cannot aid forces in Nicaragua for the purpose of bringing down that government.

Some senior people in Congress have raised questions about that—even disputed it. Today, Congressman Barnes, the head of the Latin Subcommittee in the House, has introduced a measure to forbid any U.S. aid to any irregular force anywhere near Nicaragua having anything to do with Nicaragua.

In view of the congressional concerns about what is going on and what it is going to lead to, what is your attitude toward tightening the Boland amendment to take out any legal ambiguity or proceeding to a flat ban such as that which has been introduced by Congressman Barnes?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. As far as I know, there is no violation of the Boland amendment. I want to expand, however, and say, as people look at what is happening in Nicaragua, and ask themselves why, it shouldn't be difficult to figure out the answers. After all, here is a regime that came in, the Sandinistas. And what did they say? They said, "We don't believe in this dictatorship we just overthrew. We're going to have a free kind of system here. We're going to have elections. Everything is going to be great."

[39] Source: Department of State Press Release 106, April 12, 1983; also printed in the Department of State Bulletin, June 1983, pp. 10–13. The press conference began at 3:30 p.m.

And what have they done? They have completely gone back on the promise of elections. They have very badly suppressed freedom of the press. They have done a terrible job on the Miskito Indians, for example. They have been very hard on the church, as illustrated. As an illustration—there are lots of other things—but the illustration is the way in which they greeted the Pope on his recent visit. So if you look for explanations for why it is that the Nicaraguans are having internal trouble, you don't have to look very far. I think it's important to recognize these underlying facts.

Q. What about the question of whether you would support, or what your attitude is regarding the endeavor by many in Congress to either tighten up on this language so that no support can be given to irregular forces, or to ban it completely?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The moves being made that seem to be designed to prevent us from continuing to support our friends in El Salvador and elsewhere in Central America, in their effort to provide a military security shield so that they can go forward with the process of democracy, so that they can go forward with the process of economic development, so that they can go forward with the development of the human rights efforts in those countries, I think is the undermining of our ability to provide that shield and is a bad mistake.

It is bad not only in the region; it's bad for our country, because here we're talking about our neighborhood. We see that in Cuba there is a Communist-controlled country. The same thing is emerging rapidly in Nicaragua. And if that becomes the case in Central America, it is not only bad for the people in Central America—my gosh, if you care anything about human rights, I think you have to consider what is being done in that regard if you turn this over to the Communists. However, we also have to think about [our] own security, because here we're talking about our neighborhood. So I believe that the Congress should do the reprograming that we have asked for and support the continuity of effort that is necessary in El Salvador and elsewhere.

Q. Mr. Secretary, Ambassador Kirkpatrick made some comments in New York today that suggested the United States has a moral obligation to support groups like those in Nicaragua which are trying to overthrow the government.[40] Is that this administration's policy?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Certainly, when we see forces of democracy, forces that are opposed to something that takes on the aspect of tyranny, it's easy enough for us to figure out which side we're on. But our own immediate problem with Nicaragua is the undoubted use of Nicaragua as a base from which arms flow, largely through Cuba, to Nicaragua, and then to El Salvador. It's the "export of revolution without frontiers," I think is their phrase, to their neighbors that is the heart of the difficulty and which we are trying to cope with.

Q. Mr. Secretary, in spite of the validity of all that you've said about the situation in Central America, the United States is still signatory, and indeed was one of the founders of the OAS and wrote a good deal of the Charter.

What about Article 18 which specifically prohibits any intervention in a sovereign state?[41]

SECRETARY SHULTZ. We are talking about states that are very anxious to have us there. We're talking about helping. Here is Costa Rica that has no army; here is Honduras, struggling to make its democracy work; here is El Salvador, certainly with a pretty tough history and with lots of problems—no doubt about it—but, nevertheless, making some progress, and we're trying to be helpful. I think that is perfectly well in accord with the OAS Charter.

I also think it's well in accord with the OAS Charter to be opposing the export of revolution and the export of arms across national boundaries for the sake of encouraging the kind of disruption that we see in El Salvador. After all, look what these people have done to the chance of the people in El Salvador to make a decent living. They've blown up 55

[40] Supra.

[41] Article 18 of the Charter of the Organization of American States reads: "No State or group of States has the right to intervene, directly or indirectly, for any reason whatever, in the internal or external affairs of any other State. The foregoing principle prohibits not only armed force but also any other form of interference or attempted threat against the personality of the State or against its political, economic, and cultural elements." bridges; they have blown up power plants; they have disrupted the economic infrastructure. I suppose it's no wonder that they are reluctant to come into the democratic process. That would be a terrific platform to run on.

Statement by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Enders) Before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, April 12, 1983 [42]

U.S. Policy Toward Nicaragua

MR. ENDERS. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, [43] for your welcome, and I do welcome the opportunity to review in some detail U.S. policy toward Nicaragua.

I apologize for the length of the statement I would like to make. I will omit some parts of it, but perhaps it is wise at this point, given the opportunity you offer to reason, to debate what that policy is, to state it in its full detail.

Mr. Chairman, since the Somoza government collapsed and the Sandinistas came to power in Nicaragua, which was in 1979, our policy has focused on attempting to convince Nicaragua to do three things, to renounce support for insurgency in neighboring countries, to abandon its pursuit of dominant military power in Central America, and to come to terms with its own society through the creation of democratic institutions.

In July 1979, the soon to be governing junta of Nicaragua pledged formally to the Organization of American State [OAS] [44] that its goals were democratic and peaceful. [45] The United States and indeed the entire international community accepted this pledge and embarked on programs of peaceful reconstruction that typically included substantial appropriations of assistance outside annual budget processes.

As the months went by, however, it became increasingly apparent that the Sandinistas saw themselves as the armed vanguard of an isthmus-wide movement. Nicaragua's new regular army, the Ejercito Popular Sandinista [EPS], was founded in 1979. By the end of last year, according to its commander, it had grown to be four times as big and eight times as strong as Somoza's Guardia Nacional. The EPS reached an estimated strength of 20,000, backed up by militias and reserves 80,000 strong.

During the period since the revolution, Nicaragua has received an estimated 125 million dollars' worth of military equipment and supplies from the Soviet Union alone. It obtained by far the heaviest tanks in Central America, heavy artillery, antiaircraft weapons, assault helicopters, rocket launchers, and patrol boats.

While military pilots and crews trained in Bulgaria and other Eastern European locations, airfields were prepared for advanced jet fighters. More significant, large numbers of foreign military and security advisers were introduced. Currently, no less than 2,000 Cubans, 50 Soviets, 35 East Germans, and 50 PLO and Libyan personnel are estimated to be stationed in Nicaragua on security missions. That is roughly one foreign military adviser for every 1,000 Nicaraguans.

In 1980, just as in 1978, Castro had brought the three main Sandinista factions together in Havana. Cuban agents brought five guerrilla factions from El Salvador together in Managua, worked out a unity pact among them, then set up a joint command and control apparatus in the Managua area, and organized logistics and training support on Nicaraguan soil.

Since that time, the great bulk of the arms and munitions used by the insurgents in El Salvador have flowed through Nicaragua. Meanwhile, the Sandinistas moved to assert a monopoly of power inside Nicaragua. Elections were ridiculed and postponed. One by one, the elements of the broad anti-Somoza coalition were shorn off.

The famous newspaper, La Prensa, was censored, independent radio and TV stations curbed, labor unions intimidated, the private sector neutralized, the Catholic Church subjected to repeated provocation and attempts at division, the Miskitos and other Nicaraguan Indian minorities persecuted.

Nicaragua's southern border is 300 miles from the Panama Canal, separated only by Costa Rica, a democracy that for almost 35 years has had no army. Its northern border is 300 miles from Mexico. In between are two states, El Salvador and Guatemala, already torn by guerrilla violence, and Honduras, whose fledgling democracy is under daily pressure from Nicaragua.

It does not take very much imagination to understand how the Sandinistas' revolution without frontiers might spread, nor how its spread might affect our security. Half our trade flows through the Caribbean, and we depend on the stability of our neighbors to avoid what in certain circumstances could become an unprecedented flow of refugees northward to this country.

Especially now, when a troubled world economy invites unrest, we must safeguard democracy and stability in our immediate neighborhood.

We have all seen predatory dictatorships of the right and the left, Germany under Hitler and the Soviet Union under Stalin and since. And there is a school that attributes the expansionism of left wing dictatorships to pressures from abroad. According to this proposition, Soviet aggressiveness is but a reaction to the creation of a network of alliances around it. Castro was made a Communist by U.S. confrontation, and Vietnam was radicalized by foreign armies.

Whatever the merits or defects of these arguments, I would like to point out that the Nicaraguan case provides ample data to test the policy that usually flows from that proposition—that left wing radicalization and aggressiveness can be prevented by the political support and economic assistance of the democracies.

Nicaragua is a country of some 2 1/2 million people. Since 1979, it has received from the democracies and multilateral agencies $1.6 billion in economic assistance, or $640 for every man, woman, and child. The United States supplied $125 million of that. Politically, such democratic states as Mexico and the parties belonging to the Socialist International have provided consistent support.

Yet this same period marks the big buildup of the Sandinista army, the EPS, direct support for violence in El Salvador, and the consolidation of internal repression. It is clear that constructive engagement has not worked in Nicaragua.

THE CHAIRMAN. Secretary Enders, I have just been advised that there is a possibility that you may have to leave at 11 o'clock to address the Intelligence Committee. Is that correct?

MR. ENDERS. The Intelligence Committee is meeting, but I will leave when this hearing is over and then go and join that one.

THE CHAIRMAN. You will be able to stay then straight through here?

MR. ENDERS. Absolutely.

THE CHAIRMAN. Fine. Thank you very much. You can, of course, summarize your statement in any way that you want, but I would not want to cut off any part of it that you feel is important to be in public session today. Go right ahead, then. I thought maybe we would have to brief it if you had a time problem. If you have not, that is fine.

MR. ENDERS. Thank you.

If constructive engagement has not worked so far, negotiation has not worked any better. There have been several efforts. They continue today. I was involved in an effort, traveling to Managua in August 1981 to listen to Sandinista concerns.

They told me that they remembered the U.S. Marine occupation in the first decades of this century, that they feared a U.S. invasion, and thus needed a big army, and that we should understand that the Salvadoran guerrillas were important as a shield to protect the Nicaraguan revolution.

So, we said, OK, let us address your concerns. Let us enter into a bilateral nonaggression agreement. The United States could use its influence to encourage Nicaraguan exiles in this country to moderate their behavior, and the United States could renew its economic assistance.

In return, we asked the Sandinistas to stop training and supplying Salvadoran guerrillas, to give pluralism a chance in their own country, and to limit their military buildup perhaps through agreement with other Central American countries.

We made these proposals in writing. In October 1981, Managua formally rejected them as sterile. [46]

A second attempt at negotiation occurred in the spring of 1982, this time at the suggestion of Mexican President Lopez Portillo. Once again, we presented concrete proposals in writing, this time elaborated in eight points presented through our Ambassador in Managua. [47] Once again, there was no concrete response. Nicaragua simply replied that, before it could respond there would have to be a meeting at a higher level and in Mexico.

This time, it seemed to us, the Sandinistas wanted to appear to negotiate without actually doing so.

We tried a third time. Under Costa Rican leadership, a group of democratic states got together in San Jose in October 1982 to work out a comprehensive set of peace proposals for Central America as a whole. I would like to review them, because they continue to represent the essence of what we, like Nicaragua's democratic neighbors, are trying to achieve.

First, this group of democratic countries agreed that the area should be freed from East–West competition. The way to do that, we concluded, is to get all foreign military advisers and trainers from Cuba, the Soviet Union, Bulgaria, East Germany, the PLO, and, of course, ours, out of Central America.

Second, the Central American countries would have to find a way to live with each other without fear. To that end, the democracies proposed mutual and verifiable accords banning the import of heavy offensive weapons, renouncing their support for insurgency on neighbors' territory, and providing for international surveillance of frontiers.

And third, each Central American country would have to find a way to establish democratic institutions open to opposition elements.

Costa Rica on behalf of this group attempted to contact Nicaragua to ask whether it would enter into a dialog on the basis of these principles. The Sandinistas refused to receive the proposal, arguing they had not participated in its formulation and so were not bound to address it.

So a fourth attempt at negotiations is now being made. In January of this year, Mexico, Colombia, Venezuela, and Panama met on the Island of Contadora to propose an effort at mediation of Central America's conflict. [48] Honduras, Costa Rica, and El Salvador responded by proposing that the five Central American countries, including Nicaragua, meet in the presence of this Contadora group.

That would enable Nicaragua to take part in developing the proposals as it had not been able to do earlier. To maximize the chances that Nicaragua would participate, they suggested that the United States not be present. That would also take care of charges that the conference would be United States dominated.

But Nicaragua was still not receptive. Instead, it went to the U.N. Security Council claiming that it wants to meet bilaterally with the United States and with Honduras, not regionally. In effect, Nicaragua is saying it wants to discuss Nicaragua's charges against Honduras and the United States—but not its neighbors' concerns about Nicaragua's militarization, its dictatorship, and its intervention in El Salvador.

I have described this history at some length to give you some idea of the extraordinary difficulty of dealing with the Sandinista leadership. But despite this record we are not going to give up. The Sandinistas are obviously not yet persuaded that they have to negotiate on substance with either their neighbors or their internal critics.

Perhaps they still think that if they bob and weave enough something will change. Maybe the United States will bend or weaken its support for democratic governments in Costa Rica and El Salvador and Honduras and that the way will again be open for the revolution without frontiers. We must convince them that that is not the case and that the United States will not abandon its friends in Central America.

Meanwhile, the Nicaraguans have taken matters into their own hands. Sandinista intransigence has sparked an insurgency that the Sandinistas themselves claim is a threat. Several thousand guerrillas are now active in Nicaragua. Disillusioned Miskito Indians operate in much of their homeland in the Atlantic lowlands, in eastern and northern border departments of Jinotego and Nueva Segovia Madriz, Esteli, and Zelaya.

Significant insurgent forces are attacking government outposts and ambushing military convoys. Guerrilla activity is reported in the central coffee-growing province of Matagalpa. This month, for the first time, armed dissidence has been reported in the south. Whereever the opposition groups show up, they seem to attract local support and their numbers grow.

Who are these people who are challenging Managua's ideologues? What do they want? Well, based on what we know, there are two major groups. One of them, the larger, is the Fuerza Democratica Nicaraguense [FDN]. Although its main strength is inside Nicaragua, Sandinista repression has driven most of its leaders to Honduras and Costa Rica.

Its leadership is made up of a group of people who have been in many cases lifelong opponents of the Somoza regime. Some of them have been jailed for their support for opposition to Somoza. They have publicly stated that their objective is to bring democracy to Nicaragua and not a return to Somocismo.

In sociological terms, these leaders represent members of the professions and teachers, plus small businessmen and farmers. Their followers include disaffected peasants, former small farmers, Miskito Indians, and other groups displaced or simply repressed by Managua's ideologues.

We estimate that the FDN's ranks include over 1,000 guerrillas. Former National Guardsmen, mostly noncommissioned officers, lead many of these guerrilla units. Most of the members are peasants and former small farmers.

The FDN's pronouncements repudiate the Somoza past and affirm the nationalistic and patriotic principles of Sandino. As I am sure the committee is aware, the FDN proposed a peace plan on January 30, 1983, in which it offered to cease hostilities if, among other points, the Government of Nicaragua held internationally supervised elections by September 1983, revoked the stage of siege in Nicaragua, and separated public administration from partisan political and ideological activities.

The second major group, led by anti-Somoza hero, Eden Pastora, is ARDE [Alianza Revolucionaria Democratica]. ARDE's leaders include such well-known figures as former post-Somoza junta leader Alfonso Robelo, Miskito Indian leader Brooklyn Rivera, and former anti-Somoza fighter Fernando Chamorro.

Pastora, who was the original Sandinista Vice Minister of Defense, has repeatedly denounced the revolution's betrayal, which he argued was motivated by Cuban agents and forcing a sellout to the Soviet Union. Most of ARDE's statements have been issued from Costa Rica, but ARDE's February 2 peace proposal also calls for elections of a constituent assembly by June 1983 to fulfill the promise of the Sandinista revolution.

Mr. Chairman, it is not clear what the course of the struggle within Nicaragua is going to be. What is certain is that as long as Nicaragua forces legitimate dissent at home to follow violent means and persist in threatening and destabilizing its neighbors, it will never be stable, nor will Central America.

It is conceivable that Cuba or the Soviet Union could be tempted to escalate the conflict, introducing modern fighter aircraft or even Cuban combat troops. Clearly, a dangerous situation would then develop, unacceptable not only to Central America but to the American nations as a whole. We have communicated to Moscow and Havana how dangerous such a move would be.

It is also conceivable that in an effort to distract attention from their internal problems, the Sandinistas might lash out at their neighbors, attacking Costa Rica or Honduras. For over 1 year, Managua has already been running terrorist operations in San Jose and infiltrating guerrillas into northern Costa Rican provinces. There have been frequent border incidents with Honduras.

Although journalists who have visited the area report no activity on the Honduran side, Nicaragua has recently reinforced military units on the border. Again, I believe that the Sandinistas understand that they could not gain by attacking their neighbors. It is also important to stress that every resource of inter-American diplomacy, including, of course, that of this country, would be available to prevent such an outburst.

Clearly there is a better way. It is through dialog and negotiation. We asked the Sandinistas to think of the Nicaragua people. Despite all that foreign aid I mentioned, Nicaraguans in the cities and countryside are much less well off now than before the revolution. They resent the pressures on their churches and their clergy. They distrust and dislike the Sandinista monopoly of power. They lived under such a system before.

We asked the Sandinistas to consider the insurgency in their own country. Despite, or maybe it is because, of the presence of all of those armed Cubans popular resistance is spreading. They may conclude that the dialog they have so many times spurned is many times preferable to widening civil strife.

We asked the Sandinistas to consider the insurgency they are supporting in El Salvador. If it has legitimate grievances, let them be pursued through democratic institutions. The international community is willing and able to provide security and other guarantees for elections as the answer there as well as in Nicaragua.

Quite clearly, each element of the Central American problem is related to the other. No amount of land reform, or open elections, or improvement in human rights will end the conflict in El Salvador if Nicaragua continues to be able to fuel it. Democracy will not prosper in Nicaragua's neighbors unless it is practiced in Nicaragua as well. Nicaragua will not be free of the hostility of its own people and of its neighbors until it begins to address their concerns for democracy and security.

So the answer is democratization and dialog among neighbors. The purpose of the U.S. policy in the area is to create conditions in which Central America can be removed from the East–West conflict, in which the import of offensive weapons and mutual support for insurgencies can be ended and the democratic transformation of each society achieved.

That is, negotiations among all the Central American countries and negotiations within countries can provide the opportunity for all groups to compete in the voting booth rather than on the battlefield.

Thank you for your patience, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee.

Address by the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy (Iklé) Before the Chicago Council on Foreign Relations, Chicago, April 12, 1983 [49]

Defending Our Fourth Border

It gives me always great pleasure to return to Chicago: For those of us condemned to live in Washington, it is good for our health to get away from time to time and return to the center of America.

Today, I want to give you a brief overview of the Reagan administration's defense policy. But first I shall use part of my time for a defense problem that is particularly pressing and widely misunderstood. I shall talk to you about the security of our fourth border—our relationship with and interests in the Caribbean region.

In his speech on March 10, the President reminded us that the Soviet military noticed what we failed to notice: "that the Caribbean Sea and Central America constitute this Nation's fourth border." Somehow the American people and Congress have failed to recognize that the situation to the South of us is frought with great danger.

Public awareness of the security needs of our other three "borders" is much better. To the North, we appreciate the tranquility of our long frontier with Canada. Our main concern is the Soviet missile threat reaching over the Arctic region. Here, Congress and the public support our North American defense systems, based on four decades of close cooperation with Canada. And there is no disagreement that our intercontinental nuclear deterrent is absolutely vital, even though there is questioning in Congress as to the needed pace and shape of our program for maintaining this deterrent.

For the security needs of our "borders" to the East and to the West, the consensus at home is even more reassuring. To the East, two World Wars that began in Europe taught the American people the value of a strong Atlantic alliance to keep the peace. To the West, we have learned from the North Korean attack in 1950 that there, too, we must maintain firm alliances and U.S. commitments.

To the East and to the West, Congress, by-and-large, supports the continued forward deployment of some 480,000 U.S. forces. But to the South we are now debating whether we should have more or fewer than 50 U.S. trainers in El Salvador (we do have U.S. military deployed in Panama, Guantanamo, and Bermuda—altogether only some 14,000). Similarly, Congress appreciates the importance of security assistance for countries in the Mediterranean Basin: it approved some four-and-a-half-billion dollars. By contrast, Congress hesitates whether to approve only $46 million or $216 million for our neighbors in the South.

One wonders whether the American people realize that the Soviet arms assistance to Cuba is about 10 times larger now than all our assistance to Latin America. There are 25 times as many Soviet military advisors in Cuba than there are U.S. military advisors in all of Latin America. The Soviet support for Nicaragua is quite open. Soviet bloc ships deliver military equipment directly to Nicaraguan ports. Some 50 Soviet tanks have been introduced into Nicaragua, plus Soviet assault helicopters and Soviet transport aircraft. Seventy Nicaraguan pilots have been trained in Bulgaria to fly MIGs (the Soviet fighter aircraft). Why do some people complain that the Reagan administration seeks to bring the East–West conflict to the Caribbean region? The East is already there, in larger numbers to boot.

I could go on, reporting to you the dangerous developments across our "fourth border":

Nicaragua is building up the largest military force in Central America, larger than that of Mexico.

Nicaragua has long served as a headquarters area and transshipment place for the insurgents in El Salvador.

Nicaraguan diplomats have been caught promoting terrorism against the social-democratic government of Costa Rica.

On the island of Grenada, Cuban influence and interference have led to a Marxist dictatorship.

Southeast of Grenada, the formerly democratic nation of Surinam is being forced into a brutal, totalitarian dictorship, with Cuban coaching and support.

I have been asking myself why there is so much indifference in Congress and in the media toward these appalling trends, why we have so much disunity and dissention as to what the United States should do. I have been asking myself why the rather modest effort proposed by the Reagan Administration has been attacked and voted down. I have been wondering why there is no more complaining that the administration is doing too little and too late.

Why is there such disinterest in this region so close to us? Why the clamor that we should ignore what is happening in Central America and "get out." I wonder whether this attitude does not reflect a certain condescension toward our friends in Latin America, an outrageous view of these countries as "banana republics" that are unqualified to become modern democracies, a condescension toward the accomplishments of our neighbors in the South.

Do you know that among the 32 independent states of Latin America, eleven are democratic and more have begun the process to achieve full democracy. Since 1978 alone, five countries have made a peaceful transition from military regimes to elected democratic governments.

READEX FICHE

El Salvador had a democratic revolution in 1979, starting on the road of land-reform and pluralistic elections. This represented a deadly threat to Fidel Castro—a democratic, reform-minded government replacing the military regime in El Salvador. Hence, Castro had to organize the attack on this process of democratization. The insurgent forces that he coordinated and supplied with arms were quite efficient. They destroyed 55 of the country's 260 bridges, they damaged water supplies, they caused over 5000 interruptions in the electrical power system, they destroyed 13 crop-dusting planes and over 200 buses . . . .[50]

Apart from the condescension that is reflected in the apathy towards the Caribbean region, there is also complacency about our adversaries that threaten our "fourth border." The complacency, in part, stems from the lack of a long-term view, the inability to see a trend in the consolidation of Marxist dictatorships: Cuba, Nicaragua, Grenada, Surinam . . . . Too many people underestimate the seriousness of our opponents, their single-minded pursuit of the monopoly of power designed to destroy all opposition. On March 25, the radio station of the Salvadoran insurgents announced: "We are winning this war and could not care less about any amnesty."

We must confront the fundamental facts. An outside imperialist power—the Soviet Union—is tilting the social-political process in the Caribbean region towards a new totalitarian order. The Moscow-Havana axis is intervening with all the instruments at its disposal: propaganda, political organization, money, terrorism, providing repressive police forces, providing arms and military training, and outright support for armed intervention. The goal of the Moscow-Havana axis is to make this expansion of totalitarian control irreversible and to destroy the chances for democracy.

The Reagan administration is sometimes accused in Washington of wanting a "military solution," or (worse yet in the eyes of our critics) of wanting "military victory." Well, let me tell you, we in the Reagan administration do not want a defeat, and we do not want a stalemate.

If we are not prepared to help our friends to win in defending against a military assault, then we should not become involved at all. We cannot improve human rights in a country and we cannot have economic development, if we cannot help that country to stop armed attacks against its economy and its people.

We recognize that the struggle requires support primarily for economic and political development. Three-fourths of our assistance to the region is for these purposes, only one-fourth is for military aid. Let us remember that some 35 years ago, the democratic forces lost a similar contest in Eastern Europe. Stalin employed both military means and political intervention to prevent democracy from taking a hold in Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia.

Obviously the situation in the Caribbean region is different in many respects. However, if we deny arms, ammunition and money to those fighting the Moscow-Havana axis; if we force those who wish to build democracy to share power with those bent on destroying it; if we simply wash our hands of the conflict; then, indeed, the forces of totalitarianism in the region are adequate to turn it into another "Eastern Europe."

As the American people and Congress become more aware of the dangers to the South of us, I am confident we will be able to develop a broad consensus for defending our "fourth border," as we have long ago developed a consensus for defending our interest East and West.

Remarks by President Reagan, April 14, 1983 (Extract) [51]

"We Are Complying With the Law"

. . . . . .

[51] Source: White House Press Release, April 14, 1983, Office of the Press Secretary to the President; printed also in Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, April 18, 1983, pp. 545–547. The President made his remarks in a question-and-answer session with the press in the Briefing Room of the White House beginning at 4:02 p.m.

Q. Mr. President, are we directly or indirectly supplying, arming or training any insurgents—Nicaraguan insurgents—and if so, why?

THE PRESIDENT. We are complying with the law, the Boland amendment, which is the law. We're complying with that fully. And in—

Q. Does that mean we are not arming or supplying any of the dissidents along the border, the Honduran border?

THE PRESIDENT. I am not going to get—I could not and would not possibly talk about such things. But may I point out that this whole controversy over Nicaragua is ignoring some realities, that the Nicaraguan Government is a revolutionary government that took power by force, but with the promise of democratic elections, none of which have taken place. And all of this was under the previous administration. The previous administration, however, did recognize this Government of Nicaragua, sought to help it with considerable financial aid and withdrew that aid, long before we were here, when it became apparent that the government had become completely Marxist, had turned away and thrown out some of the democratic groups that had supported them and fought with them in the revolution to bring democracy to Nicaragua and were, then, no longer a part of the government.

But also the cutoff of funds was because the Nicaraguan Government had pledged to the United States that it would not attempt to overthrow any other governments in Central America, particularly El Salvador, by helping the insurgents there, the guerrillas, and they violated that promise. And they are still violating it. And anything that we're doing in that area is simply trying to interdict the supply lines which are supplying the guerrillas in El Salvador. But the picture today is that Nicaragua, with its protests that somehow someone is trying to overthrow them, it, as a revolutionary government, is trying to overthrow the government of a neighboring country, El Salvador, which was a duly-elected government and which is going to hold another election before this year is out.

Q. But, Mr. President, what is the American public to think if Congressman Boland, who, as you know, is Chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, says there's very strong evidence that we are violating the law? [52] How do we clear this with the American people? Don't they have a reason, if a Congressman is saying that we're violating the law, that something's wrong—

THE PRESIDENT. You misled him. (Laughter)

Q. No, but he has access to intelligence information, to administration briefings.

THE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Q. What's going on?

THE PRESIDENT. And I think Secretary Shultz and our Security Adviser, Judge Clark, have both been talking to him, and you have seen the statement by Barry Goldwater of the Intelligence Committee that is absolutely positive that there is no violation of the law whatsoever. [53] I think that when they pay a little more attention to this, they're going to find out we're not violating the law.

Let me do what I promised the other day and start with some of the people in the back of the room here.

Q. Mr. President, are you willing to say flatly that the United States is not engaging in any activities that a reasonable person could assume would be for the purpose of overthrowing the Nicaraguan Government?

THE PRESIDENT. We are not doing anything to try and overthrow the Nicaraguan Government. As a matter of fact, let's put that in perspective for a moment. Nicaragua today has created the biggest military force in all of Central America and large parts of South America—an army of some 25,000 backed by a militia of 50,000, armed with Soviet weapons that consist of heavy-duty tanks, an air force, helicopter gun ships, fighter planes, bombers and so forth, heavy artillery, and a few thousand Miskito Indians and guerrillas. I don't think it's reasonable to assume that that kind of a force could nurse any ambitions that they can overthrow that government with that great military force. And I think that people should understand some of these things and ask themselves what is the need for them having the biggest army in all of the region.

[52] Boland is quoted in the New York Times, April 14, 1983, pp. A1, A8, as saying in reference to congressional restrictions on U.S. assistance to forces opposed to the Nicaraguan Government: "It is my judgment that there has been an apparent violation of the law."

[53] Goldwater is quoted ibid., April 13, 1983, p. A1.

There are—we are cooperating with the other Central American countries in the region to try and bring democracy and peace to Central America.

Q. Yes. Mr. President, this morning your Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, Mr. Enders, told the House Foreign Affairs meeting that there was a possibility Cuba or the Soviet Union may introduce high performance aircraft or even Cuban troops into Nicaragua.[54] Do you have any information about any impending possibility of this? And, if so, what would be the American response to that move?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I think—I'm not going to answer a hypothetical question with a hypothetical answer. And I only know that that possibility does exist because the Soviet Union, by way of Cuba, has been engaged already. May I remind you that at the inauguration of the revolutionary government when it took over, Castro was present and a representative of the Soviet Union and both of them openly hailed Nicaragua as the first Communist country on the mainland of the Western Hemisphere.

Q. Mr. President, could I ask a domestic question?

THE PRESIDENT. What?

Q. Mr. President—

Q. Could I ask a question on a domestic issue?

Q. Mr. President, considering what you've just said about Nicaragua and your past statements about how it is a staging area there, doesn't the United States want that government replaced? And is there anything that you feel that we should be doing within the law to have that government in Nicaragua replaced with a democratic one?

THE PRESIDENT. We, of course, as I said—anything that we're doing is aimed at interdicting these supply lines and stopping this effort to overthrow the El Salvador Government. But what I might personally wish or what our government might wish still would not justify us violating the law of the land.

Q. You're not doing anything to overthrow the government there?

THE PRESIDENT. No, because that would be violating the law.

Transcript of a Joint Press Conference by the Secretary of State (Shultz) and the Secretary of the Treasury (Regan) En Route to Mexico City, April 17, 1983[55]

The Relationship Between Mexico and the United States

SECRETARY SHULTZ. We plan to discuss the relationships between Mexico and the United States and to review, under the umbrella of a longstanding binational commission, a variety of issues that come along; to renew our sense of ability to deal with these issues. It's a kind of a problem solving type of mission. It is a new government here under President de la Madrid and this will be the first high level visit with them.[56] We've been seeking to arrange this for some time and this was the first time when we were able to find a mutually convenient date for it.

Q. Is there anything, sir, about Central America that you're going to ask or want to discuss with the Mexicans in terms of their role in any kind of negotiation or resolution to that whole problem?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Developments in Central America are clearly of great concern to us and to the Government of Mexico, understandably in both cases, and [55] Source: Department of State Press Release 111, April 19, 1983. Secretary of Commerce Malcolm Baldrige accompanied Secretaries Shultz and Regan on the trip to Mexico.

[56] Miguel de la Madrid Hurtado took office December 1, 1982.

I think it's going to be important for us both to exchange ideas and information and to see what patterns of collaboration, if any, we can work out in helping the people there to deal with those problems. Neither of us want to see warfare there; both of us want to see stability in that region. And so I'm sure it's going to be a matter that both parties will want to talk about.

Q. The United States and Mexico are on a collision on Central America. They recognize Nicaragua and Cuba; they are for negotiations; you oppose them. We have the feeling that the two countries are talking past each other.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, we're going to talk to each other, that's the point and we'll see what information we may be able to provide mutually and whether or not there are things we can do.

Q. Should we, Mr. Secretary, on this trip be looking for anything, that is to say by way of some new initiative that may emerge to—that would pursue a solution in El Salvador, Central America—or is that too ambitious out of this trip?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, I don't know of any new initiative that might be talked about, but we're certainly going to discuss these issues and if we can find something that we think could be useful we'll certainly be ready to pursue it.

Q. You said the other day there's a fair distance between the point of view of Mexico and the point of view of Washington?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. It was just described, fairly.

Q. Mr. Secretary, you saw Don's story in the Post today about the U.S. proposed reactions under discussion, including direct use of U.S. air and naval power, etc., United States considering contemplating various strong military political measures, in response to potential escalation of military activity in Central America by Cuba and the Soviet Union.[87] Can you tell us about what, in fact, the administration is contemplating, or do you see any such move by the Soviets?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The adminstration is not contemplating any Americanization of the conflict in Central America. We observe and have said on a number of occasions, obviously a large flow of armaments from the Soviet Union to Cuba, from Cuba to Nicaragua and on into the adjacent countries and into El Salvador. We see Cuban advisers in large numbers in Nicaragua and we see a stridency in rhetoric that is very Soviet-oriented in its tone, and so it seems clear that there is a growing Soviet-Cuban influence in Nicaragua. I don't know whether that was what was being referred to in the story or not. I just glanced at it here.

Q. What it talks about is that the administration is contemplating proposed reactions, those under discussion include direct use of U.S. air and naval power, dispatching U.S. Air Force jets to the area to offset Soviet-made jets, etc?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I don't know—well, I'm not going to comment on a news story when I don't know what its sources are, not me.

Q. Forgetting his sources, is the story accurate?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I think it has been said that AWACS are in use in the region as a matter of intelligence gathering.

Q. You're not going to take this question, is that it?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I said there is no plan, that I know of, to Americanize that war and the things that are described there are by way of Americanizing the war.

Q. Are you planning on going to the Middle East soon? This week—Thursday?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I don't have any current plan to go to the Middle East. I'm not saying that I won't. I will go when there is something constructive to be accomplished.

Q. Are you going to name some sort of senior adviser to try to accelerate the possibility of finding some solution for El Salvador?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, that formulation of a high-level person that might be useful to the Government of El Salvador is certainly under consideration. I think to be useful, the Government of El Salvador

---

[87] Reference is to an article by Don Oberdorfer in the Washington Post, April 17, 1983, p. A1.

has to think so—not just the Government of the United States.

Q. Do you have any person in mind?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. And I think that if someone is named it might be somebody from the United States, but not necessarily.

Q. Sir, what do we want from the Mexican Government in terms of Central America? I mean for the past few years basically we haven't been happy with Mexico because of its position on Nicaragua. At this point, what do you want?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, I don't want to sort of pre-stage what I intend to say to them before we get there and talk about it. So, I think I'll just leave it at that.

Q. How serious is their economic crisis?

SECRETARY REGAN. Mexico is trying to work its way out of its economic difficulties. They have a sensible plan; they are trying to bring their inflation under control; they're trying to provide more jobs; they're trying to cut down on their money supply; they have been helped in their balance of payments by IMF loans, VIS [BIS] loans, loans from the U.S. Government of a temporary nature, plus, of course, loans from commercial banks. All of these should take up the slack as far as their balance of payments problems are concerned.

Q. Does their situation look a lot better now than it did say last August?

SECRETARY REGAN. A great deal better as a result of the measures that the de la Madrid government has taken in order to get sustained economic growth for Mexico.

Q. Do you think they will need further commercial bank loans this year?

SECRETARY REGAN. At the present time, it does not look that way but that's not to say that the situation might change depending upon what happens in the world's economy or prices of oil or other things of that nature.

Q. Hasn't the falling oil prices knocked the stuffing out of their foreign exchange?

SECRETARY REGAN. Well, falling oil prices are not helpful, obviously, to their foreign exchange. It's a question of how much oil can they sell and at what price. However, were interest rates to decline, that would more than offset the fall in the oil prices.

Q. Is the United States prepared, if necessary, to help Mexico now?

SECRETARY REGAN. Well, that's one of the things that we will be discussing with Mexico. At the current time no additional help is needed.

Q. Interest rates falling where?

SECRETARY REGAN. Interest rates falling worldwide. Their loans are at floating rates. Either based upon the London and the interbank rate, LIBOR, or based upon the American prime and usually these two go fairly well together in parallel.

Q. Mr. Secretary, will there be any effort on the part of the United States to use the economic leverage given Mexico's debt position, etc., to get them to mute some of their differences with the United States on policies toward Central America?

SECRETARY REGAN. I don't think that those two necessarily tie in one to the other. I think Mexico is our third largest trading partner and it's up to us to try to help Mexico and its economy for our own selfish good. The big switch that was made in 1982, wherein they, instead of we having a surplus with them, we ended up with a deficit in trade, a swing of some $8 billion as a result of their having to cut back in their economy. So it's in our interest to try to help them get their economy started.

Q. Are you ruling out any use of economic leverage?

SECRETARY REGAN. Well, we don't use economic leverage in that sense of the term, no.

Q. What are you using? What sense of the term are you using?

SECRETARY REGAN. Well, we don't use economic leverage from that point of view. We try to help our trading partners.

Q. From our point of view, what do we want from Mexico in terms of their economic situation and in terms of the whole situation there?

SECRETARY REGAN. Well, if Mexico gets back into a growth situation, where they can once again start importing more than they were, we in the United States will get a good share of that business.

Q. But is there anything that we want in terms of their policies at this point—their economic policies?

SECRETARY REGAN. No, we think that the program that the Mexicans have worked out with the IMF is a very sensible program. It's a tough one and we hope they'll be able to carry it out.

Q. How do you explain the fact that we have three Cabinet members on this trip? Isn't it pretty unusual, Mr. Secretary?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. This is an unusual relationship. Mexico is our neighbor. Mexico is our third largest trading partner. There are 200 million legal border crossings per year. We live in the same area—the area has a lot of turmoil in it. When we review all of the issues, they fall across a wide spectrum. So, I think it's important to us and the fact that there are three Cabinet officers going is an indication of our view that it is important.

Q. Do you think there's going to be any change of point of view on Central America? The United States has its position—no negotiations, no shooting their way in, etc., no recognition, the indictment of Nicaragua. We know what the Mexican position is. Do you think that as a result of this trip there will be any shifts in positions?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. We'll have to see, but we'll certainly spend time talking about the issues. We'll explain our view and listen to theirs and see if there are any areas where we might collaborate effectively.

Q. Is the appointment of a high-level intermediary a precondition for approval of the $60 million aid request by the House subcommittee?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. There has been discussion about that and Congressman Long has been putting this idea forward for quite some time and we've been thinking about it and talking to him about it and trying to on the one hand get clarity on what he has in mind and, on the other hand consider ourselves—what, if anything, might be useful.

Q. Wouldn't a foreign mediator make a lot more sense than an American mediator?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I think when it comes to mediators an awful lot depends upon the person as distinct from where that person might come. Well, if there is somebody, it might very well be a U.S. person, a Foreign Service top person or maybe somebody not of the Government; or it might be somebody from outside the United States. But I think the key thing is that the person be well-versed in the area and have the stature and kind of sense or savvy that would make that person effective.

Q. I can't imagine who in the United States would have credibility within the guerrilla movement?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The point is to help the Government of El Salvador define conditions under which people could come into the electoral process that are genuinely credible conditions. And I think that's quite a possible thing to do. Now whether the guerrillas will come into the democratic process or not is certainly an open question.

Q. Mr. Secretary, if this high senior level negotiator were named, would the United States—would you shift the U.S. position in any way against shooting their way into power or stay within the same ground rules?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. There is no shift—no contemplated shift and you asked about this and we've talked about it as though it's sort of an imminent possibility and I wouldn't want to turn it into your lead or anything like that. It's something that Congressman Long has been talking about and he has some leverage and there's also—there's merit to the idea but it has to be considered and there's some downsides, too, if it isn't done right.

Q. The Post made it their lead this morning—that's why we're talking about it.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Some news day! (Laughter) Thank you very much.

Q. Thank you.

Address by President Reagan to a Joint Session of the Congress, April 27, 1983 [58]

"The National Security of All the Americas Is At Stake in Central America"

Thank you. (Applause) Mr. Speaker, Mr. President, distinguished Members of the Congress, honored guests, and my fellow Americans, a number of times in past years, Members of Congress and a President have come together in meetings like this to resolve a crisis. I have asked for this meeting in the hope that we can prevent one. (Applause)

It would be hard to find many Americans who aren't aware of our stake in the Middle East, the Persian Gulf, or the NATO line dividing the free world from the Communist bloc. The same could be said for Asia.

But in spite of, or maybe because of, a flurry of stories about places like Nicaragua and El Salvador and, yes, some concerted propaganda, many of us find it hard to believe we have a stake in problems involving those countries. Too many have thought of Central America as just that place way down below Mexico that can't possibly constitute a threat to our well being. And that's why I've asked for this session. Central America's problems do directly affect the security and the well being of our own people. And Central America is much closer to the United States than many of the world trouble spots that concern us. So, we work to restore our own economy, we cannot afford to lose sight of our neighbors to the South.

El Salvador is nearer to Texas than Texas is to Massachusetts. Nicaragua is just as close to Miami, San Antonio, San Diego, and Tucson as those cities are to Washington where we're gathered tonight.

But nearness on the map doesn't even begin to tell the strategic importance of Central America, bordering as it does on the Caribbean—our lifeline to the outside world. Two-thirds of all our foreign trade and petroleum pass through the Panama Canal and the Caribbean. In a European crisis, at least half of our supplies for NATO would go through these areas by sea. It's well to remember that in early 1942 a handful of Hitler's submarines sank more tonnage there than in all of the Atlantic Ocean. And they did this without a single naval base anywhere in the area.

And today the situation is different. Cuba is host to a Soviet combat brigade, a submarine base capable of servicing Soviet submarines and military air bases visited regularly by Soviet military aircraft.

Because of its importance, the Caribbean Basin is a magnet for adventurism. We are all aware of the Libyan cargo planes refueling in Brazil a few days ago on their way to deliver "medical supplies" to Nicaragua. Brazilian authorities discovered the so-called "medical supplies" were actually munitions, and prevented their delivery.

You may remember that last month, speaking on national television, I showed an aerial photo of an airfield being built on the island of Grenada. [59] Well, if that airfield had been completed, those planes could have refueled there and completed their journey.

If the Nazis during World War II and the Soviets today could recognize the Caribbean and Central America as vital to our interests, shouldn't we, also? (Applause) For several years now, under two administrations, the United States has been increasing its defense of freedom in the Caribbean Basin. And I can tell you tonight, democracy is beginning to take root in El Salvador which, until a short time ago, knew only dictatorship. The new government is now delivering on its promises of democracy, reforms, and free elections. It was not easy. And there was resistance to many of the attempted reforms, with assassinations of some of the reformers.

Guerrilla bands and urban terrorists were portrayed in a worldwide propaganda campaign as freedom fighters, representative of the people. Ten days before I came into office, the guerrillas launched what they called "a final offensive" to overthrow the government. And their radio boasted that our new administration would be too late to prevent their victory.

Well, they learned that democracy cannot be so easily defeated. President Carter did not hesitate. He authorized arms and munitions to El Salvador. The guerrilla offensive failed but not America's will. Every President since this country assumed global responsibilities has known that those responsibilities could only be met if we pursued a bipartisan foreign policy.

As I said a moment ago, the government of El Salvador has been keeping its promises—like the land reform program which is making thousands of farm tenants, farm owners. In a little over 3 years, 20 percent of the arable land in El Salvador has been redistributed to more than 450,000 people. That is one in ten Salvadorans who have benefited directly from this program.

El Salvador has continued to strive toward an orderly and democratic society. The government promised free elections. On March 28th, a little more than a year ago, after months of campaigning by a variety of candidates, the suffering people of El Salvador were offered a chance to vote—to choose the kind of government they wanted. Suddenly the so-called freedom fighters in the hills were exposed for what they really are—a small minority who want power for themselves and their backers—not democracy for the people. The guerrillas threatened death to anyone who voted. They destroyed hundreds of buses and trucks to keep the people from getting to the polling places. Their slogan was brutal: "Vote today, die tonight." But on election day, an unprecedented 80 percent of the electorate braved ambush and gunfire, and trudged for miles, many of them, to vote for freedom. And that's truly fighting for freedom. We can never turn our backs on that. (Applause)

Members of this Congress who went there as observers told me of a woman who was wounded by rifle fire on the way to the polls, who refused to leave the line to have her wound treated until after she had voted. Another woman had been told by the guerrillas that she would be killed when she returned from the polls, and she told the guerrillas, "You can kill me, you can kill my family, you can kill my neighbors. You can't kill us all." The real freedom fighters of El Salvador turned out to be the people of that country—the young, the old, the in-between—more than a million of them out of a population of less than 5 million. The world should respect this courage, and not allow it to be belittled or forgotten. And again, I say in good conscience, we can never turn our backs on that. (Applause)

The democratic political parties and factions in El Salvador are coming together around the common goal of seeking a political solution to their country's problems. New national elections will be held this year and they will be open to all political parties. The government has invited the guerrillas to participate in the elections and is preparing an amnesty law. The people of El Salvador are earning their freedom and they deserve our moral and material support to protect it. (Applause)

Yes, there are still major problems regarding human rights, the criminal justice system, and violence against noncombatants. And, like the rest of Central America, El Salvador also faces severe economic problems. But, in addition to recession-depressed prices for major agricultural exports, El Salvador's economy is being deliberately sabotaged.

Tonight in El Salvador—because of ruthless guerrilla attacks—much of the fertile land cannot be cultivated; less than half the rolling stock of the railways remains operational; bridges, water facilities, telephone and electric systems have been destroyed and damaged. In one 22-month period, there were 5,000 interruptions of electrical power. One region was without electricity for a third of the year. I think Secretary of State Shultz put it very well the other day: "Unable to win the free loyalty of El Salvador's people, the guerrillas," he said, "are deliberately and systematically depriving them of food, water, transportation, light sanitation, and jobs. And these are the people who claim they want to help the common people." [80] They don't want elections because they know they would be defeated. But, as the previous election showed, the Salvadoran people's desire for democracy will not be defeated.

[80] For text of the address by Secretary of State Shultz before the World Affairs Council and the Chamber of Commerce in Dallas, Texas, April 15, 1983, see Department of State Bulletin, May 1983, pp. 10–13.

The guerrillas are not embattled peasants armed with muskets. They're professionals, sometimes with better training and weaponry than the government's soldiers. The Salvadoran battalions that have received U.S. training have been conducting themselves well on the battlefield and with the civilian population. But, so far, we've only provided enough money to train one Salvadoran soldier out of ten, fewer than the number of guerrillas that are trained by Nicaragua and Cuba.

And let me set the record straight on Nicaragua, a country next to El Salvador. In 1979, when the new government took over in Nicaragua, after a revolution which overthrew the authoritarian rule of Somoza, everyone hoped for the growth of democracy. We in the United States did, too. By January of 1981, our emergency relief and recovery aid to Nicaragua totaled $118 million—more than provided by any other developed country. In fact, in the first 2 years of Sandinista rule, the United States directly or indirectly sent five times more aid to Nicaragua than it had in the 2 years prior to the revolution. Can anyone doubt the generosity and the good faith of the American people?

These were hardly the actions of a nation implacably hostile to Nicaragua. Yet, the Government of Nicaragua has treated us as an enemy. It has rejected our repeated peace efforts. It has broken its promises to us, to the Organization of American States, and, most important of all, to the people of Nicaragua.

No sooner was victory achieved than a small clique ousted others who had been part of the revolution from having any voice in the government. Humberto Ortega, the Minister of Defense, declared Marxism-Leninism would be their guide, and so it is.

The Government of Nicaragua has imposed a new dictatorship. It has refused to hold the elections it promised. It has seized control of most media and subjects all media to heavy prior censorship. It denied the bishops and priests of the Roman Catholic Church the right to say Mass on radio during Holy Week. It insulted and mocked the Pope. It has driven the Miskito Indians from their homelands—burning their villages, destroying their crops, and forcing them into involuntary internment camps far from home. It has moved against the private sector and free labor unions. It condoned mob action against Nicaragua's independent human rights commission and drove the director of that commission into exile.

In short, after all these acts of repression by the government, is it any wonder that opposition has formed? Contrary to propaganda, the opponents of the Sandinistas are not die-hard supporters of the previous Somoza regime. In fact, many are anti-Somoza heroes and fought beside the Sandinistas to bring down the Somoza government. Now, they've been denied any part in the new government because they truly wanted democracy for Nicaragua and they still do. Others are Miskito Indians fighting for their homes, their lands, and their lives.

The Sandinista revolution in Nicaragua turned out to be just an exchange of one set of autocratic rulers for another, and the people still have no freedom, no democratic rights, and more poverty. Even worse than its predecessor, it is helping Cuba and the Soviets to destabilize our hemisphere.

Meanwhile, the Government of El Salvador, making every effort to guarantee democracy, free labor unions, freedom of religion, and a free press, is under attack by guerrillas dedicated to the same philosophy that prevails in Nicaragua, Cuba, and, yes, the Soviet Union. Violence has been Nicaragua's most important export to the world. It is the ultimate in hypocrisy for the unelected Nicaraguan Government to charge that we seek their overthrow when they're doing everything they can to bring down the elected Government of El Salvador. (Applause) Thank you. The guerrilla attacks are directed from a headquarters in Managua, the capital of Nicaragua.

But let us be clear as to the American attitude toward the Government of Nicaragua. We do not seek its overthrow. Our interest is to ensure that it does not infect its neighbors through the export of subversion or violence. Our purpose, in conformity with American and international law, is to prevent the flow of arms to El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala, and Costa Rica. We have attempted to have a dialogue with the Government of Nicaragua, but it persists in its efforts to spread violence.

We should not—and we will not—protect the Nicaraguan Government from the anger of its own people. But we should, through diplomacy, offer an alternative.

And, as Nicaragua ponders its options, we can and will—with all the resources of diplomacy—protect each country of Central America from the danger of war. (Applause)

Even Costa Rica, Central America's oldest and strongest democracy—a government so peaceful it does not even have an army, is the object of bullying and threats from Nicaragua's dictators.

Nicaragua's neighbors know that Sandinista promises of peace, nonalliance and nonintervention have not been kept. Some 36 new military bases have been built. There were only 13 during the Somoza years.

Nicaragua's new army numbers 25,000 men, supported by a militia of 50,000. It is the largest army in Central America, supplemented by 2,000 Cuban military and security advisors. It is equipped with the most modern weapons—dozens of Soviet-made tanks, 800 Soviet-bloc trucks, Soviet 152-milimeter howitzers, 100 antiaircraft guns, plus planes and helicopters. There are additional thousands of civilian advisors from Cuba, the Soviet Union, East Germany, Libya, and the PLO. And we are attacked because we have 55 military trainers in El Salvador.

The goal of the professional guerrilla movements in Central America is as simple as it is sinister—to destabilize the entire region, from the Panama Canal to Mexico. And if you doubt beyond this point, just consider what Cayetano Carpio, the now-deceased Salvadoran guerrilla leader, said earlier this month. Carpio said that after El Salvador falls, El Salvador and Nicaragua would be "arm-in-arm and struggling for the total liberation of Central America."

Nicaragua's dictatorial junta, who themselves made war and won power operating from bases in Honduras and Costa Rica, like to pretend that they are today being attacked by forces based in Honduras. The fact is, it is Nicaragua's government that threatens Honduras, not the reverse. It is Nicaragua who has moved heavy tanks close to the border, and Nicaragua who speaks of war. It was Nicaraguan radio that announced on April 8th the creation of a new, unified, revolutionary coordinating board to push forward the Marxist struggle in Honduras.

Nicaragua, supported by weapons and military resources provided by the Communist bloc, represses its own people, refuses to make peace, and sponsors a guerrilla war against El Salvador.

President Truman's words are as apt today as they were in 1947 when he, too, spoke before a Joint Session of the Congress:

"At the present moment in world history, nearly every nation must choose between alternative ways of life. The choice is not too often a free one.

"One way of life is based upon the will of the majority, and is distinguished by free institutions, representative government, free elections, guarantees of individual liberty, freedom of speech and religion, and freedom from political oppression.

"The second way of life is based upon the will of a minority forcibly imposed upon the majority. It relies upon terror and oppression, a controlled press and radio, fixed elections, and the suppression of personal freedoms.

"I believe that it must be the policy of the United States to support free people who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressures.

"I believe that we must assist free peoples to work out their own destinies in their own way.

"I believe that our help should be primarily through economic and financial aid which is essential to economic stability and orderly political processes.

"Collapse of free institutions and loss of independence would be disastrous not only for them but for the world. Discouragement and possibly failure would quickly be the lot of neighboring peoples striving to maintain their freedom and independence."

The countries of Central America are smaller than the nations that prompted President Truman's message. But the political and strategic stakes are the same. Will our response—economic, social, and military—be as appropriate and successful as Mr. Truman's bold solutions to the problems of postwar Europe?

Some people have forgotten the successes of those years and the decades of peace, prosperity, and freedom they secured. Some people talk as though the United States were incapable of acting effectively in international affairs without risking war or damaging those we seek to help.

Are democracies required to remain passive while threats to their security and prosperity accumulate? Must we just accept the destabilization of an entire region from the Panama Canal to Mexico on our southern border? Must we sit by, while independent nations of this hemisphere are integrated into the most aggressive empire the modern world has seen? Must we wait while Central Americans are driven from their homes like the more than a million who have sought refuge out of Afghanistan, or the 1½ million who have fled Indochina, or the more than a million Cubans who have fled Castro's Caribbean utopia? Must we, by default, leave the people of El Salvador no choice but to flee their homes, creating another tragic human exodus?

I don't believe there's a majority in the Congress or the country that counsels passivity, resignation, defeatism, in the face of this challenge to freedom and security in our own hemisphere. (Applause)

I do not believe that a majority of the Congress or the country is prepared to stand by passively while the people of Central America are delivered to totalitarianism and we ourselves are left vulnerable to new dangers.

Only last week, an official of the Soviet Union reiterated Brezhnev's threat to station nuclear missiles in this hemisphere five minutes from the United States. Like an echo, Nicaragua's Commandant Daniel Ortega, confirmed that, if asked, his country would consider accepting those missiles. I understand that today they may be having second thoughts. [61]

Now, before I go any further, let me say to those who invoke the memory of Vietnam, there is no thought of sending American combat troops to Central America. They are not needed—(applause). Thank you. And, as I say, they are not needed. And, indeed, they have not been requested there. All our neighbors ask of us is assistance in training and arms to protect themselves while they build a better, freer life.

We must continue to encourage peace among the nations of Central America. We must support the regional efforts now underway to promote solutions to regional problems.

We cannot be certain that the Marxist-Leninist bands who believe war is an instrument of politics will be readily discouraged. It's crucial that we not become discouraged before they do. Otherwise, the region's freedom will be lost and our security damaged in ways that can hardly be calculated.

If Central America were to fall, what would the consequences be for our position in Asia, Europe and for alliances such as NATO? If the United States cannot respond to a threat near our own borders, why should Europeans or Asians believe that we're seriously concerned about threats to them? If the Soviets can assume that nothing short of an actual attack on the United States will provoke an American response, which ally, which friend will trust us then?

The Congress shares both the power and the responsibility for our foreign policy. Tonight, I ask you, the Congress, to join me in a bold, generous approach to the problems of peace and poverty, democracy and dictatorship in the region. Join me in a program that prevents Communist victory in the short run, but goes beyond to produce for the deprived people of the area the reality of present progress and the promise of more to come.

Let us lay the foundation for a bipartisan approach to sustain the independence and freedom of the countries of Central America. We in the administration reach out to you in this spirit.

We will pursue four basic goals in Central America. First, in response to decades of inequity and indifference, we will support democracy, reform and human freedom. This means using our assistance, our powers of persuasion and our legitimate leverage to bolster humane democratic systems where they already exist and to help countries on their way to that goal complete the process as quickly as human institutions can be changed. Elections in El Salvador and also in Nicaragua must be open to all, fair and safe. The international community must help. We will work at human rights problems, not walk away from them.

[61] See the interview with Ortega, New York Times, April 27, 1983, p. A15.

Second, in response to the challenge of world recession and, in the case of El Salvador, to the unrelenting campaign of economic sabotage by the guerrillas, we will support economic development. And by a margin of 2-to-1, our aid is economic now, not military. Seventy-seven cents out of every dollar we will spend in the area this year goes for food, fertilizers, and other essentials for economic growth and development. And our economic program goes beyond traditional aid: The Caribbean Initiative introduced in the House earlier today will provide powerful trade and investment incentives to help these countries achieve self-sustaining economic growth without exporting U.S. jobs.[62] Our goal must be to focus our immense and growing technology to enhance health care, agriculture, industry, and to ensure that we who inhabit this interdependent region come to know and understand each other better retaining our diverse identities, respecting our diverse traditions and institutions.

And, third, in response to the military challenge from Cuba and Nicaragua—to their deliberate use of force to spread tyranny—we will support the security of the region's threatened nations. We do not view security assistance as an end in itself, but as a shield for democratization, economic development, and diplomacy. No amount of reform will bring peace so long as guerrillas believe they will win by force. No amount of economic help will suffice if guerrilla units can destroy roads and bridges and power stations and crops again and again with impunity. But with better training and material help, our neighbors can hold off the guerrillas and give democratic reform time to take root.

And, fourth, we will support dialogue and negotiations—both among the countries of the region and within each country. The terms and conditions of participation in elections are negotiable. Costa Rica is a shining example of democracy. Honduras has made the move from military rule to democratic government. Guatemala is pledged to the same course. The United States will work toward a political solution in Central America which will serve the interests of the democratic process. (Applause)

To support these diplomatic goals, I offer these assurances: The United States will support any agreement among Central American countries for the withdrawal—under fully verifiable and reciprocal conditions—of all foreign military and security advisers and troops.

We want to help opposition groups join the political process in all countries and compete by ballots instead of bullets.

We will support any verifiable, reciprocal agreement among Central American countries on the renunciation of support for insurgencies on neighbors' territory.

And, finally, we desire to help Central America end its costly arms race, and will support any verifiable, reciprocal agreements on the nonimportation of offensive weapons.

To move us toward these goals more rapidly, I am tonight announcing my intention to name an Ambassador-at-Large as my special envoy to Central America. He or she will report to me through the Secretary of State. The Ambassador's responsibilities will be to lend U.S. support to the efforts of regional governments to bring peace to this troubled area and to work closely with the Congress to assure the fullest possible, bipartisan coordination of our policies toward the region.

What I'm asking for is prompt congressional approval for the full reprograming of funds for key current economic and security programs so that the people of Central America can hold the line against externally-supported aggression. In addition, I am asking for prompt action on the supplemental request in these same areas to carry us through the current fiscal year, and for early and favorable congressional action on my requests for fiscal year 1984.

And, finally, I am asking that the bipartisan consensus, which last year acted on the trade and tax provisions of the Caribbean Basin Initiative in the House, again take the lead to move this vital proposal to the floor of both chambers. And, as I said before, the greatest share of these requests is targeted toward economic and humanitarian aid, not military.

[62] For text of H.R. 2769, see Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act: Hearing Before the Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session (Washington, 1983), pp. 3-33; see also Caribbean Basin Initiative—1983: Hearing Before the Committee on Finance, United States Senate, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session (Washington, 1983).

What the administration is asking for on behalf of freedom in Central America is so small, so minimal, considering what is at stake. The total amount requested for aid to all of Central America in 1984 is about $600 million. That's less than one-tenth of what Americans will spend this year on coin-operated video games.

In summation, I say to you that tonight there can be no question. The national security of all the Americas is at stake in Central America. If we cannot defend ourselves there, we cannot expect to prevail elsewhere. Our credibility would collapse, our alliances would crumble, and the safety of our homeland would be put in jeopardy.

We have a vital interest, a moral duty, and a solemn responsibility.

This is not a partisan issue. It is a question of our meeting our moral responsibility to ourselves, our friends, and our posterity. It is a duty that falls on all of us—the President, the Congress, and the people. We must perform it together. Who among us would wish to bear responsibility for failing to meet our shared obligation?

Thank you and God bless you. (Applause)

Transcript of an Interview With President Reagan, May 5, 1983 (Extracts) [63]

Freedom Fighters and Guerrillas

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. President, moving on to another topic, before this session began, you asked why you should not be scolding Members of the House committee that voted yesterday to stop funding for overt operations against Nicaragua. Do you really see any consequences of that action? Does that vote stop you from doing anything, or hinder anything your administration is doing?

THE PRESIDENT. It is in a committee. And there is the Senate yet to go on this. And I would hope that, maybe, we could do better there.

It, also, had an element in it that looked at partisanship, since the vote was on straight party lines. And I do not believe that that reflects the thinking of a great many Democrats, because many of them spoke up right after my speech.

Q. Does this vote indicate that you failed in your objectives in that speech?

THE PRESIDENT. No, as I say, because I know that there are still a great many Democrats who have been quite outspoken, including some of the leadership in the House of their party, in support of what I had proposed—of making this a bipartisan approach, and even being critical of some of their members who did seem to sound partisan.

The thing that needs telling about this whole situation in Nicaragua—I thought I had covered this subject but, maybe, I did not cover it enough the other night. And that is that, right now, these forces that have risen up in opposition to the Sandinista government are—under what you might say is a sort of a group—a controlling body that formed in the northern part of Nicaragua. There are about seven leading members to this kind of committee. Most of them were former anti-Somoza people. They are people who simply want this government of Nicaragua to keep its promises.

If you remember, the Organization of American States asked Somoza to resign at that time. And Somoza, his reply to them was that if it would benefit his country, Nicaragua, he would. And he did resign. [64]

[64] Resolution II of the Seventeenth Meeting of Consultation of Ministers of Foreign Affairs, June 23, 1979, called for:

Continued

The Organization of American States also gave four points to the Sandinistas that they, the Organization of American States, would support them if their goal was these four things: Of promoting democracy, of immediate elections of a concern for human rights and the Sandinistas acceded to that and said yes, those were their goals and they would keep those four provisions or promises. And they haven't. They never made an effort to keep them. They violated all of them.

Now, this is what makes me say that there's a great hypocrisy there of the Sandinista government protesting what is happening in its own country and from people who were once a part of its own revolution at the same time that they are supporting people in another country who are seeking to overthrow a duly elected government of the people.

Q. Mr. President, you—in referring to these groups, you seem to suggest that these groups are seeking a change in Nicaragua itself. And how does that statement square with your saying that we're not violating the law in aiding groups who seek the overthrow of the Nicaraguan Government?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, do they? Or are they asking that government—or that revolution of which they themselves were a part—asking it to go back to its revolutionary promises and keep faith with the revolution that the people of Nicaragua supported.

Many of these people are businessmen whose businesses have been taken over. They are farmers whose land was seized by this government, farmers whose crops were—they were forced to sell them to the government at less than the cost of production. And they're protesting this violation of what had made them support the revolution to begin with.

But the whole purpose of the Sandinista government seems to be not only with El Salvador but the export of revolution to their other neighbors, to countries that are already democracies. Honduras has taken that step; Costa Rica, the oldest democracy of all. And all of them are plagued by radicals in their midst who are encouraged by the Sandinista government.

Q. Mr. President, I'd like to go back to what the committee actually did yesterday in voting the cutoff. CIA Director Casey is reported to have said it would lead to a bloodbath for the guerrillas inside the country. Do you agree with that? And how seriously do you take what the committee does? How bad would it be if that cutoff of covert aid went through?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I'm saying if—well, if that became the policy, I think it would set a very dangerous precedent. The executive branch of government and the Congress has a shared responsibility, as I pointed out in my speech, for foreign policy. And we have—we each have a place in formulating foreign policy, but we each have a responsibility also. And I think that what I said about this was that it was very irresponsible. And it was—it literally was taking away the ability of the executive branch to carry out its constitutional responsibilities.

Q. Do you believe that it would lead to the bloodbath that the CIA Director talked about?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I haven't heard his entire remark in connection with that term or how he described it or what he meant with it. I'll make it a point to find out. I once used a bloodbath term as Governor of California, and one individual reversed it in the press and had it saying the opposite of what I had intended it to say and I never did quite get the situation cleared up.

Q. Well, what—I don't understand. What's wrong with the committee's position? What difference does it make if instead of giving covert aid to the guerrillas in Nicaragua, you give overt aid to the countries of El Salvador and Honduras to stop the flow of weapons through their countries, which is what you say you want in the first place? What's wrong with that?

"1. Immediate and definitive replacement of the Somoza regime.

"2. Installation in Nicaraguan territory of a democratic government, the composition of which should include the principal representative groups which oppose the Somoza regime and which reflects the free will of the people of Nicaragua.

THE PRESIDENT. Except then the only help that you can give is through other governments. And I don't think that—I don't think that's an effective thing to do, and how do you know that the other governments would want to themselves, then, participate in helping the people that need the help? In other words, we'd be asking some other government to do what our own—what our congressional—or our Congress has said that we can't do.

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. President, can I follow up on something you said earlier? Did I understand you to say that if you were forced to stop aid to the Nicaraguan guerrillas, that you would try to funnel through other countries?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I was saying that's what the Committee said, that the Committee said we would have to go overt, and, then, in going overt, you can only give money to another government. And, if you did that, then you would have to be depending on—well, maybe those other governments in Central America would give that money to the freedom fighters in Nicaragua.

Now, if they want to tell us that we can give money and do the same things we've been doing—money, giving, providing subsistence, and so forth to these people directly and making it overt instead of covert—that's all right with me. I just don't want the restrictions put on it that they might put on.

Q. You'd be willing to accept the idea of overt aid to the anti-Sandinista guerrillas in Nicaragua?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, but not if they do it as one individual or more than one, as suggested on the Hill—that they would do it and, then, we would have to enforce restrictions on the freedom fighters as to what tactics they could use.

And I have said that if we were to do that, then I would expect that the only fair thing would be that the Nicaraguan Government would itself impose the same restrictions on the freedom in El Salvador, only I don't call them freedom fighters because they've got freedom and they're fighting for something else. They're fighting for a restraint on freedom.

Q. Can I just—all of a sudden now we're aiding freedom fighters. I thought we were just interdicting supplies into—

THE PRESIDENT. I just used the word, I guess, "freedom fighters" because the fact that we know that the thing that brought those people together is the desire, as I said, for the same revolutionary principles that they once fought and have been betrayed in. As I say, they have made it plain. They want what they once fought beside the Sandinistas to get. And they have been betrayed. And I thought that the use of freedom fighters was because—I found out that it seems as if there is a kind of a bias in the treatment of guerrilla fighters. It depends on what kind of a government they are opposing. And some are treated more kindly than others.

Now, I think the ones in El Salvador who are fighting against an elected government, they are guerrillas. But in reality, when we talk about Nicaragua and everyone says, "the Government in Nicaragua," well, it was a government out of the barrel of a gun. And, true, we favored it before I got here. We did not lift a hand for the existing Government of Nicaragua, because we did not believe that it was treating its people fairly.

And here was a revolution that took place that seemed to express all the things that we all believe in. Well now, they have not carried out those things. And they are there by force. And what really—other than being in control of the capital, you might say, and having a handle on all the levers—what makes them anymore a legitimate government than the people of Nicaragua who are asking for a chance to vote for the kind of government they want?

THE PRESS. Thank you, Mr. President.

Announcement by the White House, May 10, 1983 [65]

Changes in the U.S. Sugar Import Quota

The President today announced changes in the administration of the quota on U.S. imports of sugar for four Central American countries. The quota for Nicaragua will be reduced to 6,000 short tons (ST), and this reduction will be re-allocated to three neighboring countries: Honduras, Costa Rica and El Salvador. This action will become effective in fiscal year 1984 (which begins October 1, 1983).

The President is taking this action because of the extraordinary situation in Central America and its implications for the United States, and the region as a whole, including Honduras, Costa Rica and El Salvador. These three countries are experiencing enormous problems, caused in considerable part by Nicaraguan-supported subversion and extremist violence. The additional quota for these three countries represents a total of roughly $14 million in foreign exchange per year. This occurs because the U.S. internal price (21–22 cents/lb. in recent weeks is far higher than in most other markets of the world (6–7 cents/lb.). The transfer of the Nicaraguan quota will significantly benefit the recipient countries.

By denying to Nicaragua a foreign exchange benefit resulting from the high U.S. sugar price, we hope to reduce the resources available to that country for financing its military buildup, and its support for subversion and extremist violence in the region.

This is a signal of the U.S. seriousness with regard to the economic and political stability of its neighbors in the hemisphere which is integrally related to the security of the region and the United States. The United States will continue to respond to developments in that region.

The sugar quota decision does not affect our continued willingness to talk with the Nicaraguans about regional issues. We are ready to maintain as positive a relationship with Nicaragua as warranted by Nicaraguan actions.

Nicaragua's present quota is 58,800 ST, while that for Honduras is 28,000 ST; for Costa Rica 42,000 ST; and for El Salvador 72,800 ST.

The transfer from the Nicaraguan quota will be allocated to the countries as follows: Honduras 52 percent, Costa Rica 30 percent and El Salvador 18 percent. This allocation is based on a comparison of actual recent shipments (1979–81) to the United States from these countries and their present quotas (which are derived from shipment shares from 1975 to 1981). Consequently, the country which has had the fastest growth of its sugar industry and exports since 1975, Honduras, will receive the largest share of the transferred quota.

This is not a fundamental change in the overall sugar program. The quotas of all countries other than the four specified above are unchanged and continue to be based on the formula announced in May 1982 when the quota program was initiated. [66]

Resolution 530 (1983) Adopted by the U.N. Security Council, May 19, 1983 [67]

Commendation of the Peace Efforts of the Contadora Group

The Security Council,

Having heard the statement of the Foreign Minister of the Republic of Nicaragua,

[67] Source: U.N. document S/RES/530 (1983). The resolution was adopted unanimously. The Security Council held seven meetings, May 9, 13, 16, 17, 18, and 19, 1983, in response to a complaint by Nicaragua. (U.N. document S/15746 (1983))

Having also heard the statements of various States Members of the United Nations in the course of the debate,

Deeply concerned, on the one hand, at the situation prevailing on and inside the northern border of Nicaragua and, on the other hand, at the consequent danger of a military confrontation between Honduras and Nicaragua, which could further aggravate the existing crisis situation in Central America,

Recalling all the relevant principles of the Charter of the United Nations, particularly the obligation of States to settle their disputes exclusively by peaceful means, not to resort to the threat or use of force and to respect the self-determination of peoples and the sovereign independence of all States,

Noting the widespread desire expressed by the States concerned to achieve solutions to the differences between them,

Commending the appeal of the Contadora group of countries, Colombia, Mexico, Panama and Venezuela, in its 12 May 1983 communiqué (S/15762) that the deliberations of the Council should strengthen the principles of self-determination and non-interference in the affairs of other States, the obligation not to allow the territory of a State to be used for committing acts of aggression against other States, the peaceful settlement of disputes and the prohibition of the threat or use of force to resolve conflict,

Considering the broad support expressed for the efforts of the Contadora Group to achieve solutions to the problems that affect Central American countries and to secure a stable and lasting peace in the region,

1. Reaffirms the right of Nicaragua and of all the other countries of the area to live in peace and security, free from outside interference;

2. Commends the efforts of the Contadora Group and urges the pursuit of those efforts;

3. Appeals urgently to the interested States to co-operate fully with the Contadora Group, through a frank and constructive dialogue, so as to resolve their differences;

4. Urges the Contadora Group to spare no effort to find solutions to the problem of the region and to keep the Security Council informed of the results of these efforts;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Security Council informed of the development of the situation and of the implementation of the present resolution.

Address by President Reagan Before a Cuban Independence Day Celebration, Miami, May 20, 1983 [68]

"Viva Cuba Libre" "Cuba, Si; Castro, No"

Thank you. Thank you all very much. Senator Hawkins—(interruption from the audience)—I don't know what—Members of the Congress, Jorge Mas, Carlos Salman, ladies and gentlemen, it's a great pleasure for me to be with a group of Americans who have demonstrated how much can be accomplished when people are free. Many of you arrived in this country with little more than the shirts on your backs and a desire to improve your well-being and that of your family. You came with a willingness to work, and, yes, a consuming passion for liberty. There's a name for this kind of spirit, it's called the American spirit, and there's no limit to what it can do.

But let me interrupt myself here and say something about that American spirit. We could also say it's a Western Hemisphere spirit because one of the great unique things about this Western Hemisphere is that in all of our countries, yours, from the islands of the Caribbean to South, to Central America and to North America, from the South Pole to the North Pole, with all of our countries, we can cross the boundary line into another country and we're still surrounded by Americans because we are all Americans here in the Western Hemisphere. (Applause)

Examples of this spirit abound. Jorge Mas, Chairman of the Cuban American National Foundation came here 20 years ago, worked as a milkman to support himself. Today he owns a construction company that provides hundreds of people with meaningful employment. And when he isn't running his country—or company, he's immersed in activities like this one, trying to protect the freedom that has been so important in his life. Jorge Mas, thank you for all that you've done and all you're doing. (Applause)

But Jorge's success story is no isolated example. There are so many. You know them. People like Armando Codina, who came here alone as a child, his parents unable to leave Cuba, so he was sent to an orphanage and then to a foster home. It took courage for this little boy to begin his new life. But now, at 35, he has a string of business accomplishments of which any individual many years his senior would be proud. (Applause)

The world renowned ballet dancer, Fernando Bujones, is a Cuban American. (Applause)

In my administration, we have Jose Manuel Casanova. (Applause) He is the United States Executive Director of the Inter-American Development Bank.

And I have an announcement to make today that concerns another outstanding Cuban American, Dr. Jose Sorzano. (Applause) He is currently our representative on the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. He is a distinguished scholar specializing in political philosophy, history, and Latin America. And I want you to know—to be the first to know that I intend to nominate Dr. Sorzano to be one of our nation's highest diplomats to the post of Deputy U.S. Representative to the United Nations. (Applause)

One of the TV cameramen today is Eduardo Suarez. He came to America just a few short years ago, and recently won a Florida Emmy for his excellence as a television news photographer. Eduardo, congratulations. (Applause)

The list goes on and on. People from every walk of life, or every race and family background have made their mark in just about every corner of American society. A few months ago, I was honored to welcome to the White House a famous runner, Alberto Salazar. (Applause) I didn't know what to say. He gave me a pair of running shoes—(laughter)—but I am not sure what kind of a race he wanted me to run in. (Laughter) (Applause)

Clearly, this country in America, the United States, has been good for you. But you have, also, been good for all of America and for the United States, and for Miami. (Applause) And I add, and for Miami. Twenty-five years ago, there were those who thought Miami had reached its peak and was on the way down. The economy seemed stagnant. There was little hope in sight. Today, Miami is a vibrant international center, a gateway to Latin America. (Applause)

The stark contrast between your life and that of the neighbors and loved ones that you left behind in Cuba stands as evidence to the relationship between freedom and prosperity.

About 10 million people still live in Cuba, as compared to about 1 million Cuban Americans, people with the same traditions and cultural heritage; yet the Cubans in the United States with only one-tenth the number produce almost two times the wealth of those they left behind. So don't let anyone fool you, what's happening in Cuba is not a failure of the Cuban people, it's a failure of Fidel Castro and of communism. (Applause)

The Soviet Union with all its military might, with its massive subsidy of the Cuban economy, can't make the system produce anything but repression and terror.

It reminds me of the story—I happen to collect stories that the Soviet people are telling each other, the Russian people. It indicates their cynicism with their own system. This is a story of a commissar who visited one of their collective farms and he stopped the first farmer, workman that he met and asked about life on the farm and the man said, "It's wonderful. I've never heard anyone complain about anything since I've been here." And the commissar then said, "Well, what about the crops?" "Oh," he said, "the crops are wonderful." "What about the potatoes?" "Oh, sir," he said, "the potatoes," he said, "there are so many that if we put them in one pile they would touch the foot of God." And the commissar said, "Just a minute, in the Soviet Union there is no God." And the farmer said, "Well, there are no potatoes either." (Laughter) (Applause)

Cuban Americans understand perhaps better than many of their fellow citizens that freedom is not just the heritage of the people of the United States. It is the birthright of the people of this hemisphere. We in the Americas are descended from hearty souls, pioneers, men and women with the courage to leave the familiar and start fresh in this, the "New World." We are, by and large, people who share the same fundamental values of God, family, work, freedom, democracy, and justice.

Perhaps the greatest tie between us can be seen in the incredible number of cathedrals and churches found throughout the hemisphere. Our forefathers took the worship of God seriously.

Our struggles for independence and the fervor for liberty unleashed by these noble endeavors bind the people of the "New World" together. In the annals of human freedom, names like Bolivar and Marti rank equally with Jefferson and Washington. (Applause) These were individuals of courage and dignity. And they left for us a legacy, a treasure beyond all imagination.

But today a new colonialism threatens the Americas. Insurgents, armed and directed by a faraway power, seek to impose a philosophy that is alien to everything in which we believe and goes against our birthright. It's a philosophy that holds truth and liberty in contempt and is a self-declared enemy of the worship of God. Wherever put into practice, it has brought repression and human deprivation. There is no clearer example of this than Cuba.

The people of Cuba have seen their strong independent labor movement, which existed before 1959, destroyed by a regime that shouts slogans about its concern for the workers; the suppression of the church—including the right of the church to broadcast and print God's word. It is a new fascist regime, where freedom of speech and press of every opposition group has been stamped into the ground with ideological zeal. And it doesn't stop there. Young Cubans are pressed into the military and sent to faraway lands, where hundreds have been killed, to do the bidding of a foreign government, defiling their hands with the blood of others, not serving their own interests, but propping up leaders who have no popular support.

But the people of Central America, with our support, have chosen a different course—freedom, pluralism, and free economic development. They—and we—are committed to this course and will not tolerate Mr. Castro's efforts to prevent it. (Applause) They, and we, want Central America for Central Americans and that's the way it's going to be. (Applause)

The declining Castro economy continues to make a grotesque joke out of the ideological claims that Marxism is for the people. Nearly a quarter of a century after the Cuban revolution, the Cuban people continue to face shortages and rationing of basic necessities. Once one of the most prosperous countries in all of Latin America, it is rapidly becoming the most economically backward in the region, thanks to the Communist system.

You know, they say there are only two places where communism works: in heaven where they don't need it (laughter)—and in hell where they've already got it. (Laughter) (Applause)

And now, there is strong evidence that Castro officials are involved in the drug trade, peddling drugs like criminals, profiting on the misery of the addicted.[89] I would like to take this opportunity to call on the Castro regime for an accounting. Is this drug peddling simply the act of renegade officials? Or is it officially sanctioned by the present Government of Cuba? The world deserves an answer.

On this day, we celebrate Cuban independence, something special for the people of the United States as well as Cuba. Eighty-five years ago, we joined together and fought side-by-side, shedding our blood to free Cuba from the yoke of colonialism. Sadly, we must acknowledge that Cuba is no longer independent. Let me assure you. We will not let this same fate befall others in the hemisphere. We will not permit the Soviets and their henchmen in Havana to deprive others of their freedom. (Applause) We will not allow them to do that to others. And some day Cuba, itself, will be free. (Applause)

[89] See The Cuban Government's Involvement in Facilitating International Drug Traffic: Joint Hearing Before the Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism of the Committee on the Judiciary and the Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs of the Foreign Relations Committee and the Senate Drug Enforcement Caucus, United States Senate, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session (Washington, 1983).

The United States stands at a crossroads. We can no longer ignore this hemisphere and simply hope for the best. Jose Marti, the hero of Cuban independence, a man who spent so many years of his life with us in the United States, said it well: "It is not enough to come to the defense of freedom with epic and intermittent efforts when it is threatened at moments that appear critical. Every moment is critical for the preservation of freedom." (Applause)

Now is the time to act reasonably and decisively to avert a crisis and prevent other people from suffering the same fate as your brothers and sisters in Cuba. Ironically, our biggest obstacle is not foreign threats, but a lack of confidence and understanding. There are far too many trying to find excuses to do nothing. If we are immobilized by fear or apathy by those who suggest that, because our friends are imperfect, we shouldn't help them, if those trying to throw roadblocks in our path succeed and interpose themselves at a time when a crisis could still be averted, the American people will know who is responsible and judge them accordingly. (Applause)

But as I told the Congress a few weeks ago, we've still got time and there is much that can be done. The Congress can, for example, enact those trade and tax provisions of the Caribbean Basin Initiative that will put the power of free enterprise to work in the Caribbean. The Congress rightly believes that we must not totally focus our efforts on building the military capabilities of our friends. I agree. That's why 75 percent of what we've asked for is economic, not military aid.

But we must realize that our friends cannot be expected to stand unarmed against insurgents who've been armed to the teeth by the Soviet-Cuban-Nicaraguan Axis. (Applause) Any excuse for not providing our friends the weapons they need to defend themselves is a prescription for disaster. And, again, those who advocate ignoring the legitimate defense needs of those under attack will be held accountable if our national security is put in jeopardy.

Teddy Roosevelt is known to have said, "Speak softly and carry a big stick." (Applause) Well, there are plenty of soft speakers around; but that's where the similarity ends. (Applause)

Let there be no mistake. What happens in Latin America and the Caribbean will not only affect our nation but also will shape America's image throughout the world. If we cannot act decisively so close to home, who will believe us anyway. (Applause) Knowing this, I recently nominated a special envoy, a strong leader, an individual eminently qualified to represent us in this vital region and to work closely with the Congress to insure the fullest possible bipartisan cooperation. He's a man in whom I have the highest confidence and respect, a man you know well, former Senator Richard Stone. [70] (Applause)

When Senator Stone is confirmed, he will be directly involved with those seeking regional solutions to the problems in Central America. We are fully supportive of good faith efforts like the so-called "Contadora Group," seeking to calm tensions and avert conflict. We hope that they will be able to make progress and we welcome the participation of all nations in the Americas who have a vital stake in Central America.

There is, of course, one top priority item on the agenda I've yet to mention. The Cuban people, as is the case in most Communist dictatorships, have been cut off from information. Many of the folks who have come to America in recent years, for example, didn't even know that Cuba had tens of thousands of troops in Africa, much less know about the casualties they've suffered. The greatest threats to dictators like Fidel Castro is the truth. And that's why I'm urging the Congress to approve legislation for the establishment of Radio Marti. [71] (Applause)

And let me state one thing for the record. There have been certain threats made about jamming the frequency of our domestic radio stations should we broadcast to Cuba. Such threats are evidence of the frightened and tyrannical nature of Castro's regime. Well, I can guarantee you today, we will never permit such a government to intimidate us from speaking the truth. (Applause)

(Audience: "Reagan. Reagan. Reagan.")

Cuban Americans play a unique role in the preservation of our freedom. Your Hispanic heritage enables you to better relate our goodwill to our friends in neighboring countries to the south. But, you also have a responsibility here at home. I think one of our most dangerous problems in America is that many of our own people take our blessed liberty for granted. In 1980, a Cuban scholar named Heberto Padilla came to the United States after spending 20 years under Castro. He marveled at what he saw, something that he hadn't even noticed during his visit here 20 years ago.

When visiting the campuses of our major universities he said, "I am struck by something that will be obvious to all Americans: No one, Government official or colleague, has asked me what I was going to say in the seminars and courses that I'm going to give this fall. This is new for me. Simple, but true. It is difficult to ask anyone born into freedom to realize exactly what she or he possesses."

Well, Mr. Padilla went on to explain that freedom is invisible. It is the absence of the government censor, the absence of the secret police, the absence of an agent of repression.

I couldn't help but think when those beautiful young people were here singing our two national anthems, so many—and so many of you only know about the Cuba that some of us know about, the Free Cuba, from hearing us talk about it. And you have a great responsibility to make sure that your sons and daughters growing up know of that other Cuba and share in your hopes and dreams. And we all have a responsibility to see that our young people in America who have come along at a later time know about a Cuba that was free.

Perhaps the best gift that you can give to your fellow citizens, and you've already contributed so much to our well-being, is a better understanding of that which they cannot see, the human freedom that surrounds them. (Applause) Perhaps you can help them understand something that you know instinctively, the awesome responsibility that we have as Americans. For if we fail there will be no place for free men to seek refuge. I'm counting on you to help me explain the threats in Central America, the threats you recognize so clearly.

Each generation of Americans bears this burden and we're grateful to have you with us, sharing this heavy weight upon your shoulders. Teddy Roosevelt, a man who fought alongside your forefathers for Cuban independence said, "We, here in America, hold in our hands the hope of the world, the fate of the coming years; and shame and disgrace will be ours if in our eyes the light of high resolve is dimmed, if we trail in the dust the golden hopes of men."

Today, let us pledge ourselves to meet this sacred responsibility. And let us pledge ourselves to the freedom of the noble, long suffering, Cuban people. Viva Cuba Libre. (Applause) Cuba, si; Castro, no. (Applause)

Thank you. Thank you. Thank you for having me here with you today and vaya con Dios. (Applause)

Declaration by the Presidents of Colombia, Mexico, Panama, and Venezuela, Cancún, July 17, 1983 [72]

Declaration of Cancún on Peace in Central America

In view of the increasing seriousness of the conflicts in Central America, we, the Heads of State of Colombia, Belisario Betancur; of Mexico, Miguel de la Madrid; of Panama, Ricardo De la Espriella; and of Venezuela, Luis Herrera Campins, decided to meet in Cancún, Mexico, on this date, July 17, 1983.

We analyzed the critical situation in Central America and shared a deep concern over the rapid deterioration in that situation in view of the escalation in violence, the progressive increase in tensions, the border incidents and the threat of warfare that could become generalized. Added to all of these are the arms race and foreign interference. The result is a dramatic scenario that affects the political stability of the region and in which institutions that fulfill the democratic goals of freedom, social justice and economic development are unable to advance and become well established.

The conflicts in Central America give the international community the choice of either supporting and strengthening with determination, the avenue of political understanding by contributing constructive solutions, or passively accepting the exacerbation of factors that might lead to more dangerous armed confrontations.

The use of force as an alternative solution aggravates rather than resolves underlying tensions. Peace in Central America can only come to pass if the basic principles of coexistence among nations are observed: nonintervention and self-determination, the sovereign equality of states, cooperation for economic and social development, peaceful settlement of disputes and the free and genuine expression of the will of the people. The creation of conditions conducive to peace in the region depends mainly on the attitude and the genuine willingness to dialogue on the part of the Central American countries, who have the primary responsibility and must make the greatest effort in the search for agreements that ensure coexistence.

To that end, it is essential that the political desire to reach understanding, evident since the work of the Contadora Group began, continue to be made manifest by continued efforts to achieve peace, so that they may yield concrete actions and commitments. [73]

In addition, other states with interests and ties in the region must contribute their political influence to strengthening the channels of understanding and commit themselves, without reservation, to diplomacy as the alternative avenue to peace.

The efforts of the Contadora Group have thus far made it possible to initiate a dialogue with the participation of all governments in Central America, to establish a mechanism for consultation and to draw up, by unanimous agreement, an agenda that covers the most important aspects of the region's problems.

These achievements, though still insufficient, have been stimulated by the support of many countries, various organizations and the most diverse sectors of opinion at the international level. All of them agree that the work of the Contadora Group has helped to mitigate the dangers and the risks of a generalized conflict, and their actions have made it possible to identify the problems and causes of a scenario that today manifests itself in the form of conflict and fear.

This generous support of the international community encourages us to persevere in our endeavor and to make every effort to further a cause whose noble objectives compensate for any possible misunderstanding.

Prompted by our countries' strong sense of solidarity with the sister peoples of Central America, we feel it necessary to speed up the processes that convert the desire for peace into proposals that, when duly implemented, can contribute effectively to the settlement of disputes.

To that end, we have decided on the general guidelines of a program to be proposed to the countries of Central America. In addition to strict compliance with the essential principals governing international relations, that program entails agreements and political commitments that in the regional sphere will lead to effective control of the arms race, removal of foreign advisors, establishment of demilitarized zones, the prohibition of the use of the territory of any state to carry out political or military actions to destabilize other states, eradication of the transfer and traffic of arms, and proscription of other forms of aggression or interference in the internal affairs of any country in the area.

To make this general program effective, agreements will have to be worked out to secure political commitments designed to guarantee regional peace. These agreements could include the following:

—A commitment to bring any prevailing hostile situation to an end;

[73] For a review of the work by the Contadora Group from its first meeting at Isla de Contadora on January 9, 1983, to November 1983, see document 644 and the report by U.N. Secretary-General Pérez de Cuéllar, October 14, 1983 (U.N. document S/16041 (1983)).

—A commitment to put a freeze on the level of existing offensive armaments;

—A commitment to begin negotiation of agreements on arms control and arms reduction, while establishing suitable monitoring mechanisms;

—A commitment to ban the presence within their territory of military installations belonging to other countries;

—A commitment to give prior notice of troop movements in the vicinity of borders, whenever the number of troops involved is in excess of the number established in the agreement;

—A commitment to conduct, as the case may be, either joint border patrols or international border surveillance on the part of observer groups selected by mutual agreement of the interested parties;

—A commitment to set up joint security commissions so as to prevent and, if necessary, resolve border incidents;

—A commitment to establish internal control mechanisms to prevent arms from being funneled from the territory of any country of the region to the territory of another;

—A commitment to encourage a climate of detente and trust within the area, by avoiding statements and other actions that jeopardize the necessary atmosphere of political trust; and —A commitment to coordinate systems for direct communications among the governments, so as to avert armed conflicts and create an atmosphere of mutual political trust.

Accordingly, we also feel that paralleling the execution of this general program, the task of settling specific differences between countries should begin with the signing of letters of understanding and the establishment of joint committees that will enable the parties to work together and guarantee effective control over their territories, especially in border areas.

These measures, which are designed to eliminate elements disruptive to regional peace, must be matched by a major internal effort to strengthen democratic institutions and guarantee the observance of human rights.

In this regard, it is essential that the methods for consulting the people be improved, that the various currents of opinion be allowed unencumbered participation in the electoral process, and that the full participation of the citizenry in the politics of its country be encouraged.

The strengthening of democratic political institutions is closely linked to the evolution and progress made in the area of economic development and social justice. These are, in fact, two dimensions of a single process whose ultimate purpose is the realization of man's fundamental values.

The economic backwardness at the root of the region's instability and the eventual cause of many of its conflicts must be approached from this perspective.

Strengthening the machinery of integration, increasing intrazonal trade and using the opportunities for industrial complementation to advantage, are some of the actions that are most needed to offset the effects of the world economic crisis. Nevertheless, the region's own effort must be augmented by the support of the international community, especially that of the industrialized countries, in the form of development credits, cooperative programs and access of Central American products to their markets. The governments of the countries in the Contadora Group confirm their decision to continue cooperative programs to aid the subregion and to offer their participation in channeling the international support received for economic-recovery purposes.

Based on these general guidelines, we have entrusted our ministers of foreign affairs with preparation of specific proposals, which are to be presented to the Central American countries for consideration at the upcoming joint meeting of ministers of foreign affairs.

We call upon all the members of the international community, especially those that have expressed support for the efforts being made by the Contadora Group, as well as the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Chairman of the Permanent Council of the Organization of American States, that they lend their experience and diplomatic expertise to the task of finding peaceful solutions to Central America's problems. For these reasons, we have sent messages to all the leaders of the American hemisphere to request their solidarity, which is so essential.

We, the Heads of State of Colombia, Mexico, Panama and Venezuela, reaffirm the intentions that unite our governments in a common endeavor, which is to help secure the just and lasting peace to which the peoples of Central America aspire.

Given in Cancún, Mexico, the seventeenth day of the month of July, in the year nineteen hundred eighty-three.

Letter From the Secretary of State (Shultz) to the Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee (Percy), July 20, 1983 [74]

"I Have Concluded That the Statutory Criteria for Certification Are Met"

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1981, as amended, makes the provision of certain security assistance and the assignment of certain military personnel to El Salvador contingent upon a certification to Congress by the President in accordance with Section 728 of the Act. [75] The President's authority under Section 728 has been delegated to the Secretary of State. I transmitted the third such certification to you on January 21, 1983.

I hereby transmit to you the fourth certification required under Section 728. A report dealing with the matters covered in this certification and providing the justification for the certification is also enclosed. [76] It has been our objective in compiling this report to provide to the Congress a comprehensive and objective analysis of the subjects covered under the certification requirement.

I have concluded that the statutory criteria for certification are met. Nevertheless, it is evident that the record falls short of the broad and sustained progress which both the Congress and the Administration believe is necessary for the evolution of a just and democratic society in El Salvador. I am particularly concerned by the failure of the Government of El Salvador to achieve more positive results in establishing discipline over the security forces and in assuring that those, military or civilian, who commit gross violations of human rights will be brought to justice and held accountable under the law. An especially compelling aspect of this concern for me as Secretary of State is the slow progress made thus far by the Salvadoran authorities in bringing the murderers of United States citizens to justice.

The evolution of democracy is a long and difficult process, especially when there are concerted efforts to defeat it. As we have seen, in El Salvador progress in some key areas has been disturbingly slow. However, our disappointment over the pace of change should not obscure the fact that change is occurring. The people of El Salvador deserve our support in their effort to achieve a truly democratic society, which will provide the best and most lasting safeguard of human rights.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE P. SHULTZ

[ENCLOSURE]

Subject: Certification to Authorize Continued Assistance for El Salvador.

Pursuant to Section 728 (b), (d), and (e) of the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1981, as amended, and applicable delegations of authority, I hereby determine and certify:

---

[74] Source: Central American Policy. Hearing Before the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session (Washington, 1983), p. 49.

[75] P.L. 97-113, enacted December 29, 1981; for text, see 95 Stat. 1519.

[76] Not printed; for text, see Central American Policy, pp. 51-114.

(1) That the Government of El Salvador is making a concerted and significant effort to comply with internationally recognized human rights;

(2) That the Government of El Salvador is achieving substantial control over all elements of its own armed forces, so as to bring to an end the indiscriminate torture and murder of Salvadoran citizens;

(3) That the Government of El Salvador is making continued progress in implementing essential economic and political reforms, including the land reform program;

(4) That the Government of El Salvador is committed to the holding of free elections at an early date and to that end has demonstrated its good faith efforts to begin discussions with all major political factions in El Salvador which have declared their willingness to find and implement an equitable political solution to the conflict;

(5) That, since the third such certification was made, the Government of El Salvador has made good faith efforts both to investigate the murders of the seven United States citizens in El Salvador in December 1980 and January 1981 and to bring to justice all those responsible for those murders, and has taken all reasonable steps to investigate the killing of Michael Kline in El Salvador in October 1982.

Therefore, to the extent otherwise consistent with law, the furnishing of assistance for El Salvador under chapters 2 and 5 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, the issuance of letters of offer and the extension of credits and guarantees for El Salvador under the Arms Export Control Act, and the assignment of members of the Armed Forces to El Salvador to carry out functions under those Acts are hereby authorized. This certification together with the justification therefor shall be reported to the Congress immediately.

This certification shall be published in the Federal Register.

Remarks by President Reagan, July 21, 1983 (Extract) [77]

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. President, are we trying to overthrow the government of Nicaragua with a sending of what some people would call a kind of a gunboat diplomacy approach?

THE PRESIDENT. No, we're conducting exercises such as we've conducted before here in this hemisphere.[78] We've conducted them in other parts of the world and there haven't been too many questions about that or suggesting that we're starting—

Q. What is the purpose?

THE PRESIDENT. —to try to start a war in those other areas. We conduct annual maneuvers more than once a year, as a matter of fact.

Q. Are you saying they have no political purpose?

THE PRESIDENT. We're conducting exercises there. And I think that there's every reason for us to do so with the responsibility we have in this hemisphere.

Only those portions of the President's remarks dealing with Central America are printed.

Now, . . . ?

Q. Mr. President, would you say that the pressure the U.S. has put on the Government of Nicaragua, by supporting the rebels against that government, has helped to bring the government to a position where they are expressing some willingness to negotiate? [79] Would you attribute that to the pressure that the United States has been able to bring to bear and would you accept a negotiated solution in El Salvador contingent on a solution in Nicaragua?

THE PRESIDENT. You're getting very complicated there and getting me deep into the field of things that I don't think are at hand yet. I'd have no way of reading their minds as to why. I think it could be assumed that maybe what is happening there with the Contras who are opposing the Sandinista regime had something to do with this decision. Undoubtedly Contadora did also have something to do with it.

I welcome this first step. I don't think it's far enough. But what really is needed is what the Contras are asking for and that is that the Sandinista government is in violation, literally, of a contract that they made with the Organization of American States. That's not just the United States. That's 30 other American states. They made a contract during the revolution that, if they had the help of the OAS in persuading the Somoza regime to step down and let their revolution take over, they made specific promises as to what they would do with regard to freedom of press and freedom of—all the freedoms that we enjoy here in this country. They have violated all of those provisions. And the OAS considers that the violation of a contract. And what the Contras are really seeking, having been members of the Sandinista revolution for the most part in its effort to bring democracy to Nicaragua, they are trying to restore the original purpose of the revolution.

Q. Just a follow-up, if I may, sir. Would you consider a negotiated settlement in El Salvador if there can be a settlement in Nicaragua?

THE PRESIDENT. Without even waiting for Nicaragua, we have proposed and the Salvadoran Government has proposed that if the guerrillas will lay down their arms and come in and participate in the democratic process of election, they will be granted amnesty. They have a peace commission that is organized to negotiate such a thing with them. And, so far, the guerrillas in El Salvador have refused any such meeting on that.

Q. Mr. President, Henry Kissinger was someone that you said should resign back in 1976. He's controversial because of his role in overthrowing the Allende regime in Chile, because of his support for covert action. Why did you choose him to head this commission, considering your past doubts about him? [80] And aren't you, in effect, shortcircuiting the work of the commission since the administration is already planning an increase of some $400 million in its aid request for next year for that region?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't think any such figure has been advanced by us as yet. We're asking for the $110 million that we had proposed for 1983 and which the Congress has so far refused to give us. We have asked for some increase in that in our request for the 1984 budget, but nothing of that figure.

But, with regard to the first part of your question, as I recall in 1976 the entire issue of Henry Kissinger came up in response to questions from the audiences as to whether I would choose him as my Secretary of State, and I said that I had other things in mind and I would make my own choice of a Secretary of State.

I've chosen him for this committee because I believe here is a man with a distinguished record in diplomacy. I believe he is exceptionally well qualified to bring back the information that, I think, we all need and that would help the Congress make the decisions it needs to make about Central America.

[80] For the Executive order establishing the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America, and for a list of its members, see ibid., pp. 1020–1021. The President announced his intention to appoint the commission during an address before the International Longshoremen's Association, Hollywood, Florida, July 18, 1983; for text of this address, see ibid., pp. 1009–1014.

Q. Well, to follow up—to ask you whether you think that there is no need, then, for this massive increase because there are administration officials who have said that there are planning papers already at the budget office for this big increase in economic and military aid. Do you think it will not be necessary?

THE PRESIDENT. If I ever find those unnamed individuals that are quoted as administration sources, I'm going to take their White House passes away from them.

Q. Right in your office.

THE PRESIDENT. I don't know who they are.

Q. Is it true or not?

THE PRESIDENT. No.

Q. We can give you a list of names.

THE PRESIDENT. I have never heard that figure advanced as anything that we're asking for. But I do think that this commission—What I want is to bring back and with the Congress sit down with the idea of an overall program for all of our neighbors here in the hemisphere.

It is what I talked to leaders about when I made my one trip to South and Central America—talked to them about all of us becoming equal allies here in the Western Hemisphere, all dedicated to the same thing, to progress, economic reform, what social reforms are needed in some areas and so forth. And this is my goal for Central America.

To achieve it, however, you've got to stop the shooting. You've got to let them proceed with these reforms without getting murdered by terrorists who want a continuation of what we've seen too much of in the past, and that is revolutions that only overthrow one set of rulers in order to establish another set of rulers.

Yes, . . .

Q. Mr. President, in view of your frequent criticism of the Sandinista regime which you repeated here this morning, do you think it's possible to get any kind of regional settlement and regional stability if that regime remains in office or do you think that regime would have to go before there would be any settlement?

THE PRESIDENT. Now, we talked—wait a minute. Which country, again, are we—

Q. I'm talking about in quest of regional stability—

THE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Q. —do you think that's possible in Central America if the Sandinista regime survives in Nicaragua?

THE PRESIDENT. If the Sandinista regime remained but remained true to the original purpose of the revolution—this is a government by one faction of the original revolution. It exiled. It jailed. It threw out of office the other leaders of the revolution because they wanted democracy. And the present group wanted Communist totalitarianism. And this is what they presently have there. So, what is being struggled for there is a restoration of the original revolution.

Q. So, you think if this present faction remains in power alone in Nicaragua, there cannot be a satisfactory settlement. Is that your—

THE PRESIDENT. I think it would be extremely difficult, because I think they're being subverted, or they're being directed by outside forces. . . .

Q. Mr. President, with the presence of the American ships off the western coast of Central America, is there any plan by the United States to go on the Gulf side of Central America, especially off the coast of Nicaragua, to impose a naval blockade?

THE PRESIDENT. A blockade is a very serious thing, and I would hope that there will—that eventuality will not arise. There are going to be maneuvers of various kinds.

Q. In the Gulf?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, just as last year we had some maneuvers in the Caribbean, I prefer to call it, and we will be doing that again because of our interests there and the importance of that to the United States.

Transcript of a Press Conference by President Reagan, July 26, 1983 (Extract) [81]

"A Shield for Democracy and Development"

THE PRESIDENT. I have an opening statement here. Awhile back I got a letter from a 13-year-old, and I apologize for not having answered her as yet. She wrote, "Don't you wish sometimes you could just stamp your feet and shout at the press or Senators to be quiet, sit down and listen to what you're saying?" Yes, Gretchen, I sometimes do feel that way, and, particularly, over the past week. On April 27th I went to Capitol Hill, addressed a joint session of the Congress on a subject of vital importance to all Americans.

I talked about our goals in Central America, and I asked for congressional understanding and support. In Central America, as elsewhere, we support democracy, reform and human freedom. We support economic development. We support dialogue and negotiations among and within the countries of the region. And, yes, we support a security shield for the region's threatened nations in order to protect these other goals.

In my view there has been entirely too much attention to the efforts that we're making to provide that security shield, and not nearly enough to the other elements of our policy. Yet in each of the four elements of the policy, we find they reinforce each other, and that they are being pursued simultaneously in a carefully balanced manner.

I dispatched Ambassador Dick Stone to the region to facilitate the process of dialogue and negotiations. He is there now with a personal message from me to leaders of countries in the region, the text of which I am making public tonight. [82] I am heartened by the efforts of the Contadora countries, led by Colombia, Mexico, Panama and Venezuela to reach a peaceful regional solution. I am encouraged by some recent statements from Nicaragua and Cuba that seem to indicate that they, too, now recognize the merit to regional negotiations. [83] I trust their words will be followed by positive actions to ease tension and stop the fighting in the region.

Here at home I have appointed a bipartisan commission to make recommendations on the long-term measures, including economic assistance that we should undertake to help these struggling nations. I hope soon to be signing the legislation on the Caribbean Basin Initiative passed by an overwhelming bipartisan majority of both Houses. The program will bolster the economic independence of the region. We continue to promote elections as the best way to guarantee peace, human freedom and responsive government.

The greatest portion of our aid goes toward humanitarian and economic assistance. For every one dollar we provide for security assistance to that region, we provide three dollars for economic and human development. But we recognize that democracy and development can hardly flourish when threatened by violence. Dialogue and negotiations can best succeed when the parties are convinced that their goals cannot be achieved through the barrel of a gun. It is especially in our own hemisphere that the United States continues to be the foremost protector of peace. As part of this mission, as a way to provide a shield for democracy and development we, together with our friends, are now planning joint training exercises in the Caribbean and Central America, and let me set the record straight on what these exercises are and what they are not.

Essentially there will be two sets of practice training in the coming months, one a series of ground exercises in Honduras with the combined forces of Honduras and the United States; second, a series of ocean exercises with our own fleet. We have conducted joint exercises with Latin American countries on a regular basis since 1965. The latest exercises with Honduras took place earlier this year. Much larger scale exercises have taken place in Europe, Asia, and Latin America. Moreover, these training exercises are limited in purpose.

Regarding Cuban willingness to negotiate, see the speech by Cuban President Castro on July 26, 1983, and Castro's letter to Panamanian President de la Espriella of the same date reproduced in Foreign Broadcast Information Service, Daily Report: Latin America, July 27, 1983, pp. Q1–Q12 and Q12–Q13, respectively.

Yes, we want to underscore once and for all that the United States, along with our friends, seriously opposes the use of force by one neighbor against another in Central America, but we are not seeking a larger presence in that region, and U.S. forces have not been requested there. The United States stands firmly on the side of peace. As a nation we remain steadfast in policy and purpose. We want to see an end to violence and bloodshed, to the export of revolution. We want to help our neighbors lift themselves up to prosperity. We want to usher in a new era of peace and social justice.

Now, these are great goals and worthy of a great and generous people, and we shall continue to keep faith with ourselves in the days ahead. Now, . . . ?

Q. Mr. President, you complain of too much attention. How can the people ignore two battleship groups, thousands of combat troops going to Honduras, it is said the covert funding of 10,000 rebels, Nicaraguan rebels? My question—and all these things have happened since April 27th—my question, sir, is, in seeking solutions, how far will you go militarily, and I would like to follow up.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I have told you, we have no military plans for intervention of that kind. We have 55 mainly noncommissioned officers helping to train the Salvadoran Army. We know that Cuba has somewhere in the—well, it has thousands of military personnel in Nicaragua. It does seem a little overbalanced with regard to the attention that's being paid to 55 as against attention that's being paid to the thousands. I suppose what my question is . . . back—to answer with a question, is why are maneuvers that we have performed before and regularly suddenly treated with such suspicion when only—well, within this year, last spring, we had military maneuvers in Honduras, and last year we have naval maneuvers in the Caribbean and no one seemed to be excited about them at all. So, is it just that there's no confidence in the fact that when I say these are maneuvers of the kind we've been holding regularly and for years?

Q. But they're unprecedented to last 6 months. The polls show the American people are not for them and they fear it may lead to war. And my question is, remembering the lessons in Vietnam, does this bother you? And do they have any say?

THE PRESIDENT. First of all, there is no comparison with Vietnam and there's not going to be anything of that kind in this. And maybe the people are disturbed because of the confused pattern that has been presented to them and the constant drumbeat with regard to the fact of suspicion that somehow there is an ulterior purpose in this.

It hardly seems to me that those ships are going there—and I don't know that they're going to be there 6 months. I don't know what the length of time for the training is. I don't know the number of ships involved. But I didn't know the number that were involved in the Caribbean exercises. But if they were there for some kind of a hostile purpose, we happen to know that right now a Soviet freighter, the Ul'Yanov, is approaching the Port of Corinto in the vicinity of Nicaragua—or that port is in Nicaragua and it is carrying a load of military equipment, helicopters, transport helicopters for military purposes and so forth. And no one shot at them. . . .

Q. Mr. President, you've mentioned your interest in easing the tensions and you've said that the—you hope the Nicaraguan proposals will have that effect. Now, your spokesman has said that the 4,000 troops that you're planning to send down there will—

THE PRESIDENT. Between 3 and 4.

Q. Between 3,000 and 4,000 troops that you're planning to send down there will have standing orders to defend themselves if they're fired upon. How does that help to ease tensions?

THE PRESIDENT. Wait a minute. That is something that has been true for a long time, as far as I'm concerned, with our troops and our forces anywhere they may be.

We went through a period some years ago when American forces were pretty much fair game. Look back at some of our aircraft that were shot down on the charge that they had ventured out over international water—or out of international waters into the airspace of a Communist bloc country—and shot down and we protested diplomatically.

It seems to me that young men and women who are going to defend this country of ours and who join the military should know that they have the right to defend themselves if we have placed them in a position where they could come under fire. And this is just a standard order. We don't want war. But I don't think that you prevent war by letting your personnel out there become the victims.

Q. But doesn't this simply increase the chances of war?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I don't think so. All of the ships that are down in that area and that are going there are outside the 12-mile limit. They're out in international waters where they have a right to be. Now, wait a minute, before all of your hands go up here, you change personnel every once in awhile, and new people come into the White House Press corps. And it's only been recently that an effort has been made to see that I have an opportunity to meet them and get acquainted. And so recently I met five newcomers to the press corps, but only three of them are here tonight. And when I met them I told them that in this, the first press conference that I knew they were here, that I was going to call on them if they had a question.

. . . , do you have a question?

Q. How can I turn that down? (Laughter) A little earlier you said yes, that the military exercises—that you did want to underscore that the United States is opposed to the use of force—

THE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Q.—in the region. Is sending down our military might to the region a way to show that we oppose force? Isn't there some sort of contradiction there? Wouldn't it be better to say—if we do these things regularly—isn't this the time now not to do it, not to heighten the tensions, and to say, we oppose the use of force? How can you oppose it by sending down all these ships and men?

THE PRESIDENT. Since the trouble that is going on down there comes from outside the area—is revolution exported from the Soviet Union and from Cuba and from others of their allies—then wouldn't there perhaps be a risk if we changed our pattern and withdrew? Wouldn't we be sending some kind of a signal that might be the wrong kind of signal to send if we want peace in that area?

The simple truth is: no one has asked for American forces to come to their aid; in fact, they've gone quite the contrary and said the reverse—that they don't. And yet they do acknowledge that they need the material assistance that we're giving them, both economic and to provide a shield, or help them provide their own shield, against the attacks that are preventing them from making the economic progress that they want to make now that they have installed a democratic-type of government there.

But, as I say, we've done this regularly. I don't think that it's destabilizing, nor should it be.

Q. You know, you've said in your letter to the four Contadora nations that you want to take this out of the realm of an East-West confrontation. But doesn't somebody have to begin to take it out of that realm? And couldn't the United States be the leader in that way, and not make it that kind of an atmosphere of confrontation?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, we think we are. We have tried to make contact with the guerrillas in El Salvador to see if they would not meet with the peace commission that was created by the El Salvadoran Government to discuss participating in the democratic process in the elections that are coming up before the year is out in the entire area. I have just sent letters, which have been made public now, but, letters to the Contadora Four of our approval of what they're doing; and our recognition of what they are, and we stand ready to support them in what they're trying to accomplish. We want a political and a peaceful solution.

Now, wait a minute. There are two more here that— . . .

Q. Thank you, Mr. President, military leaders in the Pentagon have stated recently that they never want to be involved in another war without the support of the American people. Do you have any sense or feeling now for whether the American people are ready to support a war to defend our interests in Central America?

THE PRESIDENT. In the first place, I don't think the American people have ever wanted a war. And I think we're probably the most peace-loving people in the world. And maybe this has been what has—part of what has lured us into wars in the past because we haven't been ready for them.

But I—no, I don't think the American people—And I don't think that they—frankly, I don't think that they're as aware as perhaps they should be—we've tried to make them aware—that this does constitute something of a threat in this hemisphere to peace in the entire hemisphere if those who are exporting the revolution here are successful.

But, no, we're not planning a war and we don't think that that's going to happen at all. I've seen four wars in my lifetime. I have sons and I have a grandson and I agree with General Eisenhower that war is man's greatest stupidity. And I don't—I don't want to see such a thing. We want peace.

But we also must recognize that you've got to do more than just want peace. You have got to prevent what is happening down there to people who want peace also but are not allowed to have it because of outside forces that are seizing upon their situation and hoping to further their own ideological aims.

Q. Sir, do you feel the people support your policies in Central America?

THE PRESIDENT. Those that have been informed and understand it do. I just met with some today who made it evident that they did. Now, if we all get together and explain what's happening down there, perhaps that'll resolve the situation in that regard.

Now, . . .

Q. Mr. President, do you—if there is an incident where the American forces down there engaging in the military exercises are fired upon and they are forced to fire back, do you see any contingency where such an incident might lead to deeper American involvement in Central America?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I don't really because I don't foresee—First of all, those maneuvers that are going to be held in Honduras are not going to put Americans in any reasonable proximity to the border. It would have to be something in the nature of a terrorist attack, something of that kind. And I think that any of us—that could happen in a base here in America. And, again, I believe that those people who are—have taken it upon themselves to be our defenders and protectors have a right to defend and protect their own lives.

Q. —follow up, sir. If Nicaragua attacks Honduras, would the United States assist Honduras militarily under the terms of the Rio Mutual Defense Pact Treaty?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, we haven't considered that, but a great many people should know that since 1947—and so obviously our administration didn't have anything to do with it—there is a pact, the Rio Pact, that says that any attack—or an attack on any American state shall be considered as an attack on all American states. Now, that would require, of course, actual outside visible attack on a state and, I suppose, by a country flying under its own flag instead of under surrogate troops. So we would have to deal with that problem when it arose and deal with it with all of our neighbors and friends in the Organization of American States.

Q. Thank you, Mr. President. I'd like to give you a chance to silence this drumbeat of confusion that you were talking about. Why not say categorically that Central America will not be another Vietnam, that under no circumstances will you impose U.S. troops in a combat situation in Central America?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I said the last time we gathered, [84] that there are some things—I can make every assurance in the world that we have no such plans, we have no desire, nor do the countries down there want us involved in that way. But I used an expression that has been used by Presidents like Franklin Delano Roosevelt and others, and that is that a President should never say "never," because that's a hypothetical question that then asks you to try to predict what would take—would, could possibly take place in the future. And I just don't believe you can answer a hypothetical question, unless it's—

[84] For text of President Reagan's news conference of June 28, 1983, see Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, July 4, 1983, pp. 939–943.

Q. May I follow up?

THE PRESIDENT. What?

Q. Could I follow up?

THE PRESIDENT. All right.

Q. What about increasing the number of U.S. advisers in El Salvador? Are you planning to at all?

THE PRESIDENT. No one has presented a proposal to me about increasing the number. There's no question that 55 of them—if there was an increase, probably we could train the Salvadoran army and its new recruits that are coming in actually requiring basic training a little faster than we're doing it. But there's been no proposal for such an increase.

Now, . . .

Q. Mr. President, since you yourself have identified massive social problems as one of the root causes—

THE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Q. —of the troubles in Central America, are you prepared to make a commitment to substantial U.S. aid on the order of the Marshall Plan if the hostilities can be calmed?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, what we're—what we've appointed he Commission for, the Kissinger-chaired commission, is for the purpose of coming up and recommending a long-range plan that would particularly deal with the things that you mention. There's no question that our neighbors to the south have, for too many years, suffered revolutions in which one set of rulers simply were exchanged for another set of rulers. And there's no question but their economic and social policies have left much to be desired as far as the opportunity for the great mass of their people. And what we want is a long-range policy—and this is what I discussed when I visited there in South America, and discussed with them of how we can have the kind of development that will make these countries economically self-sufficient, that will give them a standard of living in which there isn't the fertile soil that is presently there for subversion, for people offering promises of pie in the sky and then arousing to revolution.

And to, in other words, have a program that makes all of the nations here in the Americas equal partners in the development of this Western Hemisphere, and what a great power for good that we could be if we were so organized. And we want—this is my dream, and it's what I hope that the commission will come back with.

Q. Sir, is the United States prepared to make the kind of massive dollar commitment that that would undoubtedly entail?

THE PRESIDENT. It does not follow that it has to undoubtedly entail that. For example, many of those countries are considered too high a risk for private investment. If, together, we could agree upon guarantees that the investment would not be confiscated, taken over by governments and in changes of government, and so forth. There is far more in the private investment pool, far more for—there than any government could possibly do.

And it is to find out what is practical and what can be done. And we're not completely alone in this, because our allies, the other industrial nations in the world, have made it plain to us and, again, at Williamsburg that not only here in our hemisphere, but in their own, we want to come up and find ways that we can help the developing part of the world, and help them to faster development and a better way of life.

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. President, I'd like to ask you about the Chairman of your new commission on Central America, Dr. Henry Kissinger. There have been, as you know, a number of charges over the years that Mr. Kissinger during the Nixon years tried to destabilize the duly elected government of Chile and that he also once told a Chilean official that whatever happens in the South is of no importance. Did you check into Mr. Kissinger's record on Latin American before you appointed him?

THE PRESIDENT. I know what his position was prior to my taking over this Office and how seriously he considered the problems that are going on. Remember, Salvador didn't start with us. It was already in turmoil before we got here, and I know how he feels about that, and I know also there is no hard and fast—well, let me put it this way, I think there are some stereotypes about Mr. Kissinger that a little actual reading and re-reading the history would indicate that those stereotypes are not necessarily valid.

Q. Mr. President, if I may follow up with another question about the commission, you talk a lot here, and your aides do, about the gender gap, and yet that commission was appointed 12 men, no women. Doesn't that add to the perception that you're insensitive to women?

THE PRESIDENT. It might add to the perception. That's all it is, is a perception, because if anyone wants to really dig into the facts, I will match our record against any other administration that has ever been here with regard to what we have accomplished for women; in the field of economics, our tax policies that reduced and hopefully will in the near future eliminate the marriage penalty tax, the measures that we passed in the IRAs that not only working women but housewives can have these tax-free savings accounts. We have almost doubled the tax credit for child care, but in addition to that, I noticed the other night that someone on the air was comparing our record to that of the previous administration and we came out a little behind with regard to the appointment of women to positions in government, except that it turned out that without their acknowledging it, they were comparing the 4-year record of the previous administration with our first 2 years, and when you compare our first 2 years with their first 2 years, well, we're quite a ways out ahead.

Q. Why no women on this commission?

THE PRESIDENT. On this particular commission—maybe it's because that we're doing so much and appointing so many that we're no longer seeking a token or something. It just came out that these were the 12 we selected. We wanted six opponents. We wanted six on our side. But we've appointed over 1,000 women in executive positions here in government—three members of the Cabinet, never before in history and one member of the Supreme Court.

So, I think our record—it's just a case of our record isn't known. . . .

Q. Mr. President, since Cuba has repeatedly been labeled as the fountainhead of most of the violence in Central America, why has your administration elected to go to the recepients of the arms and the equipment that comes in instead of going to the source?

THE PRESIDENT. We have interdicted some of the supplies that are going from Nicaragua over to El Salvador. If you go to the source, I think you're talking about the Soviet Union. They know and we have communicated to them how we feel about this and we have also to our friends in Cuba, told them how we feel about it.

We are trying to bring about the very thing that all of you seem to think that we're shying away from and that is not broadening a war but trying to limit it and trying to bring about a peaceful and political settlement in Central America. . . .

Q. Mr. President, in reply to . . . question you spoke of confusion. But isn't this administration to blame for much of that confusion? Some of our own ambassadors in Central America were taken by surprise by the maneuvers. Some of the friendly governments especially in the Contadora group were puzzled by your latest actions. My question is, why was there not more prior consultation and what can you do now to reassure any of those friendly governments that we're not today closer to war down there than we were last week?

THE PRESIDENT. As I told you, I sent four—I've sent letters to all four leaders of the Contadora countries. And I don't think that there's that much disturbance among our friends and allies about this.

Sometimes there's a slip up and an ambassador doesn't find out something they should find out soon enough in advance. As a matter of fact, I received a cable from one about that. My most recent appointee, the Ambassador of Austria,[88] and Helene let me know that something had taken place and she hadn't been told about it in advance. And when Helene speaks, I listen.

Q. Mr. President, who do you think is to blame for this confusion you spoke of then?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't think there is as much confusion as they're trying to point out about this. The training feature with Honduras—this has been well advertised and known for a long, long time that it's going to take place. And as I say, we regularly conduct joint maneuvers with, very often, not only on land but with the navies of our friends and allies in Central and South America. And so, I just don't think that there's—there's great confusion about this.

Q. Mr. President, is it true that you're planning a vast expansion of covert aid to the anti-Sandinista rebels in Nicaragua? And, what would congressional action to cut off such aid mean to your efforts in Central America?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I think it would be a very grave mistake if the legislature interfered with what we're trying to do, and we're trying to keep them appraised of our actions. I can't answer your question about covert aid. I think this is like discussing intelligence matters. If you discuss covert aid, you're—it's no longer covert. So, I can only tell you that we're continuing on a policy that we believe is aimed at, first of all, bringing about peace in El Salvador, hopefully through negotiations with those who are presently radicals and fighting as guerrillas. And in Nicaragua, hoping that we can persuade the Nicaraguan, the Sandinista government, to return to the principles of the revolution in which they, in writing, guaranteed to the Organization of American States was going to be the policy of their government.

Q. Let me follow up on covert aid, Mr. President. Given the fact that this covert operation is not so covert any more, haven't we reached a point where it really might make more sense to do things on an overt basis, and, in other words, hasn't the thing really become counterproductive?

THE PRESIDENT. No. No, I don't think so. And I think what we're doing is well within the limits of common sense, and the—those who are attempting to make it impossible for us to bring aid down in that area, I think are the ones who are building up—if they have their way—to a giant headache down the road a ways. And we're trying to prevent such a headache from coming about.

Letter From President Reagan to Panamanian President de la Espriella, July 26, 1983 [86]

The United States and the Contadora Process

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT DE LA ESPRIELLA: Thank you for the letter which you and the Presidents of Colombia, Mexico, and Venezuela have sent to me concerning the meeting held in Cancun on July 17, to review the current situation in Central America.

I would like to congratulate you on the efforts which the Contadora Four are making to promote dialogue among the countries of Central America. My government has consistently expressed strong support for the Contadora process. The Cancun Declaration, by articulating the crucial issues which must be treated to reach an effective and enduring resolution of the Central American conflict, is an important contribution to advancing that process.

I continue to believe that a solution to the crisis in Central America must encompass four basic principles:

First, it is essential that democratic institutions be established and strengthened as a means to resolve political differences within the Central American states. Only by ensuring free and open participation in the democratic process can the peoples of Central America achieve reconciliation within their societies.

Second, there must be respect for the principle of nonintervention, including a ban on support for subversive elements that seek to destabilize other countries.

[86] Source: White House Press Release, July 26, 1983, Office of the Press Secretary to the President; also printed in Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, August 1, 1983, pp. 1047–1048. The letter was personally delivered by Ambassador Richard Stone, Ambassador at Large and Special Representative of the President to Central America. Similar letters were sent to Belisario Betancur, President of the Republic of Colombia; Miguel de la Madrid, President of the United Mexican States; and Luis Herrera Campins, President of the Republic of Venezuela.

Third, the conflict in Central America must be removed from the context of an East–West confrontation, through such measures as the verifiable withdrawal of all foreign military and security advisers and a certifiable freeze on the acquisition of offensive armaments.

And finally, the countries of Central America must work among themselves and with their neighbors to achieve and sustain a level of economic growth that will guarantee the basic needs of their people.

I am pleased that the Cancun Declaration recognizes the importance of these fundamental principles. These issues are inextricably interrelated, and must be addressed on a comprehensive, regional basis which treats simultaneously the concerns of all the states affected by the Central American conflict. An attempt to resolve these issues sequentially, or on a piecemeal basis, will not achieve the goal we all share of a lasting peace for all of Central America.

Equally important is the need to ensure that all undertakings assumed by the Central American states be fully reciprocal and subject to comprehensive, fully adequate verification. Clearly, no initiative can bring true peace to Central America if one state is permitted to take unjust advantage of its neighbors through failure to abide by peace conditions which bind the others. The Charter of the Organization of American States makes clear that it should be the purpose of the OAS to either prevent unjust acts committed by one state against another, or to provide for common action on the part of the members in the event of difficulties. I believe the OAS, as this Hemisphere's regional forum, is the appropriate mechanism to ensure that those who make commitments, comply with them.

The problems of Central America are complex, and their solution demands untiring efforts. The activities which you and your colleagues in the Contadora group have undertaken are proof of your sincere dedication to the goal of a genuine and lasting peace throughout the region. My own efforts in this regard have been to dispatch my Special Emissary to the region and establish a bi-partisan commission to examine the problems of Central America and to propose solutions. You have my prayers and those of my countrymen as you continue your work.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN

Statement by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Motley) Before a Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, August 3, 1983 [87]

U.S. Support for Democracy in El Salvador

On July 11 we notified Congress of our plan to reprogram $3.4 million from within the $140 million in grant economic support funds (ESF) available for El Salvador in fiscal year 1983 to assist the development of the Salvadoran elections process. In his April 27 address to a joint session of Congress, President Reagan stated as the first of our four basic goals in Central America:

> "In response to decades of inequity and indifference, we will support democracy, reform, and human freedom. This means using our assistance . . . to bolster humane democratic systems where they already exist and to help countries on their way to that goal complete the process as quickly as human institutions can be changed. Elections . . . must be open to all, fair, and safe."

As the President's statement indicates, we regard development of a fully functioning constitutional democracy in El Salvador as essential to peaceful national reconciliation in the near term. We also believe that it is the only sure road to establishment of a stable, responsive, and progressive system of government in the future, so that El Salvador will not again have to face the anguish and bloodshed of its present internal conflict.

Motley prepared his statement for the Subcommittee on Foreign Operations and Related Agencies. All ellipses and brackets are in the source text.

Our emphasis on the establishment of constitutional democracy—with all that implies for economic equity and government under law—is the keystone upon which the other aspects of our policy are built.

We are providing extensive economic assistance to El Salvador, including the pathbreaking Caribbean Basin Initiative approved last week by both houses of Congress. The stability and equity of democratic government guarantees that the benefits of this assistance will reach the people and that private investment can be mobilized to fulfill its role as the engine of development.

We are also strengthening the Salvadoran military shield behind which political and economic development can occur. But our military assistance addresses no more than the symptom, leftist-inspired guerrilla violence; it is the development of constitutional democracy which meets the central challenge of creating an open and responsive political system.

Lastly, our opposition to power-sharing negotiations between the far-left guerrilla groups and the government springs not from a desire to pursue a military solution but from our conviction that El Salvador has had enough of backroom bargains among powerful elites, be they economic, political or military, far right or far left. That is the old way, no matter what guise it wears today. As President Magana said in his July 1 report to the people of El Salvador on the state of the nation: [88]

> ". . . any negotiation to distribute power would run contrary to the mandate of the voters, who were the large majority of the Salvadoran people. This is the only thing, definitely the only thing, which my government cannot do for peace."

The Search for a Democratic Solution

El Salvador needs a democratic solution, a solution of the kind found by Venezuela and Honduras after years of internal turmoil, the solution which has allowed Costa Rica to be at peace with itself and its neighbors for so many years: constitutional democracy founded on honest, open elections.

And El Salvador is seeking that solution. El Salvador's concentration on development of a fair, open system of elections has run steadily through more than 3½ years. Let me briefly review the historical record.

The proclamation of the armed forces issued on October 15, 1979, within hours of the coup by reformist military officers—which overthrew the old regime and began El Salvador's search for a new, better future—states as two basic goals: [89]

> "To create an environment favorable for the carrying out of truly free elections within a reasonable period of time," and
> "To permit the organization of political parties of every ideology, in such a way as to strengthen the democratic system."

After weeks of frantic efforts to build a junta of government which would include the full political spectrum, on January 9, 1980, the "Pact Between the Armed Forces and the Christian Democratic Party" announced the formation of a new government. In the event, this government ruled until peacefully displaced by the elections of March 1982. In addition to the economic and social reforms planned by that government, the pact cited as its first political objective:

> "To create the conditions necessary for the implementation of the structural reforms [and] at the same time lead the nation toward a democratic solution in which it is the people who decide their own destiny."

On March 5, 1981, Dr. Jorge Bustamante was named president of the three-member Central Elections Council. In his statement of acceptance, he noted that, in his 40 years as an adult, he had never cast a vote with the confidence that it would be counted. He emphasized that the full junta of government had guaranteed that elections would take place as soon as possible and be free of all pressure or fraud and stated: "without that assurance, we would not be here today." He then outlined his immediate tasks as those of developing an electoral law and a registry of voters.

As we all know, though he was unable to compile an electoral registry, Dr. Bustamante's efforts culminated in the March 1982 elections for a Constituent Assembly. Congressman Livingston of this subcommittee was there as part of the official U.S. observer team. Those of us who were not there saw the event through the eyes of the media, which moved from its initial skepticism to enthusiastic praise for the overwhelming turnout in the face of guerrilla threats and destruction; for the fairness and honesty of the campaign, the balloting, and the vote count; and for the dignity with which the outgoing government surrendered power.

Establishing a Democratic Government

The 16 months since the March 1982 elections have shown just what elections can bring to El Salvador. They were not only successful as a process; they were successful in launching a functioning, democratic government.

The president, Alvaro Magana, a political independent, was selected as a consensus candidate. There are also three vice presidents, each representing one of the three major democratic parties.

Following the installation of the new executive, the evolution toward a fully constitutional democracy continued. In the Pact of Apaneca,[90] the Salvadoran "Government of National Unity" pledged, as its first two goals, peace and democratization. The pact called for a multiparty Political Commission—which included the President, the three Vice Presidents, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and the Minister of Defense—to oversee the appointment of a new Central Elections Council, to draft the guidelines for the electoral process, and to work on municipal and presidential elections. As a result of their decisions, the Central Elections Council was expanded from three to five members, one from each of the parties elected to the assembly.

The Apaneca Pact also led to the establishment of a Peace Commission, now functioning, with the mandate to bring all Salvadoran sectors, including guerrilla parties such as the Revolutionary Democratic Front (FDR), into the electoral process. The Peace Commission—with the full backing of the Political Commission, the assembly, and President Magana—has several times explicitly invited the political parties associated with the guerrillas to begin talks on how they can participate in the coming elections. On June 6, commission member Francisco Quinonez offered to join in a "dialogue with FDR and FMLN leaders about their participation in the next elections." On June 11, he stated that, "we reiterate our position [of] inviting the FDR, if it is disposed and interested in participating in the democratic process . . . to make this [interest] known." The Peace Commission has actively sought to establish contact with these groups, facilitated by the recent efforts of Ambassador Stone, President Reagan's special envoy to Central America.

The Constituent Assembly is writing a new national constitution and acting as a legislative body until one can be elected under the new constitution. It is composed of 60 seats, apportioned according to the election results, as follows: 24 for the Christian Democrat Party (PDC), 19 for the National Republican Alliance (ARENA), 14 for the Party of National Conciliation (PCN, which has since divided into two parties), 2 for the Democratic Action Party (AD), and 1 for the Salvadoran Popular Party (PPS).

Acting in its legislative capacity, the assembly has extended the land-to-the-tiller phase of the agrarian reform and has passed and then extended an ambitious amnesty program, thus continuing progress on structural reform and national reconciliation.

Draft of a New Constitution. The assembly has also moved ahead on its most important task: writing a new national constitution. On July 22, a draft was formally introduced to the assembly by the working committee. The draft constitution is more liberal than its predecessor. It contains 246 articles divided into nine titles named:

I. The Human Being and the Goals of the State;

II. Rights and Fundamental Guarantees of the Human Being;

III. The State, Its Form of Government and Political System;

[90] For text, see Presidential Certification on Progress in El Salvador, pp. 53–57.

IV. Nationality;

V. The Economic Order;

VI. The Organs of Government, Their Powers and Responsibilities;

VII. The Central Elections Council;

VIII. The Responsibility of Public Officials; and

IX. Scope, Applications, Reforms and Derogations.

In the draft, the rights of the individual are strengthened. The presumption of innocence is codified in the constitution for the first time. Habeas corpus and other safeguards against arbitrary arrest are strengthened. The powers of the legislature and the supreme court are enhanced vis-à-vis the executive branch. The independence of the prosecutor general is strengthened and his powers increased. There is an explicit prohibition against information of an official party and against paramilitary organizations outside government control. The rights of workers are increased. The Presidential term is set at 5 years; that of legislators at 3 years. In presidential elections, if no candidate receives an absolute majority, a runoff between the front runners will be held within 30 days.

During the week of July 24–31, the assembly threw its sessions open to nonmembers who wished to comment. Formal debate among the assembly members is scheduled to begin on August 8. In addition to debate on the normal text of the constitution, discussions will also focus on transitory articles designed to facilitate early elections. Though it is difficult to predict when the assembly will finally promulgate the new constitution, we understand the target date is September 15, El Salvador's national independence day.

Preparations for New National Elections. Speaking for the Political Commission, President Magana announced on September 29, 1982, that new national elections would be held no later than March 28, 1984. In early March of this year, he announced that they would be held before the end of 1983. Though there has been much speculation about a postponement of elections because of delays in passage of the constitution, there has been no authoritative decision to postpone them beyond the end of the year.

Electoral preparations are now underway. The Christian Democrats held a party convention and, in a close contest, chose Napoleon Duarte as the party's standard bearer. Other parties are also approaching candidate selection. The Central Elections Council has a budget of $4.9 million for the costs associated with preparing for the elections.

The window for elections this year is rapidly narrowing. Massive population displacements occur at harvest time in early December as people go to find work in the fields. Elections must take place before then. The target date for promulgation of the constitution is September 15. Between promulgation of the constitution and early December, the electoral law will have to be passed, the parties and candidates registered, and the actual campaign carried out. Provision must also be made in that time period for a second-round election, in case no candidate wins an outright majority in the first round.

Obviously, debate on an issue as fundamental as the national constitution cannot be closed off artificially, even in the name of elections. El Salvador desperately needs a fundamental law based on a broad consensus and vision of the future. Only in that way will it serve as the legal bedrock for future political development.

One wild card is the effort to integrate the guerrilla-associated parties into the electoral process. It is difficult to predict what effect their acquiescence in participating would have on the present timetable. The Salvadoran Government had made clear its desire to see the broadest representation possible in the elections. But it has also made clear that elections will not be delayed simply because the far left is unresponsive or undecided. Elections cannot be held hostage to the decisions of an antidemocratic group.

In sum, the two fundamental steps in establishing a constitutional democracy are being taken right now in El Salvador: a constitution is being drafted and elections are being prepared.

U.S. Assistance

Our project to assist the elections effort conforms closely to Salvadoran plans. In essence, we plan to provide $3.4 million in critically short hard currency to at least partially cover the costs of a new computer and other equipment, technical assistance, and a program for international observers to witness the election. Our contribution will account for less than half of the overall budget for the elections and the building of a unified, independent, autonomous electoral registry.

We are seeking to minimize U.S. official involvement. In equipment procurement, our involvement extends no farther than assuring ourselves that the money is well spent on equipment adequate for the project goal. Part of our technical assistance will enlist advisers from Costa Rica and perhaps Colombia to help in the planning of the elections themselves and the registry and a major multinational firm to develop the security programs to safeguard the computer against tampering with the data base or the programs. A Salvadoran firm will provide the computer and oversee its installation and initial programing.

Except for the observer component, most of our assistance will benefit not only the coming elections but elections in the future. For instance, a new, small computer will not only be used to compile an electoral registry but, more importantly, will be able to avoid the long delays in processing voting results which occurred in the 1982 elections. We also hope to fund the purchase of an "uninterrupted power source" backup unit, so the failure of the electrical system, either through normal malfunction or guerrilla sabotage, cannot obstruct a smooth vote count.

In short, our program of assistance is calculated to strengthen the institutional and technical electoral process with a minimum of involvement in the actual administration of the elections. We can make an important contribution, one the Salvadorans' dedication to democracy fully merits.

Statement by the Secretary of State (Shultz) Before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, August 4, 1983 [91]

U.S. Policy in Central America

I feel like I have been set up here by these opening comments. [92] To me, the policy that we have is clear and consistent, and it is a multifaceted policy. It is a sophisticated policy, so you have an interplay among the parts of it. That means you have to emphasize one thing at one time and another thing at another, and that is the way a sophisticated policy is supposed to work.

So, in that spirit, Mr. Chairman and distinguished members of this committee, I welcome the opportunity to discuss with you the developments in Central America.

Our policy toward Central America today is just as the President set it forth to the Nation before the joint session of Congress on April 27, the speech to which you referred, Mr. Chairman, and with which you said you agreed. That night he identified our objectives as being to prevent a wider crisis and to bring about a lasting peace. And to achieve those ends, the President defined four activities to which we have committed ourselves:

Support for democracy, reform, and human rights; support for economic development; support for dialog and negotiations among the countries of the region and within each country; and support for the security of the region's threatened nations as a shield for democratization, development, and diplomacy.

Every step we have taken since then is consistent with this comprehensive strategy. Let me sum up each element as it stands today and as it relates to the others and to the whole.

Before I do so, however, let me say that a key aspect of the President's statement of April 27 was his appeal for a bipartisan approach to Central America's increasing importance. With the counsel and support of many Members of the Congress, the President has now named a Bipartisan National Commission headed by Henry Kissinger. Americans have begun to realize that we must pay more attention to our own neighborhood.

I might say that some of my distinguished predecessors, some months ago, some looking down their nose at me a little bit, had said that, "when I was in office I did not spend more than 20 seconds on Central America." Mr. Chairman, that is the problem. We have not paid enough attention to our own neighborhood, and we must do so.

Now, an effort to look at the future, and to do so in a bipartisan spirit, has long been needed. I hope everyone will provide the Commission as much assistance as possible as it begins its work.

Today, however, I want to discuss the current thrust of our four-part policy.

First—and it belongs first—support for democracy, reform, and human rights.

What we seek is a Central America more like Costa Rica than Cuba. We seek genuine democracy—not totalitarian charades but respect for human freedom and the rule of law—not repression but governments committed to the welfare of their own people.

Last year we observed with admiration Costa Rica's typically enthusiastic and meticulous national election. Today we are working with the Costa Rican Government, its prestigious Supreme Electoral Tribunal, and the new regional Center for Electoral Assistance to help other countries improve their electoral systems.

In 1981–82, we supported the transition to democracy in Honduras. Today defense of the constitutional democratic order in Honduras is a key objective.

In El Salvador, the Constituent Assembly elections a year ago last March were a stunning success, demonstrating that democracy can advance even in the face of guerrilla violence.

To help with the next Salvadoran elections, two prominent elections experts traveled to El Salvador in May accompanied by officers from the State Department and AID. We have now developed a project to support the coming elections. Our goal is to help the Salvadoran people build on the success of March 1982, not just the next time, but many times in the future.

We are also helping to rebuild El Salvador's tragically inadequate criminal justice system. I mince no words about that. The Attorney General visited there in April to underline the importance we attach to legal reform in the development of a working democracy.

Legal experts from a variety of U.S. agencies have followed up, and have visited Honduras and Costa Rica as well as El Salvador. In addition, at my invitation Judge Harold G. Tyler is conducting a review of all materials available to us concerning the 1980 murder of four American churchwomen in El Salvador, and I will recommend further actions we might take to advance the prosecution of those responsible for this crime:

Democracy has not been the historical norm in most of Central America, and its construction will not be easy. But the amnesty in El Salvador, the scheduling of elections for a Constituent Assembly in Guatemala, the vibrancy of democracy in Costa Rica and Honduras, all are indications of the progress Central America is making.

What is happening in Central America will be further advanced by the President's Democracy Initiative. We have begun consultations—bipartisan, both at home and abroad—to build support for improved cooperation among political parties and other groups committed to democracy.

Second, economic development.

Between 1960 and 1979, the nations of Central America had high per capita growth rates. But rising expectations clashed with outmoded and unresponsive political institutions; then economic slowdown brought additional conflict and instability. In recent years, falling prices of export commodities, rising import prices, the rule or ruin strategy of the guerrillas in El Salvador, and the growing uncertainty caused by Nicaragua's policies have created an acute economic crisis, increasing the region's vulnerability to Communist strategies.

The United States has responded to these underlying economic problems with both generosity and imagination. Much of the $610 million in economic assistance budgeted for Central America this fiscal year is concentrated on stabilization efforts—to provide hard currency for essential imports to maintain production and employment. With the rest, the Agency for International Development is supporting about 120 individual development projects.

To take just one critical area—the agrarian reform in El Salvador—our assistance has helped that program to benefit more than 500,000 persons, or roughly 1 Salvadoran in every 10. Other AID projects are developing Costa Rica's northern zone, upgrading Honduras' forestry and livestock industries, and helping Guatemala's highland Indians. Regionwide, U.S. economic assistance is three times greater than our military aid.

Finally, we have worked hard with other nations and with you in the Congress to develop a new approach to assisting economic development—the Caribbean Basin Initiative [CBI]. The CBI provides 12 years of free trade guarantees and incentives for investment in Central America and the Caribbean. It will be a powerful, long-term instrument for development and the creation of new jobs.

The Congress passed the bill just a few days ago. The President will sign it shortly.[93] The CBI is a good example of bipartisan cooperation in the national interest. I am confident its contribution will prove enduring.

Third, dialog and negotiations.

Our diplomacy is designed to help develop political solutions to Central America's national and regional problems. In Nicaragua, the new Sandinista regime did not respond to U.S. efforts at "constructive engagement." We then sought to resolve our differences through dialog. And when bilateral approaches in 1981 and 1982 proved fruitless, we participated in the multilateral peace process launched last October in San Jose. From its beginning this year, we have supported the efforts of Colombia, Mexico, Panama, and Venezuela—the Contadora Group. That support continues today.

In El Salvador, we have consistently and systematically tried to facilitate reconciliation with those among the guerrillas and their associates who might prove willing to test their appeal in honest elections. We are now actively supporting the efforts of El Salvador's Peace Commission to open a dialog with the Democratic Revolutionary Front—the political arm of the guerrillas—to assure the safe participation of all parties in the democratic process.

Since his appointment by the President last April, your former colleague—now mine—Dick Stone has worked hard to encourage dialog within El Salvador and in the region as a whole. He has met repeatedly with leaders of all the countries involved in the Contadora process, including the Nicaraguans.

Last weekend, with the help of President Betancur of Colombia, Ambassador Stone had a first contact with a political representative of the Salvadoran guerrillas. We hope additional contacts will take place, and that they will facilitate a direct and detailed dialog between the guerrillas and the Salvadoran Peace Commission.

Let me also note that there are important areas of convergence between the July 17 Cancun declaration of the Contadora presidents and the principles subscribed to by the United States last fall in the San Jose Final Act. The regional dialog, though still very difficult, is gradually clarifying the essential conditions for democracy and peace.

And fourth, military assistance and cooperation.

We seek a security shield, not as any kind of end in itself, but to provide the necessary protection, the necessary protection for the political, economic, and diplomatic goals I have just described.

The military components of the President's policy have been carefully calculated to do just that. Two kinds of activities are involved: activities to help others defend themselves, and activities to underline our own deterrent capability.

Military assistance is based on demonstrated needs in each country as measured against the threat to the country's security. The administration's requests for fiscal year 1984 are as follows: for Belize, $500,000 in grant aid and $100,000 in training; for Costa Rica, $2 million grant aid and $100,000 in training; for El Salvador, $55 million in grants, $1.3 million in training, and $30 million sales credits; for Guatemala, no grant aid, but $250,000 in training and $10 million in credit; and for Honduras, $40 million grant aid and $1 million in training.

Our readiness and deterrent capacity will be enhanced by the joint and combined exercises to take place with Honduran forces under the designation of "Big Pine II" in conjunction with fleet units.

These exercises will serve two related objectives:

First, to improve the training and readiness of our own forces and those of Honduras;

And second, to provide a credible assurance to all parties that the United States has the capability to muster a protective shield in the face of any challenge to the inter-American system and our international legal obligations.

These are the elements of the policy. All four are essential to our strategy. And precisely because of the interplay among them, they give us both the strength and the flexibility to achieve results.

Our support for democracy is slowly having an impact. A basis is being laid for renewed and more equitable economic growth once the shooting stops. And a critical interplay is underway between the military and diplomatic aspects of our policy.

Mr. Chairman, nations as well as men and women need incentives to change their behavior. At least until recently, there has been no incentive for the Sandinistas, no incentive for the Salvadoran guerrillas, no incentive for Fidel Castro, and no incentive for the Soviets to believe that anything credible, anything difficult stood in the way of imposition of Communist rule by armed forces in El Salvador and in the rest of Central America.

For what reason, then, should the Salvadoran far left be interested in participation in the political process? Why should the Sandinistas under such circumstances refrain from their revolution without frontiers? Why should Cuba act any differently in Central America than in Africa?

But something has now begun to happen. The evidence is there—in the interest in dialog by the Salvadoran guerrillas, even in the words of Ortega and Castro. Messages have been sent. By the solidarity among the Central American democracies, by the Contadora countries, by private remonstrances from Nicaragua's international supporters, by a popular insurgency inside Nicaragua, by the recent advances of the Salvadoran Armed Forces, and by the United States of America.

The substance of these messages is this. A victory by the far left and its foreign supporters through armed force is not in the cards. The people of Central America are intent on resisting that force. They are increasingly capable of doing so—because of their own efforts and because the United States is helping them. The United States and Honduras, in our current military exercises, are demonstrating what cooperative training and deterrence are all about.

Our adversaries' options—which have so far stressed force—must be narrowed toward negotiation and dialog. And I believe it is the responsibility of the administration and the Congress to make certain that nothing is done to weaken the tools that can bring this about.

Our strategy is well constructed for the problems we face. It is sophisticated, realistic, and flexible. It is showing results. It deserves your support and that of the American people.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Myths About Central America

I would like to talk a little bit about Central America, an area which has occupied a considerable portion of my life at various times and I would like to try, insofar as I can, to dispel a number of myths concerning Central America. You know the Hispanic peoples know what you mean when you say the "Liendra Negra"—the "Black Legend". The black legend is that the Spaniards went to South America and burned the Indians, and all they were interested in was getting gold. They were a mystery to the Indians and exterminated them and generally didn't behave like we noble Anglo-Saxons who treated ours so well. Well, the fact is that they had a couple of universities going a hundred years before Harvard was founded. And secondly, as one Spaniard said to me, "Our Indians are still there. Where are yours?" That black legend has been transferred to us. The other day I was in Spain and someone said "Well, Willy Brandt and Carlos Andrés Pérez[95] put out a statement and said that the United States is principally to blame for the situation in Central America. What do you have to say about that?" I said, "They are both distinguished statesmen." I doubt that Carlos Andrés Pérez made such a statement. He was in my office recently and he certainly didn't say anything like that to me. But I said, "You know, regardless of how remarkable they are, it is just as difficult for them to be always right as it is for the United States to be always wrong."

Now, one of the principal myths about Central America is that it is our backyard. It is not our backyard; it is our front lawn. And what happens there is of vital interest to us. It is the land bridge between us and South America and the incalculable reserves of that continent which we want to make sure are lined up on the side of freedom. The second myth is that the United States regards all insurrections against injustice and oppression as Communist inspired. They're not. But when they identify themselves as such, we have to take them seriously. When Humberto Ortega, one of the Nicaraguan Commandantes, says, "Marxism-Leninism is the guide of Sandinismo, and without Marxism-Leninism, there is no Sandinismo," we've got to take him seriously. That is not the United States saying it, that is Ortega himself saying that he is. And he said it in a document put out by the Public Relations Department of the People's National Sandinista Army of Liberation. Fidel Castro, on the 6th of June, 1961, said, "I became a Communist at the age of 17; I am one now, and will be one until the day I die." So much for the New York Times theory that we pushed him into their arms. I mean, he said so himself. We didn't take Adolph Hitler's Mein Kampf seriously either and it turned out to be quite serious: About 25 million dead. So it is not a question of we regarding all of these people who are rebelling against social injustice or against oppression, against various forms of dictatorship, as all being Communist. Only when they identify themselves to us as such. They will tell you now that, "Oh, Ortega said that," i.e. it is only rhetoric. Maybe, but about half of the original junta has now fled the country and are outside. So, evidently they feel the democratic revolution was betrayed.

This area between the Panama Canal and the Rio Grande River is vital to us because it contains 100 million people. One hundred million people whom we feel are entitled to the same freedoms and democracies that we have. For whom we wish a pluralistic society. The Soviets have an interesting doctrine called the Brezhnev Doctrine. The Brezhnev Doctrine says that when the Socialist regime of any Communist country is threatened, the Red Army reserves the right to intervene to guarantee the achievements of Socialism. Well, I am not sure that we shouldn't have a doctrine that guarantees the achievements of democracy. We apparently let the Monroe Doctrine fall into what the lawyers, I believe, call desuetude. And wouldn't it be a good idea if maybe we had a doctrine that democracy deserves to be helped. Because if you look at the history of the world, this century, one interesting fact strikes you. Democracies almost never engage in aggressive wars. They are almost always a factor of dictatorships, right or left. By their nature they are driven to external adventures. In democracies when you edited. The Outreach Group is a weekly gathering of members of the public who have an interest in Central America and who, by the nature of their organizational affiliation, their professional interests, and/or their personal knowledge, have communicated their concern about events in Central America in verbal and written forums. The meeting was held in the Old Executive Office Building, beginning at 2:30 p.m., under the auspices of the Office of Public Liaison of the White House.

[95] The references are to Willy Brandt, Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany, 1969–1974, President of the Socialist International, and Carlos Andrés Pérez, President of Venezuela, 1974–1979, Vice-President of the Socialist International.

have to ask the people to sanction a foreign war, unless it is a defensive war, very rarely are they willing to do so. We abhorred Nazism, but it still took Pearl Harbor to get us into the war. It is very difficult to get a democracy to go to war other than in response to an attack upon itself. And this is one of the reasons why, not just philosophically but pragmatically, we believe a pluralistic, democratic society is a good thing, not just for us, but for the people of Central and South America and all over the world in fact.

It is also a question of the maintenance of peace. You are far more likely to have peace where there are democratic regimes than where there are dictatorial regimes. And that is a very powerful factor. Large wars often grow from small wars. World War II grew out of a war between Poland and Germany. World War I grew out of a war between Austria and Serbia. So the important thing is that we do not have wars which can grow. The third thing is that this area is not just important to us. It is even more important that our enemies do not obtain control of it. Because then we do have a soft underbelly. Americans ask, what does El Salvador have to do with me? Well, El Salvador is closer to San Antonio than San Antonio is to Boston. You know, during the Falklands crisis, Mrs. Thatcher at one point in Number Ten Downing Street said, "It was in this room that Neville Chamberlain said, speaking of Czechoslovakia in 1938, 'Why should we go to war for this far distant country about which we know so little and with which we have so little in common?' And, she added, "because he did that, we had a war that killed 25 million people." So this is really the question that Cain asked: "Am I my brother's keeper?" And in a world that is the size of the one in which we now live, the answer is: Yes. We all are our brother's keepers. Because the fate of our brothers today may be ours tomorrow.

When you have a vast country with the resources of the Soviet Union actively carrying out Lenin's dictum, "Probe with bayonets. If you run into steel, try somewhere else," it is important that they not find the absence of steel in this area. It is important that they are not permitted to enslave these 100 million people. They will tell you that all of this is caused by poverty and oppression and lack of freedom. If that were true, we would have a lot more revolts in a lot more areas than we do. Certain areas have been chosen. And—this is a personal opinion—my opinion is that the real target of the Soviet planners in that area is Mexico. If they could destabilize Mexico—and our Mexican friends insist there is no danger of this, and perhaps they are right and perhaps they are wrong, but if they are wrong, the price they will pay is very great—how much interest would the United States be able to pay to Europe, Africa or Asia?

The people in Central America are no less people than we are. If we like for ourselves the advantages of freedom and democracy, why should we deny them to them. Economically we don't care whether the society is socialist, capitalist or mixed. Personally, I hope it is mixed or capitalist because there is one thing I have always found about socialism, it is undoubtedly one of the most noble doctrines man has ever evolved, but it doesn't work. It hasn't worked anywhere. I think we ought to give these people a chance to develop a pluralistic, democratic society in which they have a chance to change their mind, in which, if they want to try some experiment, they have an occasion four years later to review that experiment and see whether it was any good or not.

I think that is one of the key things that we want to try and help them achieve. Democracy is in trouble in Central America. It is under attack in Central America and if we don't defend it, who will? It is not just under attack from local forces; it is under attack from outside forces. All you have to do is turn up the airwaves and hear the storm that beats on those transistor radios throughout Central America every night to know that it is under attack from outside and not just from forces within each country.

People say, "Why don't you negotiate with the guerrillas?" Well, we negotiated with Hitler—we didn't, but the British and French did in 1938, and it didn't turn out very well. You've got to negotiate with strength. You've got to be able to convince your adversaries that the route of force is not a paying one. And also be able to convince your friends that, if the other side chooses the route of force, you have the means of meeting it. And above all, in my opinion, you must not freeze yourself into any position of telling your adversaries what you are going to do or telling them what you are not going to do. Uncertainty is a very powerful weapon. If we had told Adolph Hitler, as we told the North Vietnamese, that under no circumstances were we going to invade Germany, I just wonder how long World War II would have gone on. We are told that the Sandinistas are really representatives of the working peasant class who want to till their soil, earn a living and not become a pawn in the struggle between the superpowers. You know, I hear a faint echo. That is what I heard about the North Vietnamese. They were just representatives of the little peasants who wanted to till their rice paddies and live their lives without becoming a pawn in the struggle between the superpowers. Well, what happened? In Vietnam, when you had a war going on, you had American bombs falling all over the place; there was fighting in every village and all the young men were being drafted into the South Vietnamese army. There were no refugees. There were no boat people. When liberation came, 1,200,000 Vietnamese chose to go out into the South China sea in open boats, risking the pirates, the typhoons, the storms to escape from "liberation". What, by the way, happened to those peasants who were going to till their soil? Well, they don't have any soil to till. All the soil belongs to the government. What about not becoming a pawn in the struggle between the superpowers? Well, at Cam Ranh Bay there is today the largest electronics intelligence station the Soviet Union maintains outside the Soviet Union with the single exception of Lourdes in Cuba. And, if you look at Cam Ranh Bay today, you can see Soviet aircraft on the field. This for that part which said the North Vietnamese didn't want to be subject to the Soviets, didn't want to be subject to the Chinese; they just wanted to go their own little independent way.

I submit that when Mr. Ortega tells us that Sandinismo is guided by Marxism-Leninism, we have to take him seriously. And, obviously, a large number of his fellow commandantes have taken him seriously since a large number of the members of the original junta have left because they realize that the the revolution has been betrayed. And what does a "revolution without frontiers" of which the Nicaraguans speak mean? It means you keep going until you get to the U.S. border. And you just take them one by one with the old salami tactics. Everyone said the domino theory was discredited. Was it? Vietnam fell. Cambodia fell with the greatest genocide in history, proportionally to population. Laos fell. Those two countries now are occupied by the Vietnamese. We were told these were the little farmers that just wanted to cultivate their little plots of rice and not bother anybody. And that is exactly what we are hearing now about the Sandinistas, who have the largest army in Central America, an army that is not big enough to stop us but is far too big for their neighbors. And, if they have and are talking about this kind of an apparatus, what do they intend to do with it? Protect themselves against the Hondurans or the Costa Ricans? All is not by any means lost in this area. In Costa Rica we have just had a democratic election. In Honduras we have had a democratic election. In the Dominican Republic, where we intervened in 1965 militarily over great protests, there have been four separate changes of government by normal democratic elections whose results no one has really challenged. If we can just let democracy take root a little bit, have two, three changes of government by ordinary democratic process, as it has in Venezeula for instance, this process will then become the normal accepted process as up until now the normal accepted process for change has been coups and violence.

If you have democracy, you have all the mechanisms of change, change of any kind you want as long as you get enough people to agree. But not irreversible change. In my lifetime I have seen all the great right-wing authoritarian dictatorships in the world replaced by democracies. But I don't know, and no one else in this room knows, what replaces a Communist dictatorship because no one in this room has even seen one replaced. The only possible exception was the Hungarian Communist Regime of Bela Kun in Hungary in 1929 [1919] which was ejected by the Romanian Army marching into Budapest and ejecting it. Outside of that, I do not know of a single case where a Communist regime has been reversible. It is not just the fact that once the people go under this kind of a regime, there is no longer any hope. The regime is in power, it has weapons and it is quite prepared, in the name of its ideology, to use those weapons to keep itself in power. It impedes the means of subverting the armed forces which, traditionally, in the case of the Russian Revolution and so forth, is what occurred. You got the soldiers to turn their guns against the regime. But when they control all the means, all of the media, it is very difficult to get to the soldiers to subvert them. And so it is not just a philosophical preference for a political pluralistic society, for an opportunity for the people to pronounce themselves in a fixed period of time on whatever experiments that they undertake, but it is the question of guaranteeing to these people the right to live as human beings and not as slaves. And this is the real issue in Central America and in the Caribbean. It is not a question of a border issue, it is not a question of a particular class of society, it is a question of the fundamental rights of people. Whether we believe these people are entitled to the same rights as we are. And if we do, and they are under attack, and their hope for the future and for freedom is under attack, it is up to us to do whatever is necessary to help them to preserve or to gain for the first time, in some cases, the possibility of being free and of controlling their own destiny.

Now in the case of Nicaragua, once again, we have this myth that the United States pushed them into the arms of the Communists, that that is not where they really were going. Well, perhaps not. I would simply point out that after the revolution in September of 1979, Mr. Rabello [Robelo] and Daniel Ortega were received by President Carter at the White House.[98] Fidel Castro, I might add, paraded down Broadway under the confetti after he was victorious. Now, the myth is that the United States supports the military dictators. I submit that both Batista and Somoza fell when the United States made it clear that they were not going to sell them what they needed to stay in power. I would simply add, from the financial point of view, that to this day the largest donor of aid to Nicaragua has been the United States. And in the first 3 years after they came to power we gave the Sandinistas more money than we gave Somoza in 17 years. So it certainly isn't that we turned our backs on them and refused to help them. They chose the path of supporting the Soviet Union, or supporting a Marxist ideal because they believed in it.

You know we always have a tendency to believe that no one is really a Marxist. There are convinced Marxists; I have talked to them. It is an article of religious faith with them. I personally happen to believe that Fidel Castro is a more devout Marxist than Yuri Andropov. Yuri Andropov is in power and he wants to stay there. I think Fidel really believes all this stuff he's been saying. And that is very dangerous, when you begin to believe your own oratory. So I think we have to realize that there is a great deal at stake. Now the Europeans have this myth of Uncle Sam the Goliath beating up on the poor little small countries of Central America and with military aid we are always looking for military solutions. Well we are not. The President said something like 70 percent of our assistance has been economic. But all the economic assistance is not going to do you any good if you don't have some kind of security shield. So many people have adopted an economic deterministic view—that if you are economically strong, that is all you need. Well, I look at history and every time I think about the gross national product of Macedonia under Alexander and the Persian Empire which he overthrew, or I think of the gross national product of the Germanic tribes emerging from the northern forests wearing their animal skins, and the Roman Empire, which was unquestionably the largest, most productive economic unit that had appeared in the world until that time, I am reminded of the story that after Waterloo, Wellington invited Marshal Blucher to London and took him up the newly-inaugurated Nelson column. Blucher looked out over the city and under his breath he muttered, "What a city to loot!"

When people tell me that economic strength is all that is necessary and that there are no military solutions, I always suggest that whoever believes that go tell the Greeks because it was Constantinople for 11 centuries, but as a result of some military activities, it has been Istanbul ever since. And then I remember from my own lifetime that Germany entered World War II practically without a gold reserve, with food rationing in effect and with currency controls. It was 6 years against the rest of the world and it was a pretty close-run thing. When you have people imbued with a kind of semi-religious faith, the kind of fanaticism that Marxism brings with it, you've got to understand that you have a real danger on your hands. A danger not only to the United States, but, most of all, and this people lose sight of, to the people of Central America. It is they who are going to lose their freedom in the short term. We may lose ours, if we lose them, in the longer term, but they are going to lose whatever freedom they have, just like Vietnam. Vietnam was not a perfect society by any means but there were 30 newspapers in Saigon under Thieu. Some were suspended; some were fined. You know how many there are now? One. The Party Organ. So, there are all kinds of things at stake that do not immediately escape us.

Finally, that brings me to another item which I think is of fundamental importance. The one thing that all Communist revolutions have in common, is that they engender huge quantities of refugees. From Hungary, there were 400,000. From Cuba, there were 800,000. And that won for Cuba the title of the largest country in the world. The administration is in Havana; the government is in Moscow; the army is in Africa; and the population is in Florida. Now, Cuba is an island. Central America is not an island. We've had boat people from Vietnam. If we lose Central America, we are going to have a minimum of 10 million foot people and they won't be foot people all the way. Because when they get to the Guatemalan/Mexican border there will be buses waiting to take them to Nogales, Tijuana, Brownsville, and Laredo. And someone there to say, "Por aqui, Senores", that way. Now this is a country that was made by refugees but they didn't come in these enormous waves all at once. Refugees have built the United States but they came in over a period of time in some kind of order. We have 10 million unemployed. What are we going to do if we get 10 million refugees? Who is going to provide them jobs? Who is going to provide them with housing, schools, social security? These will be people who have lost everything. They will be willing to work for any salary. What will the impact of that be on the American job market? And you know, these people will want to stay—I always tell this to my Democratic friends in Congress from the southern part of the United States—they will want to stay where it is warm. And after they have been here a while, they will become naturalized. And they will be very anti-Communist and they will all register as Republicans and that is not in your interest.

We face a very crucial problem, not unlike the ones the British and French faced when the Germans remilitarized the Rhineland. We now know that the German units that went into the Rhineland had orders, if the French reacted, to pull out at once. They remilitarized the Rhineland, they took the Saar, they took Austria, they took the Sudetenland, they took the whole of Czechoslovakia, they took Memel, and finally the war burst over Poland. But by that time the Skoda works in Czechoslovakia were working for the Germans, not against them. Churchill once said—and this is an eternal truth—"You cannot slake the appetite of dictators by throwing them small countries to eat. Their appetite grows while they eat." As they digest Cuba, they will move on to the mainland—to Nicaragua. And when they have digested Nicaragua, they will digest Salvador. And then Honduras, and then Guatemala, and then it will be Mexico's turn. Now the Mexicans are convinced that no danger threatens them. I wish I could agree with them. I certainly hope that no danger threatens them but I do remember what Blucher said: What a city to loot. There is for us a choice now. We can either make a stand and defend regimes that are admittedly not perfect. But, is the solution to a flawed regime to replace it with a totally irreversible totalitarian Marxist dictatorship? Is that the answer? Because the Salvadorans or the Hondurans or the Guatemalan Government do something that we don't like, is the answer to turn them over to a totalitarian dictatorship which will not be extinguished in our lifetime? That is not the solution and we all know it. And if that is not the solution, then it is our duty as a people, it is our duty as people who believe in freedom, who believe in the equality of all men, to do what we can to protect these peoples' right to decide their own future. And that, simply put, is the whole issue in Central America. And I am an optimist. Because if you look at the whole course of human history since we came out of the caves; the course of that history has been in the direction of greater freedom and dignity for the individual. Many tyrants have temporarily stopped that flow. None has ever stopped it permanently. And the medieval tyranny that is masquerading as modern Marxism will not escape from the inexorable tide of history. It is our job to help the tide of history. We must not be found wanting or no one knows what the consequences will be.

Document of Objectives Issued by the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the Central American Countries and the Contadora Group, Panama City, September 9, 1983 [97]

Twenty-One Points for Peace in Central America

Considering:

The situation prevailing in Central America, which is characterized by an atmosphere of tension that threatens security and peaceful coexistence in the region, and which requires, for its solution, observance of the principles of international law governing the actions of States, especially:

The self-determination of peoples;

Non-intervention;

The sovereign equality of States;

The peaceful settlement of disputes;

Refraining from the threat or use of force;

Respect for the territorial integrity of States;

Pluralism in its various manifestations;

Full support for democratic institutions;

The promotion of social justice;

International co-operation for development;

Respect for and promotion of human rights;

The prohibition of terrorism and subversion;

The desire to reconstruct the Central American homeland through progressive integration of its economic, legal and social institutions;

The need for economic co-operation among the States of Central America so as to make a fundamental contribution to the development of their peoples and the strengthening of their independence;

The undertaking to establish, promote or revitalize representative, democratic systems in all the countries of the region;

The unjust economic, social and political structures which exacerbate the conflicts in Central America;

The urgent need to put an end to the tensions and lay the foundations for understanding and solidarity among the countries of the area;

The arms race and the growing arms traffic in Central America, which aggravate political relations in the region and divert economic resources that could be used for development;

The presence of foreign advisers and other forms of foreign military interference in the zone;

The risks that the territory of Central American States may be used for the purpose of conducting military operations and pursuing policies of destabilization against others;

The need for concerted political efforts in order to encourage dialogue and understanding in Central America, avert the danger of a general spreading of the conflicts, and set in motion the machinery needed to ensure the peaceful coexistence and security of their peoples;

Declare their intention of achieving the following objectives:

To promote détente and put an end to situations of conflict in the area, refraining from taking any action that might jeopardize political confidence or prevent the achievement of peace, security and stability in the region;

To ensure strict compliance with the aforementioned principles of international law, whose violators will be held accountable;

To respect and ensure the exercise of human, political, civil, economic, social, religious and cultural rights;

To adopt measures conducive to the establishment and, where appropriate, improvement of democratic, representative and pluralistic systems that will guarantee effective popular participation in the decision-making process and ensure guarantee effective popular participation in the decision-making process and ensure that the various currents of opinion have free access to fair and regular elections based on the full observance of citizens' rights;

To promote national reconciliation efforts wherever deep divisions have taken place within society, with a view to fostering participation in democratic political processes in accordance with the law;

To create political conditions intended to ensure the international security, integrity and sovereignty of the States of the region;

To stop the arms race in all its forms and begin negotiations for the control and reduction of current stocks of weapons and on the number of armed troops;

To prevent the installation on their territory of foreign military bases or any other type of foreign military interference;

To conclude agreements to reduce the presence of foreign military advisers and other foreign elements involved in military and security activities, with a view to their elimination;

To establish internal control machinery to prevent the traffic in arms from the territory of any country in the region to the territory of another;

To eliminate the traffic in arms, whether within the region or from outside it, intended for persons, organizations or groups seeking to destabilize the Governments of Central American countries;

To prevent the use of their own territory by persons, organizations or groups seeking to destabilize the Governments of Central American countries and to refuse to provide them with or permit them to receive military or logistical support;

To refrain from inciting or supporting acts of terrorism, subversion or sabotage in the countries in the area;

To establish and co-ordinate direct communication systems with a view to preventing or, where appropriate, settling incidents between States of the region;

To continue humanitarian aid aimed at helping Central American refugees who have been displaced from their countries of origin, and to create suitable conditions for the voluntary repatriation of such refugees, in consultation with or with the co-operation of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and other international agencies deemed appropriate;

To undertake economic and social development programmes with the aim of promoting well being and an equitable distribution of wealth;

To revitalize and restore economic integration machinery in order to attain sustained development on the basis of solidarity and mutual advantage;

To negotiate the provision of external monetary resources which will provide additional means of financing the resumption of intra-regional trade, meet the serious balance-of-payments problems, attract funds for working capital, support programmes to extend and restructure production systems and promote medium- and long-term investment projects;

To negotiate better and broader access to international markets in order to increase the volume of trade between the countries of Central America and the rest of the world, particularly the industrialized countries; by means of a revision of trade practices, the elimination of tariff and other barriers, and the achievement of price stability at a profitable and fair level for the products exported by the countries of the region;

To establish technical co-operation machinery for the planning, programming and implementation of multi-sectoral investment and trade promotion projects.

The Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the Central American countries, with the participation of the countries in the Contadora Group, have begun negotiations with the aim of preparing for the conclusion of the agreements and the establishment of the machinery necessary to formalize and develop the objectives contained in this document, and to bring about the establishment of appropriate verification and monitoring systems. To that end, account will be taken of the initiatives put forward at the meetings convened by the Contadora Group.

Document 637

Address by the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy (Iklé) Before the Baltimore Council on Foreign Relations, Baltimore, September 12, 1983 [98]

"We Seek Victory for the Forces of Democracy"

I am delighted to be here this evening and to have the opportunity to speak to you.

Central America is closer to Baltimore than is California—in terms of geographic distance, that is. But the intellectual distance between here and Central America is enormous. Most of the American people are not well informed about Central America; many are misinformed; and some are outright disdainful about the cultural and social importance of this region.

You all have an obligation to remedy this situation, so that you and your representatives in Congress can engage in constructive support—or constructive criticism—of the administration's policy.

To begin with, you should know that the President's policy for Central America has not yet been given a chance to work: the blocking votes in Congress have denied the President the means to succeed.

Indeed, members of Congress have involved themselves in the management of U.S. policy for Central America more than for any other region of the world.

—While Congress has quickly and easily approved some $4½ billion in Security Assistance for nations in the Mediterranean region, it slashed nearly in half the much smaller allocation for nations in the Caribbean region—so much closer to home.

—While Congress has been generally supportive of the deployment of some 1,200 U.S. Marines to Lebanon, it fought fiercely to limit the number of U.S. trainers in El Salvador to 55.

—While Congress has not objected to large military exercises in the faraway Indian Ocean region, its many members have heavily criticized the recent military exercises in the nearby Caribbean region.

—While Congress has for a long time supported Radio Free Europe, the fine radio program that brings the truth to the people of Eastern Europe, members of Congress have delayed for 2 years President Reagan's request for Radio Marti, a new radio station that would bring the truth to the people in Cuba.

As we consult with members of Congress on these issues, we are often told that, you, their constitutents, are pressing such positions on them. But as we review the public opinion polls, we discover an extraordinary lack of information. For example, in a recent New York Times /CBS poll, only 8 percent of the respondents knew, both for El Salvador and Nicaragua, whether the United States was supporting the government or the insurgents.

You must help us overcome not only a lack of information, but also a great deal of misinformation. This misinformation is not accidental; it is the result of a well-organized and well orchestrated effort. A fabric of fiction has been tightly woven to conceal the essential facts. Let me review with you some of these fictions:

Fiction has it that U.S. influence in Central and Latin America has prevented democratic development, that the spread of Leninist regimes is the tide of history, a natural process of social reform that we should not oppose. The fact is that the trend toward democratization has continued: among the 32 independent states of Latin America and the Caribbean, 17 are now democratic. Since 1978, five countries have made a peaceful transition from military regimes to elected democratic governments. It is the much criticized military regimes that are often transformed into a democracy; but there has never yet been a Marxist-Leninist regime that was succeeded by democracy.

Another bit of fiction: that the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua would have developed into a pluralistic democracy, had it not been for the U.S. intervention. The fact is that the Sandinistas, only a few weeks after they came into power, reneged on their promise for early elections, began to attack the democratic trade unions, and invited Cuban military and security personnel in steadily growing numbers. Yet, during the first 18 months of the Sandinista regime, the United States provided more than $120 million in direct aid and endorsed over $220 million in Inter-American Development Bank aid—more than the previous Somoza regime in Nicaragua had received from the United States in 20 years! Clearly, it was not U.S. interference that drove the Sandinistas to link up with Fidel Castro—unless economic aid is regarded as "interference."

Another piece of fiction is the charge that the Reagan administration is "militarizing" the problems of Central America and is bringing the East-West conflict to the region. Well, the East is already here. The Soviets are giving ten times as much military assistance to Cuba and Nicaragua as we are providing to all of Latin America. And Soviet military advisors in Cuba and Nicaragua outnumber U.S. military advisors in the Caribbean region 20 to 1.

Since Congress is so deeply involved in our day-to-day policy toward Central America, our key objectives need to be clear to the American people. Moreover, Congress must share with the administration an understanding of our basic strategy.

On one thing we can all agree: We do not want the United States to fail. We must succeed.

But what is it we would like to see happen, and what do we want to prevent? We have wide agreement, I believe, that the United States favors a continuation and strengthening of the trend toward open, genuine democracy. And we favor social and economic betterment for the people in Central America, a region so close to us.

Equally important is what we want to prevent. We want to prevent the expansion of totalitarian regimes—particularly Leninist ones, since they will import Stalinist police systems, bring in Soviet arms, and even invite Soviet military bases. There are two more reasons why Leninist regimes are particularly dangerous: once entrenched, they tend to become irreversible, and they usually seek to export their totalitarianism to other nations.

Given these objectives, what should be our strategy?

First, we want to help build the road toward democracy and economic development. In the end, the people in each country will have to make their own choices. They can succeed only through their own dedicated effort. But we can help, through advice and influence, by facilitating trade, and by giving aid. The Caribbean Basin Initiative of the Reagan administration (to which Congress has now agreed) is right on target. So are our efforts in El Salvador in behalf of elections and for improvements in the judicial system.

Also, we are using diplomacy to help the Government of El Salvador win over those who are willing to abandon violence and compete in elections, provided they can be assured of safe and fair participation. But we must not underestimate our adversaries. The hard core among the insurgents will never settle for a fair democratic process. We can no more negotiate an acceptable political solution with these people than the social democrats in revolutionary Russia could have talked Lenin into giving up totalitarian Bolshevism.

This leads us to the second requirement. As Secretary Shultz recently explained, the guerillas in El Salvador have used a "rule or ruin" strategy: they seek to destroy economic assets faster than our aid can restore them. You cannot have economic development in a nation, if guerilla forces keep blowing up bridges, power lines, school buildings, buses. . . . You have to defeat these "rule or ruin" forces militarily. This is the purpose for our military assistance.

Every so often the critics of the administration proclaim—with accusatory connotation—that we seek a "military solution" in El Salvador. If a "military solution" means putting primary emphasis on military assistance and military means, then it is more factual to accuse the Reagan administration of seeking an "economic solution," since three dollars out of four in the requested assistance programs are for economic aid.

What we seek to do is to open the doors to democracy and close the doors to violence. But we have to use military means against those who insist—till they have imposed their rule—on using violence.

Let me make this clear to you:

—We do not seek a military defeat for our friends.

—We do not seek a military stalemate.

—We seek victory for the forces of democracy.

And that victory has two components:

One: Defeating militarily those organized forces of violence that refuse to accept the democratic will of the people.

Two: establishing an adequate internal system for justice and personal security.

At this point, let us recall our first agreed principle: We do not want the United States to fail. Hence, we must a group in allocate sufficient means so that we can succeed [sic]. As long as Congress keeps crippling the President's military assistance program, we will have a policy always shy of success. We will remain locked into a protracted failure.

This the American people should not tolerate. If we are merely involved to fail, then we should not be involved at all.

The resources needed to succeed are small compared to our investment for security in other regions of the world. Once those in Congress who are now blocking adequate assistance give us the means to succeed, the capability and determination of the United States will become clear. This will make the Soviet Union more cautious, which in turn will help our success. On the other hand, if we signal that we are afraid of victory over the forces of violence, if we signal that we have opted for protracted failure, we will only encourage the Soviets to redouble their effort. We will be inviting ever-increasing difficulties.

The third requirement of U.S. strategy for Central America is least well understood. We should seek to prevent the partition of Central America, a division of this region into two spheres, one linked to the Soviet bloc and one linked to the United States. Such a partition would inexorably lead to a hostile confrontation of large military forces, a confrontation that could last for decades.

We can see how such a confrontation works, as we look at Cuba. During the 24 years of the Castro dictatorship, while the standard of living deteriorated and human rights were widely violated, Cuba built up a large military establishment. It has the second largest army in Latin America (second only to Brazil), it has some 200 MIG fighter aircraft, submarines, 6,000 to 8,000 Soviet advisors, and several Soviet intelligence installations. In addition, Castro has sent some 30 to 40 thousand troops abroad to provide the mercenary forces to protect the Soviet imperial outposts. As a result of the militarization of Cuba, our sealines to NATO are now seriously threatened.

The Sandinista regime in Nicaragua is determined to create a "second Cuba" in Central America. Ever since they seized power, the Sandinistas embarked on a major military buildup. Today, they have a much larger army than Somoza ever had, and they have expressed the intention to build the largest force in Central America. Nicaragua is building new military airfields, and is importing Soviet tanks, helicopters, armored vehicles, and other equipment.

This "second Cuba" in Nicaragua would be more dangerous than Castro's Cuba since it shares hard to defend borders with Honduras and Costa Rica. The Sandinistas have already started terrorist activities in both these countries. In addition, Nicaragua provides essential support for the insurgency in El Salvador.

Even after the insurgency in El Salvador has been brought under control, Nicaragua—if it continued on its present course—would be the bridgehead and arsenal for insurgency for Central America. And once the Sandinistas have acquired the military strength that they have long been planning for, they might well use that strength for direct attacks on their neighbors to help speed up the "revolution without frontiers" that they promised us.

At that time, the only way to help protect the democracies might be for the United States to place forward deployed forces in these countries, as in Korea or West Germany. Clearly, we must prevent such a partition of Central America.

In the Democrats' response to President Reagan's April 27 address on Central America to a Joint Session of Congress, Senator Dodd said: "We will oppose the establishment of Marxist states in Central America." [99] Yet, a majority in the House of Representatives has done exactly the opposite. It voted to oppose U.S. assistance to those who oppose the establishment of a Marxist state in Nicaragua. That is to say, a blocking majority in the House, in effect, voted to establish a sanctuary for the Sandinistas.

Congressional legislation to deny U.S. support to the democratic resistance forces in Nicaragua would turn Nicaragua into a sanctuary from which the nations of Central America could be safely attacked, but in which U.S.-supported forces could not operate. This would enable the promoters of totalitarianism—while being supplied and replenished by Cuba and the Soviet bloc—to attack neighboring countries indefinitely, and always with impunity. Hence, it would deprive the Marxist groups in El Salvador of any incentive to compromise. Indeed, if such legislation were passed, the Sandinistas and Cubans might well find it safe to increase their assistance to the insurgents in El Salvador and to step up the destabilization of Honduras and Costa Rica. This, after all, would be fully consistent with their presently declared objectives; and the guaranteed sanctuary would render such escalation almost risk-free.

The psychological impact from cutting off US assistance to the Nicaraguan resistance forces fighting for democracy in their native land would be severe. Such a cut off would signal throughout the region that the totalitarian Leninist forces represent the winning side. The democratic forces would have cause to despair. They would see that terrorist and insurgent attacks against them are being generously supported by Cuba and the Soviet bloc, and that these attacks could be conducted from safe havens that would be protected by the U.S. Congress, in effect, from all counterinterference. Conversely, the totalitarian Leninist force would know that as soon as they seize control of a country, they will be secure: Cuba and the Soviet bloc will help them maintain an efficient police machinery to repress the people; and should any group arise to fight for freedom, the U.S. Congress would have denied it all support.

Let me recapitulate.

Our basic objectives for Central America are clear: we want to strengthen democracy; we want to prevent in this hemisphere the expansion of totalitarian regimes, especially those linked to the Soviet Union.

To this end, we extend economic support and promote democratic development. But given forces of violence that will not accept the democratic will of the people, we also have to provide military assistance—enough to succeed. In addition, we must prevent consolidation of a Sandinista regime in Nicaragua that would become an arsenal for insurgency, a safe haven for the export of violence. If we cannot prevent that, we have to anticipate the partition of Central America. Such a development would then force us to man a new military frontline of the East-West conflict, right here on our continent.

To prevent such an outcome, the administration and Congress must work together with a strategy that can succeed.

"That Agreement Has Been Abrogated Many Times by the Soviet Union and Cuba"

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. President, I don't have to tell you how much we like you in Miami. You know about that.

There has always been talk about the Kennedy-Khrushchev understanding of 1963. [2] You yourself and Bill Casey and

The President made his remarks during a meeting with Hispanic, labor, and religious press in the Old Executive Office Building beginning at 11:33 a.m.

[2] The understanding developed out of a series of exchanges between the United States and the Soviet Union. See American Foreign Policy: Current Documents, 1962, pp. 399–473; ibid., 1963, pp. 243–254; and Department of State Bulletin, November 19, 1973, pp. 635–655.

Secretary Weinberger have said that the Russian officials have had this understanding throughout the years on the Cuban success of bringing offensive weapons into the islands.

What is your position? What are your feelings on this understanding? Should the United States live up to it?

THE PRESIDENT. I have been looking at that, and with all the things that are going on, we haven't been able to talk as much as we should about it. But I have to tell you, as far as I am concerned, that agreement has been abrogated many times by the Soviet Union and Cuba in the bringing in of what can only be considered offensive weapons, not defensive, there. And we'll get around to that.

We did try to open some talks when there seemed to be an indication coming from Cuba that there was a willingness for that. They got nowhere. So we are going to carry on with what we are doing.

Cuba and the Soviet Union

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. President, you commented to a Cuban-American colleague of mine in Miami regarding a secret tentative agreement and how you felt that the shipment of Soviet-Cuban arms might mean that the United States is not bound by a promise not to invade Cuba. [4] It stirred a lot of commotion in South Florida's Cuban-American community. They want to know more; if, in fact, this secret agreement is under review; if so, what are the implications, and are we going to get tougher with Castro now that the Soviets are on (inaudible) around the world?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, the statement that I made was based—that agreement is not, you know, in the form of some formal treaty or agreement. This was a series of letters exchanged between President Kennedy and the Castro regime.

To our knowledge, they have not brought back in nuclear weapons, which was part of it. We have felt, in a number of instances, the so-called agreement in this letter form is rather ambiguous on many points. I think what I was trying to say was that we believe that in spirit, certainly, that has been abrogated, and yet, it's very hard to pin it down as you would with a treaty and say: You've broken the treaty. We tried to establish communications with Mr. Castro quite some time ago when he had indicated that perhaps this should be done, and we got no place. And as far as we're concerned, we are going to continue there and the Soviet efforts to establish another Cuba on our mainland in Central America, and we're going to do that as we have been doing it in Central America.

Q. Mr. President, also, now that the Soviet regime is (inaudible) around the world, is it time for us to have on our doorstep, you know, violations of international rules with Cuba, can we get tougher, and regarding Central America, are we getting into a war to avoid a Communist takeover in Central America?

THE PRESIDENT. Now, you've asked a question that I really shouldn't answer. I don't see the necessity for the United States going to war in any place where we are, but as I once said in a press conference here, and some of the regular White House press corps tried to hang me out to dry on it, there are some things about which a President should never say never, and I just think things of this kind. But there is nothing in our plans that envisions a war for the United States. Our job is trying to prevent war wherever it may come in the world. And this is the reason for our military buildup, and it's the reason for our meeting in disarmament talks more than any other administration has ever had going at one time in our history.

So I can just say that we're going to continue on this line, and at any time that Castro—whose country is in dire straits, is an economic basket case—any time that he wants to take—make the moves to return to the community of American nations here in the Western Hemisphere, we'd be happy to sit down with him and work that out. But it begins with him coming out from under the wing of the Soviet Union.

Statement by President Reagan, October 5, 1983 [5]

"Friends Helping Friends"

Thank you very much. Thank you all and I say that, I think I can say that on behalf of the Vice President and myself. We're delighted to welcome all of you distinguished members of the diplomatic community, the Senators and Representatives and honored guests.

Today we celebrate the passage of legislation that I've held close to my heart for a long time. I know all of us wish it could have come sooner, but as I promised when some of you were here last December, the time is short and the needs are great. We're all Americans. Together we can be a mighty force for good. We can show the world that we conquer fear with faith, we overcome poverty with growth, and we counter violence with opportunity and freedom. And now we're making good on our promise. I'm proud to stand with you for this celebration on the long-awaited first stage of implementation of the Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act. Ours is a collective partnership for peace, prosperity and democracy in the Caribbean and in Central America—a partnership that's born of our shared vision that democracy is a God-given birthright and that faith, freedom and respect for the dignity of every citizen are the mainsprings of human progress.

From the very outset of our administration, we've never wav ed in our long-term goal to foster true stability and democracy. And to do so, we must work together to help improve the underlying conditions for economic development. Peace and security in the Caribbean Basin are in our vital interests. When our neighbors are in trouble, their troubles inevitably become ours. What these countries need most is the opportunity to produce and export their products at fair prices. That's what the Caribbean Basin Initiative is all about. It offers them open markets in the United States and initiatives to encourage investment and growth. Far from a handout, the proposal will help these countries help themselves. Trade, not aid, will mean more jobs for them and more jobs for us.

The CBI package proposed to the Congress in March of 1982 was designed by the governments and private sectors of the region's countries including those of Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands. It had three major elements—a supplemental appropriation of $350 million to provide emergency balance-of-payment support, the elimination for 12 years of nearly all of the remaining tariff barriers on Caribbean Basin country exports to the United States and tax incentives to promote new investment in the tourist industry. The $350 million supplemental appropriation received strong bipartisan support and was approved by the Congress in September of 1982. These monies have now been obligated allowing the importation of raw materials and capital goods to help get stalled economies in the region moving again.

Aid levels to the Caribbean Basin have doubled since 1980. The other CBI proposals were an innovative and unprecedented plan to integrate trade preferences, investment incentives, and other measures to encourage the economic and social development of the countries of the Caribbean Basin.

The President spoke in the Rose Garden of the White House beginning at 11:32 a.m. at a ceremony for the Caribbean Basin Initiative (P.L. 98-67, enacted August 5, 1983; 97 Stat. 369).

We seek to help countries implement free market strategies to stimulate their exports and strengthen their economies by expanding growth. Our original proposals evolved during many months of congressional consideration and the Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act was approved on July 28th. And the bill that I signed in August is true to our original intent. I'm convinced that over time it will contribute significantly to the economic stability and social tranquility of countries in the Caribbean Basin.

The first element of this legislation is a 12-year, one-way, free trade arrangement for all goods produced in the Caribbean Basin except textiles, apparel, canned tuna, leather goods, shoes, and petroleum products. This marks a step our country has never taken before. It's evidence of our commitment to the economic health of our good neighbors. The second element would allow U.S. citizens attending business conventions in the Caribbean Basin and Bermuda to deduct from their income taxes the reasonable expenses incurred. The Secretary of Treasury is here. He wants me to say "reasonable" again. (Laughter)

Now, these benefits will become all the more important as the vigorous expansion of our own economy brings about an increase in our imports and more and more business travel. As a footnote, you should know that we have 125 Peace Corps volunteers trained in small scale agribusiness. They're helping small farmers increase and diversify food production for their countries needs and for winter markets in Europe and North America. Fifty more American volunteers will receive this training within the next few weeks. I was especially gratified that support for the CBI was overwhelming and bipartisan. I offer special recognition to the many members of congress who strongly supported our proposals, guided them through the approval process, in particular, Congressman Dan Rostenkowski and Senator Bob Dole.

You know, almost a year ago, Dan Rostenkowski took members of his Ways and Means Committee to visit five countries and meet with the Prime Ministers of more than ten Caribbean countries. And it was on this trip that Dan coined a saying which was picked up by everyone in the Caribbean. "CBI," he said, "would be friends helping friends." (Applause)

In that spirit, I extend my appreciation to the governments and peoples of the Caribbean Basin countries themselves. They never tired in explaining why the CBI should be passed. They include the very effective spokesmen for both the region's private sectors and labor unions.

I also want to express my appreciation to David Rockefeller and his associates at the Council of the Americas and at Central American Action for their help in providing key business support for passage of this bill. And I pledge to you today that enactment of the landmark Caribbean Basin Economic Act will be followed by a vigorous implementation effort on the part of this administration.

Ambassador Brock will continue as Chairman of our Senior Interagency Task Force responsible for its policy and program development. I'm calling on the other Cabinet members who've contributed to the CBI's development to give Ambassador Brock by January 1st their proposals on how to make the CBI the most effective means of extending economic opportunity in the region.

The formal process of designation which the Congress has given me the responsibility to carry out has been with delegations visiting with all the potential beneficiaries. Those discussions have been conducted with the kind of mutual commitment to friendship and good will which has made us all so excited about the future of the region.

I'm optimistic that we will be extending the benefits of the program to virtually all the beneficiaries by the first of next year. [6] The economic and social development of the Caribbean Basin should be part of a collective effort by the international community. Even before my original announcement of the CBI, we held consultations with the governments of Canada, Mexico and Venezuela, as well as with our European allies and Japan. Colombia subsequently agreed to become a participant.

Enactment of the CBI should encourage other donor governments and appropriate international organizations to expand their assistance activities in the region. The problems of the Caribbean Basin region are deep-seated and reducing them will be a great challenge. But we can gain strength from our shared vision.

[6] Regarding extension of benefits to the countries of the Caribbean Basin, see the White House statement, December 1, 1983, Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, December 5, 1983, p. 1630; and the President's letter of December 29, 1983, ibid., January 2, 1984, pp. 1749–1750.

Nearly a century ago Jose Marti, a great citizen of the Caribbean and the Americas, warned that, "Mankind is composed of two sorts of men: those who love and create and those who hate and destroy." And Pope John Paul II has told us that, "Only love can build." With faith, wisdom, courage and love we can overcome injustice, hatred and oppression and build a better life together for all of the Americas.

I'm confident we will. I think back to an incident during my last trip to Central America. As I was beginning to speak in Costa Rica, suddenly I was loudly interrupted by a gentleman who was determined to make his own speech out there from the audience. I didn't know exactly what was going on, and I turned to the President of Costa Rica, asked him and he informed me that this was a Communist, a Marxist member of their congress, their legislature. And that he was determined to denounce us. And that's what he was doing. He was speaking in Spanish, so I didn't really know what he was saying. And, finally, it reached a point that he seemed to be going on and I was standing there and I realized I had a microphone and he didn't. So I just overrode him and pointed out to the audience what I knew about him, what I had been told about him. [7]

And what a tribute it was to their democracy, of which they are very proud, that he was allowed to say these things in that forum, and yet he would never be allowed to do what he was doing in any of the Communist countries. Well, the audience of more than 1,000 rose in a standing ovation. There was a lump in my throat; must have been one in his, because he sat down. (Laughter) I knew in my heart they weren't applauding me. They weren't even applauding the United States. They were applauding the principles, the ideals, and the dreams that we all share and which they, the brave Costa Rican people, have had the courage to live up to.

I have to tell you a little postscript there, that later the President told me that that Communist member of the legislature was the only member of the legislature that could afford to drive a Mercedes. (Laughter) But if the people of the Americas are given a free choice, they will all choose to be like Costa Rica, not Castro's Cuba. (Applause)

Only a counterfeit revolution builds walls to keep people in and employs armies of secret police to keep them quiet. The real revolution lives in the principle that government must rest on the consent of the governed. And this spirit of democracy and freedom of opportunity is the driving force behind the Caribbean Basin Initiative. We are building together a future of new hope and more opportunity. And I pledge the best efforts of our administration to carry this positive program forward, making it worthy of the ideals and dreams that gave it birth.

And now I'd like to ask Bill Brock to make a few remarks, and I thank you very much and God bless you all. Bill? (Applause)

Transcript of a Department of State Press Briefing, October 17, 1983 [8]

"The Only Way This Thing's Going To Work Is Everything Together"

STATE DEPARTMENT OFFICIAL. Good afternoon. The briefing is on background. It is attributable to a senior Department official. Although we announced that the topic is Central America, broadly speaking, in fact, we assume that the interest will be primarily Nicaragua, and that is I think what your briefer is principally prepared to talk with you about.

[8] Source: Department of State files. The briefing, which began at 3:45 p.m., was conducted on background by a senior Department of State official.

Unfortunately, we have been foreshortened by events over at the White House where the briefer has an appointment, so we are going to have to cut it off no later than 4:10. If you would try to stick to the more critical questions, and then if you have time, do some of the peripheral stuff, that would be helpful.

SENIOR STATE DEPARTMENT OFFICIAL. What I would like to do is, I've been recently, as you know, to Belize and Nicaragua. Prior to that I was at the United Nations and here where I met with a lot of not only Latin but European Government people. Also, I was in Ottawa for an annual trilateral Canadian/United States/British meeting on Latin America. I'd like to give you some of the impressions with which I came away from there.

First, I think to a certain degree, in the public perception, not only in Europe but in other parts of Latin America and South America, the bloom is coming off the rose of the Sandinista revolution. I think the Pope's visit—although that was quite a while back, the visit of the Pope there—didn't win any hearts and minds among the Catholic countries, I found.

Their U.N. move, when they went to inscribe the issue of [at] the United Nations so shortly after they had signed up and [with] the 21 points of the Contadoras, I think certainly upset the Contadora countries and, I think, confused a lot of the others—the continuation of the expropriation of private property, and the rest of it. That is an impression I gained from people from Europe and Latin America, but to a certain degree it spills over into Nicaragua.

I was in Nicaragua for 2 days, and let me just tell you some of the quick impressions I had. One is that the level of anti-Americanism generated by their press that is government-generated in either listening to their radio, watching their TV, or reading their newspapers was as high as anywhere I've seen.

I'm told by people who have been there on the scene that that is not a phenomena just recently, that it has been at a continual drumbeat.

The other interesting aspect was, there was a degree of militarism that I didn't really expect there. All their signs, which was not unusual in those kinds of societies, of great, big bill-board sizes [signs], had a militaristic aspect to them. It was more about arms and defense, pictures of guns and airplanes, in this aspect.

In chatting also with the people at the United Nations and especially the Central American countries, and in talking with the Nicaraguans while I was there, Ortega, and D'Escoto, what appears to be coming down is that the attitudes externally from Central America are changing toward them.

The attitude of their central American neighbors, the fear level against what their—I think their intentions there being Nicaraguans—has risen and to a certain degree is coming through to the Sandinistas, because they are getting a mentality that they are not part of the odd-man-out.

I, basically, delivered a message to them. I had 2 hours with Ortega and almost 2 hours with D'Escoto in addition to other meetings—their economic team, out in Montegalpa [Matagalpa] with coffee-growers; I met with opposition leaders; I met with the editors of La Prensa; I met with trade unionists; I met with their economic team.

The message I tried to leave basically was that which the President had outlined in the letter to the Contadoras, which was, "In order to achieve peace in the area, we think that certain things are important. One is that we try to keep this out of an East-West context; secondly, that we subscribe to the principle of nonintervention, which we think is something that is important within their area; and third, that an internal democratization is linked to the feeling of attitudes on the part of their neighbors; and fourth, of course, the Economic Development Aspect." That, basically, was the message I attempted to leave with them.

I had long sessions with them. They are very civil. They are obviously, I think, feeling the effects of a couple of things: one is, obviously, the pressures of their internal war; and secondly, also, as I have said, I think they have begun to come to the same assessment we have with regard to feelings the Europeans have and the rest of us—just kind of changing a bit.

But at that point I'll stop, and take your questions. See, it only took about 6 minutes or so.

Q. Could you discuss some reports which have been appearing that this administration had decided on a two-track policy toward Nicaragua: one the diplomatic, represented by your trip; the other military, in the sense of giving aid or advice to the anti-Sandinista forces in Nicaragua?

A. I think the President laid out his policy fairly well on the 27th [of April]. This one policy has got four tracks to it, or four elements to it. That's, basically, the one that we're following.

Q. What about the charges that there was U.S. involvement in some of the recent acts of sabotage, for example?

A. Those are charges that you hear on a variety of fronts. Our answer is basically the same.

Q. When you say that the United States subscribes to nonintervention, obviously you refer to Nicaragua's involvement in subversion or alleged subversion in other neighboring countries. But what about the intervention of American-supported forces in Nicaragua?

A. I think when we talk about nonintervention—I'll tell you something, I think this is a very important, critical element in this whole policy, and it's not so much the question of us and the Nicaraguans as it is as this deal evolves, you have to raise the comfort level of all of them; not just the Nicaraguans but of the Salvadorans, the Hondurans, the Guatemalans, the Costa Ricans, that nobody is going to fiddle in anybody else's yard. You just can't take it in one single direction, whether there is or isn't in Nicaragua, whether there is or isn't in El Salvador.

The fact of the matter is, they all feel that from one source or another somebody is messing in their backyard. In order to go about coming up with a peaceful solution, you have to raise that comfort level on the parts of all five of them.

Q. Are you suggesting that if the Nicaraguans desisted from what the United States alleges they're doing that the Contras also would be encouraged to desist in interfering in Nicaragua?

A. Obviously the Contras—the anti-Sandinistas as well as the guerrillas in El Salvador are forces that have to be reckoned with in any kind of peaceful solution. How they fit into the picture in a peaceful solution, one is just as important as the other.

Q. The 21-point Contadora proposal was signed, if I recall correctly, 5 or 6 weeks ago.

A. Not quite that long ago, but that's all right; it's about 2 weeks ago.

Q. Two weeks ago? At the Prime Ministers' level, it was 5 or 6 weeks ago. There was some encouragement at that time in this building, the fact that they signed it and they agreed not to intervene, and to move toward democracy and so forth.

What is the assessment now? Do they still subscribe to that or not?

A. No, they do. I think going back to that original assessment, you're correct. The fact that they did get the signature of five heads of state—you may recall they required later to get the heads of state in writing to agree to the 20 points. The fact that they did get five heads of state to agree to this statement of objectives, I think, was a significant event for the Contadora to achieve. What they've set up for themselves now is a process that is as much if not more of a challenge. And that is, one, flesh out in language, in either agreements or treaties, and, secondly, which I think is equally as important—and maybe more so important—is to build among themselves the confidence that they'll make these things stick. That's the elements that's going to make it go.

Q. Do I understand you—you just said that the guerrillas in El Salvador are also a force that have to be taken into account in any solution?

A. In any kind of democratization aspect, in any kind of peaceful solution that you have, you have to take into account the anti-Sandinistas; you have to take into account the guerrillas. Yes, that is correct.

Q. I say, in El Salvador as opposed to Nicaragua, could you elaborate?

A. No. What I'm saying is that you have to take both of them into consideration. This is why I keep getting back to my point. You can't zero in on just El Salvador, zero in on just Nicaragua.

There are two aspects of it. If you're going to build confidence in each other to get something done, then, you have to have the confidence that they won't be fiddling within your arena. And, obviously, you take into account all of the forces.

Q. What you described to us of their attitude seems to me that they are responding exactly as you cause them to respond. Where do we go from here?

A. I wouldn't characterize the answer directly to your question. I think what's happening is this: That as a result of a variety of things, which may be a subtle change in world opinion; it may be more challenges they're facing from within. It's causing them concern. They think about it. If they think about it, we're hopeful that they'll think about how do we go about getting a peaceful solution, and that's why in the conversations with them they would keep dwelling on their problem within Nicaragua. I would keep pointing out to them that the same problems they were talking about, their neighbors felt some of the same problems. So that there had to be a kind of across-the-board type of aspect.

Q. Other than sending the message, and seeing that they are hurting from actions that, in great part, are the decisions made in Washington, is there anything that you accomplished on this visit?

A. Yes. I think what we accomplished was—I personally got a good feel for, as much as you can get in 2 days but it's not my first trip to Nicaragua.

The second thing is, I think I was able to reiterate to them exactly what our thoughts on the matter were. It's not so much what we expect as it is the philosophy that you've got to deal with the whole regional thing which they made a significant change on July 19, when in their speech they said they recognize the regional aspect, and they followed it up by signing up on Contadora whatever the period of time it was.

We're trying to point out to them the necessity of not just dwelling on ills that they feel they have suffered as well [as] the ills of others.

Q. Two questions. The first one is that Ortega, after your visit, insisted again that he was willing to buy more weapons to defend themselves. And the second one, do you think that it's possible for the United States and for the Central American countries to (inaudible) to a peaceful solution with this Sandinista government?

A. Yes, I think it's possible. I think that it is possible that the points embodied in the 21 points of Contadora and embodied in the President's letter to the Contadora process is a possible thing. I'm under no illusions that it's an easy thing.

As I told you earlier, signing a Statement of Objectives on the Contadora 21 points was a significant event, if you take it on face value. But an even tougher event now is making it work. I think it's very tough, but, yes, I think it's a possibility. I'm under no illusions that it's going to be easy.

Q. What about the first question, about Ortega's new declaration about buying arms?

A. I think one can understand the situation under which he made that statement. He just had a significant part of his oil storage and receiving facility blown up. It's an understandable statement for him to make. I'm sure we didn't understand him to say he's going to buy less arms.

Q. On that precise point, while all the countries in the region have some turmoil, none of the countries has apparently been crippled economically to the extent that they have, like, 30 days of fuel and the possibility that no oil companies will flow, or will ship oil to their ports because of Contra activity.

Did they make the argument with respect to that point, that the United States could only expect them to ask for closer ties with the Soviet Union which could provide them with oil?

A. No, they make that point.

Q. They didn't raise that?

A. They didn't make that point. The other thing is this, too, the economic aspect of how the ravishes of war, which is in nobody's interest, 30-day supply of oil —how does that equate to 70 percent of your transportation system as exists in El Salvador? Either way, they're bad news for whoever is involved.

Q. At what point does the United States start abiding by the objectives of the Contadora Agreement, the 21 points about nonintervention in arms and advisers, and things?

A. I think if the five countries can arrive at agreement that they are satisfied with among themselves—not only signed a piece of paper, but they're comfortable with it—that we've gone a long, long way to satisfying ours which were embodied within those 21.

See, the question is this: You have a process proceeding. That process is among the Latin countries. That process must be allowed to proceed. As it goes and as it signs on to those 21 points, I think it alleviates a lot of people's fears—obviously, the ones within Central America—and I think if you look within those 21, I think you'll find that they embody most of what we're involved in.

Q. To be clear, then, once they start agreeing and abiding by them, then we will? Is that right?

A. No. You're not going to put the chicken before the egg or the cart before the horse. What I'm saying is that to get to the final product, everybody has to be involved.

Q. Did the topic come up about our allegations of their supporting the guerrillas in El Salvador? Did they say they were continuing to support them or would stop?

A. That topic was raised, and they didn't address it. They went on to other issues.

Q. Can I just ask for clarification of your last answer, the previous? How does 30 percent of the oil supply—how does that relate to—

A. Thirty days.

Q. Yes. How does that relate to 70 percent of the transportation?

A. What I'm saying is that—and maybe I didn't put it well—but what I'm saying is any war situation, a civil war, that results in busting down an infrastructure—in one case he said 30 days worth of oil. In the case of El Salvador, 70 percent of their transportation has been wiped out.

So I mean, any civil war aspect has those aspects that nobody is interested in seeing.

Q. Could you give us an example of a viable step that should be done, let's say by the Sandinistas, in order to lead to feasible agreement?

A. I think a viable step by not only the Sandinistas but also the Corps [Core] Four [9] as they're called is quick progression on the 21 points.

Q. Can I ask you a question about Grenada since . . . did not categorically rule our veering away a little bit from Central America? What is your impression of—

A. Wait a minute. It was Nicaragua, then Central America. But go ahead.

Q. He said significantly—

A. Go ahead. I give up.

Q. Do you interpret this—what has happened in Grenada over the past three or four days as a significant shift to the left?

A. I think that what may have happened or not happened in Grenada yet, to a certain degree that is unclear and something that we're not ready to comment on, even on background.

Q. Do I understand you correctly that you had some feeling that Nicaragua may now be ready to talk about a solution? You went down and presented the framework of a solution, and, if that's true, then did you set up a group to talk about it further? Did you do something to carry it on further?

A. I wouldn't necessarily characterize that they are ready to—I didn't come away with a feeling that they are ready to sign on the 21 points. But I also came away with a feeling that they don't like the status quo as is, and they would like to do something to change it. So, you know, it may grieve me to say so, but the result of my trip wasn't any breakthrough, nor was it a slam of the door in the face.

Q. I understand that. You're saying when they did sign on the 21 points 2 weeks ago, they weren't signing in good faith?

A. No, no. I didn't say that. I'm saying you take it on face value. I think that was a major step.

Q. But you don't think they're ready to negotiate on the basis of that 21 points?

A. No. I think that all the countries had difficulty signing different portions of that 21. I think the fact that you got all five to sign on was a significant step. I think a tougher step now is having agreed to a statement of objectives, which is nothing but broad principles, start to spell out, you know, how you do verification, what do you do about this one, what about democratization, and so on and so forth. I think that's going to be the real challenge.

Q. Are you optimistic about that?

A. Yes. We are proceeding on the assumption that they're going to proceed, and hopefully they'll arrive at something, but I'm not—I think you have to go into this thing with a realistic outlook, and that is that it's a complicated issue and negotiations of this type take a long time. There are internal matters, rivalries between the countries involved there that transcend anything that's going on now. It's not an easy deal.

Q. In a year and a half yours was the first trip—

A. In the year and a half, what?

Q. Yours was the first trip of an American official, and even then it was to deliver a message and not to negotiate. Are you ready on your part to negotiate?

A. Okay. I think I tried to explain it earlier, maybe I didn't make myself clear. Peace in Central America is going to come about—negotiations in Central America can come about. It's not just a question of the United States and Nicaragua. It's the question of the five countries among themselves, and, obviously, our interests too.

So you have to have all of those in there. So, no, we cannot go negotiate on behalf of the other countries. That's why you keep pushing this process.

Q. Salvadoran guerrillas have asked President Monge to arrange a meeting with Ambassador Stone.

A. Pardon?

Q. The Salvadoran guerrillas asked President Monge this weekend to arrange a meeting with Ambassador Stone. Is he going to meet with the guerrillas?

A. Ambassador Stone is still in Europe. He won't be back for a few days. We have not received any direct query on that, other than what we read in the press. So you got two hurdles there even before I can start to answer your question.

Q. Do you have any comments on the reports of contacts between Eden Pastora's group and the Cubans through Madrid? They've appeared in the Spanish-language press in recent days that—

A. Yes. I saw something to that. I didn't realize it was through Madrid, but still, whatever the thing may have been.

No. I got to imagine that—they didn't bring it up to me, but I would think that maybe the Sandinistas might wonder about it. But I have no comment on it.

Q. A few weeks ago—I don't remember when—I'm paraphrasing this—I believe the President said there would be no solution as long as the Sandinistas, this present government in Nicaragua, was in power. [10]

You seem to be saying that you believe that we can negotiate with them, that there could be a peaceful solution, and we could deal with the Sandinistas.

A. The President's policy leads towards that goal, and that makes the assumption of the existing government. I'm under no illusions as to how easy it is. Aside from all the facts I just gave you a minute ago, there may or may not be a mindset, an intransigence, on the part of the Sandinistas. What we're trying to do is plumb that thing and keep pushing and keep seeing what we can come up with.

Q. What would happen to the Contras under the 21 points as you interpret them? Are you asking the Nicaraguans to share power with them and in effect—

A. No, no. I don't think so, any more than we're saying that the guerrillas in El Salvador ought to share power with the Salvadoran Government.

If you take the statements of the Contras at face value, you will find, and I think that most of the things that they required to return to the revolution, etc., would be covered under the 21 points.

Q. But that means what? Free elections?

A. Yeah—well—

Q. Is there any prospect, now that you've gone down there, of a continuing dialog, at least your level, between Nicaragua and the United States? And what is the status of the original 8 points of April 1982, and the 13 points that came back from Nicaragua with respect to U.S.-Nicaraguan negotiations? [11] Are they finished?

A. For openers, they didn't bring up either the 8 or the 13 points, so—and you've caught me unawares because that was before watch, and I haven't read back that far. But they're probably embodied in these other points. As to the other question, yes, I'm prepared to meet with them. You know, that the first time I went down, or was going down there, they cancelled the trip. We already had the meeting set with Ortega, we already had set the meeting with D'Escoto the night before, and I was in Guatemala. They called and said, "Well, we don't think you can meet with these guys. Why don't you meet with somebody else?" And on that basis I didn't go.

After having come back here, they—U.S. Congressmen and others chastised them a bit for not doing that, including those that normally haven't voted with the administration on a lot of things.

So about 2 weeks after I was back—a week and a half back—I sent the message through our Ambassador saying, "I think it's in your interests and our interests, I would like to come back if you'd like to invite me." And they did, and they invited me for the specific dates which I was there. So I think it manifests on our part wanting to talk.

Q. Do you see a continuation? In other words, is there a possibility of a bilateral track as well as a—

A. You've missed the whole point I'm trying to tell you. The only way this thing's going to work is everything together.

Q. Thank you.

Letter From the Secretary of State (Shultz) to the Speaker of the House of Representatives (O'Neill), October 18, 1983 [12]

"The Administration's Policies To Help Bring Peace in Central America Are Now Beginning To Bear Fruit"

Last month the nine governments participating in the Contadora discussions agreed on a document of twenty-one objectives that could serve as the basis for a negotiated settlement in the region. The objectives include respect for democratic pluralism and reciprocal and verifiable commitments to end assistance to armed opposition forces.

I believe Nicaragua's acceptance of the document of objectives is an indication that the Sandinista regime may ultimately reconsider its pervasive intervention in the region. The growth of the Nicaraguan opposition, a manifestation of the unpopularity of four years of Sandinista repression at home and intervention abroad, is contributing importantly to this possibility.

I therefore believe it is essential that the House of Representatives not enact provisions in the Intelligence Authorization bill that would give the Sandinistas a unilateral assurance that the United States will withhold support from the Nicaraguan resistance movement. [13] In my judgment, such an action would virtually destroy the prospect that Nicaragua may agree to reciprocal and verifiable agreements to end assistance to all guerrilla forces operating in this region.

[12] Source: Department of State Bulletin, January 1984, p. 85. An identical letter was sent to House Minority Leader Robert H. Michel.

[13] On October 20, 1983, the House passed H.R. 2968 which, inter alia, limited covert support for military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua and expressed findings of Congress with respect to Nicaragua. The Senate approved the measure on November 3, and it was signed by President Reagan, December 9, 1983, as P.L. 98-215; for text of relevant sections, see document 651.

The Administration's policies to help bring peace in Central America are now beginning to bear fruit. I urge the House not to impose restrictions on this policy and thereby undermine the cause of peace and democracy that we all support.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE P. SHULTZ

Section 101(b)(2) of Public Law 98–151, Approved November 14, 1983 (Extracts) [14]

Congressional Requirements on Aid to El Salvador and Haiti

. . . . . .

Not more than 70 percent of the amount made available for the fiscal year 1984 for military assistance for El Salvador under chapters 2 and 5 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and under the Arms Export Control Act may be expended until—

(1) Salvadoran authorities have substantially concluded all investigative actions in the case of the National Guardsmen charged with murder in the deaths of the four United States churchwomen in December 1980 that were set forth in communications from the Department of State (including the letters dated July 8 and September 23, 1983); and

(2) Salvadoran authorities have brought the accused to trial and have obtained a verdict.

Not more than 90 percent of the amount made available for the fiscal year 1984 for military assistance for El Salvador under chapters 2 and 5 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and under the Arms Export Control Act may be expended until the President has determined and certified to the Congress that—

(1) the Government of El Salvador has not taken any action which would alter, suspend, or terminate the land reform program for phase I or phase III promulgated under Decree 154 (dated March 5, 1980) or Decree 207 (dated April 28, 1980) in a manner detrimental to the rights of the beneficiaries or the potential beneficiaries under those decrees; and

(2) the Government of El Salvador continues to make documented progress on implementing the land reform program.

. . . . . .

It is the sense of the Congress that for the fiscal year 1984 up to $24,000,000 of the funds available to carry out chapter 1 of part I of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, and up to $10,000,000 of the funds available to carry out chapter 4 of part II of such Act, should be made available for development assistance for Haiti, subject to the limitation contained in the third paragraph of this heading.

To the maximum extent practicable, assistance for Haiti under chapter 1 of part I and under chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 should be provided through private and voluntary organizations.

Funds available for fiscal year 1984 to carry out chapter 1 of part I or chapter 2, 4, or 5 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 may be obligated for Haiti, and credits may be extended and guarantees may be issued under the Arms Export Control Act for Haiti, only if the President determines that the Government of Haiti—

(1) is continuing to cooperate with the United States in halting illegal emigration to the United States from Haiti;

(2) is cooperating fully in implementing United States development, food, and other economic assistance programs in Haiti (including programs for prior fiscal years); and

(3) is making a concerted and significant effort to improve the human rights situation in Haiti by implementing the political reforms which are essential to the development of democracy in Haiti, including the establishment of political parties, free elections, and freedom of the press.

Six months after the date of enactment of this section, the President shall report to the Congress on the extent to which the actions of the Government of Haiti are consistent with each numbered provision contained in the third paragraph of this heading.

Notwithstanding the limitations of section 660 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, funds made available under such Act for the fiscal year 1984 may be used for programs with Haiti, which shall be consistent with prevailing United States refugee policies, to assist in halting significant illegal emigration from Haiti to the United States.

Note From the Foreign Ministers of the Contadora Group to the General Assembly of the Organization of American States, Undated [15]

Peace Efforts of the Contadora Group

On the occasion of the thirteenth regular session of the General Assembly of the Organization of American States, we the Foreign Ministers of Colombia, Mexico, Panama and Venezuela deem it appropriate to inform this meeting of American Foreign Ministers of the efforts made by the Contadora Group toward pacification in Central America.

At our first meeting, held on January 8 and 9 on Contadora Island, we emphasized the need to strengthen the Latin American dialogue as an effective way of dealing with the political, economic, and social problems that are jeopardizing peace, democracy, stability, and development of the peoples of the hemisphere. Also at that meeting we issued an appeal to all the countries of the Central American area to use dialogue and negotiation to reduce tensions and lay the foundations of an enduring climate of peaceful coexistence and mutual respect among the states, based on the principles of nonintervention and self-determination of peoples. [16]

We Foreign Ministers meeting there, in expressing our deep concern about foreign interference in the Central American crisis, observed that it would be highly undesirable to include the conflicts of the area within the context of the East-West confrontation. We also reaffirmed the obligation of the states not to resort to the threat or use of force in international relations and to refrain from acts that might worsen the situation by creating the danger of a widespread conflict encompassing all the states of the region.

For the purpose of attaining those objectives, dialogue and negotiation between the States involved have been encouraged for it is they that should make the primary effort on behalf of peace in the region. The Contadora Group has proposed facilitating understanding and political conciliation among the Central American countries, convinced that a regional solution can prevent a worsening of the conflicts and smooth the way toward pacification of the area.

The Foreign Ministers of the Contadora Group have met together periodically and on four occasions have met with their Costa Rican, Salvadoran, Guatemalan, Honduran, and Nicaraguan counterparts. Furthermore, they have visited those countries to hold talks with all the Heads of state. The first three meetings of the Contadora Group with the Central American Foreign Ministers were held on April 20–21, May 23–30, and July 28–30, 1983, respectively. Those meetings enabled us to make some progress in defining an agenda covering matters of concern to each Central American country, and also to consider procedures, approaches, and possible ways of solving specific issues. At all of them, the central objective was to create a climate of confidence for initiating substantive negotiations on each of the issues in dispute.

In view of the worsening of the conflicts in Central America, the rapid deterioration of the regional situation, the escalation of violence, the progressive increase in tensions, border incidents, and the threat of an outbreak of hostilities that could become widespread, the presidents of the countries of the Contadora Group decided to meet on July 16 and 17 in Cancún, Mexico. At that meeting, they issued the Declaration of Cancún on Peace in Central America, which, for the first time, delineated a set of specific commitments that, if adopted, would ensure peaceful coexistence in the area.

On that same occasion, the Heads of state addressed the chief executives of the Central American countries, Cuba, and the United States; the Secretaries General of the United Nations and the Organization of American States; and the Chairman of the Permanent Council of our regional Organization, for the purpose of seeking their support for the peace-making efforts of the Group in Central America.

As a result of the negotiations undertaken on the basis of the Declaration of Cancún, and taking into account the contribution of the Central American countries, the Foreign Ministers made significant progress at their fourth joint meeting, held in Panama on September 7, 8, and 9—particularly with respect to the drawing up the Document of Objectives, which contains 21 basic points for the pacification of Central America. That document, adopted by the Foreign Ministers of the region, was subsequently approved by all the Central American Heads of state.

The Document of Objectives comprises a set of principles and fundamental commitments for dealing with the most serious problems of the area and for achieving peace, security, the necessary cooperation for economic and social development, and the strengthening of democratic institutions in Central America. This is the first concrete political understanding that, with the backing of the Contadora Group, has been adopted by Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua.

In order to further define the legal instruments and control and inspection arrangements for ensuring fulfillment of the obligations arising from the Document of Objectives, the Foreign Ministers of the countries of the Contadora Group met in Panama on October 21 and 22. The legal instruments prepared at that meeting will be examined during the fifth joint meeting of Foreign Ministers.

At present, the fundamental purpose of the efforts of the Contadora Group is to obtain the conclusion of agreements that specify and formalize the commitments undertaken, and effectively ensure peace, security, cooperation for development, and strengthening of democratic institutions in the region. We believe that the negotiation process can reach a successful conclusion in the near future. We urge the Central American countries to expedite and increase their efforts toward that end, and we also urge those states with interests in and ties to the region to cooperate in the achievement of our objective of peace.

Address by the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy (Iklé) Before the Dallas World Affairs Council, Dallas, November 16, 1983 [17]

The Future of Democracy in Central America

Here in Dallas, where El Salvador is no farther away than Washington, I do not have to labor [belabor] the importance of Central America.

Not every American, however, seems to understand how vital Central America and the Caribbean are to the welfare and security of our country. On election day a week ago, a majority of voters in three cities—San Francisco, Seattle, and Boulder, Colorado—approved resolutions that asked the President, in essence, to abandon Central America to the risk of conquest by Soviet- and Cuban-supported forces.

[17] Source: Department of Defense files.

To believe that we can simply walk away from the problems of Central America means to forget our long and open border toward the South. It means to ignore the important cultural, social and economic ties that bind the United States to the region and the economic interests that unite us. To abandon Central America means to accept a growing Soviet military presence in our hemisphere—the threat of which has been underlined by the continuing Soviet arms buildup in Cuba and Nicaragua and by the beginnings of a startling new buildup recently revealed on Grenada.

But more troublesome would be the social and moral implications of our abandoning Central America. As we do with Europe, our nation enjoys an extensive and many-sided relationship with the people in the region. Hence, the fate of human rights, of economic betterment, and of democracy in the Caribbean region is intertwined with the fate of our own nation. To advance these objectives, we must help prevent the spread of totalitarian regimes. Once such regimes are entrenched, it will be so much harder, perhaps impossible, for us to further the cause of human rights. Ask yourselves what the United States can accomplish today for human rights in Cuba or North Korea. What can we do once we face such regimes?

Similarly, the hopes for economic development in the region would be set back by the further spread of communist regimes. Cuba, before Castro took over, enjoyed the third highest per capita income in Latin America; today, after 25 years of Communist mismanagement, it is near the bottom.

In World War II, at great cost, we fought against Fascist dictatorships in Europe and helped restore democracy from Norway to Italy. In the late 1940's, under the Truman Doctrine, we prevented the installation of Stalinist dictatorships in Greece and Turkey. In 1950, again at great cost, we intervened with combat forces in Korea so that Kim Il Sung could not impose his cruel dictatorship on the people of South Korea. Shouldn't we care deeply whether or not democracy or dictatorship will prevail in a region so much closer to us?

Today, helping to preserve a future for democracy in Central America makes much smaller demands on us than did these past efforts in far more distant places. Today, no need for US combat forces exists; there are no intentions, no requirements, for American soldiers to get involved in fighting. The needs today are economic assistance, continued support for democratic development and human rights, and adequate military assistance for these positive developments to prevail. The continued, patient, but persistent pressure for human rights and democracy is essential to put a stop to the internal violence. Equally essential is enough military assistance so that countries struggling to achieve or protect democracy can bring an end to the violence supported by outside Communist countries, such as Cuba and the USSR.

President Reagan is determined to pursue all opportunities for negotiation. As you know, the administration has an active diplomatic effort under way to help restore and preserve the conditions for democracy. It is to be hoped that all of those who are willing to let the people decide their own future can be won over to participate in the democratic process. This is the best way to bring the violence to an end. But we must face up to the fact that some of those who are bent on destroying democracy in the Caribbean area are people of deep convictions. These people, we can no more win over through negotiation, than Neville Chamberlain could negotiate with Hitler to save Czechoslovakia, or President Carter could negotiate with Brezhnev to save Afghanistan.

As long as the Soviet Union, Cuba, and the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua can provide arms, terrorist training, and other support for a continued assault against democratic development, the social and political situation in Central America can scarcely improve. Our economic aid would be wasted, if this outside intervention could continue to blow up bridges, burn buses, and destroy power lines.

We are all agreed that in places like El Salvador, while opposing terrorism of the extreme left, more must be done against the death squads of the violent right. The Reagan administration is making a concerted effort on this issue. Last week I visited several countries in Central America, and my main purpose in El Salvador and Guatemala was to press for improvement in human rights. The Communist guerrillas in El Salvador, of course, benefit from the human rights violations that can be blamed on the violent right. I was not surprised, therefore, to learn in El Salvador last week that the death squads of the violent right and the death squads of the guerrillas fight, not each other, but the democratic center and the government that seeks to hold fair and open elections. This means that the violent extremists on both sides are in practice working together. It has happened before in this century that fascists act as tools and accomplices of totalitarian Communist forces. If we want to help democracy and human rights, both must be defeated.

Our concern for human rights would be hypocritical if we remained oblivious to the actions of the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua: the persecution of the Catholic Church, the razing of the Miskito Indian villages, the building-up of a repressive Stalinist police state, and—above all—the exporting of terrorism into democratic Costa Rica and Honduras.

Perhaps the people in this country who want us to wash our hands of Central America see all the nations there as military dictatorships. Last week I visited two genuine democracies, Honduras and Costa Rica. Costa Rica has been a true democracy for a long time. It does not even have an army, only a tiny militia and a small civil guard. But today in Costa Rica and Honduras the democratic governments and the people are deeply worried about the threat from Nicaragua, where a massive military buildup grows apace with the Stalinization of the country.

I believe that most Americans are not prepared to let democracy in Honduras and Costa Rica be destroyed. What would our commitments mean—to Israel, to Norway, or to any other ally—if such nations as Honduras and Costa Rica, democratic allies in our own hemisphere, could not count on our support against the threat from their totalitarian neighbor?

If we act now with resolution and foresight, the costs will be modest. Compared to the security assistance that we are providing to our allies in the Mediterranean region, the assistance now required for the Caribbean region is very small. Congress has quickly and easily approved some four and a half billion dollars in security assistance to nations in the Mediterranean region. Yet, it has slashed back the President's request for the much closer Caribbean region, though the amounts involved were only one-twentieth as much.

Let us not make the mistake of too little and too late. If we calibrate our support at a level so low that we are bound to be always short of success, we ask for defeat in the long run. Today, a comparatively small amount of assistance can make it possible to achieve peace and democracy. But if we deny our friends the means to defend themselves while the soviet bloc pumps ten times more military aid into Cuba and Nicaragua than we provide to the whole region, the enemies of democracy are bound to win.

If we accept a protracted stalemate now, we will have a heavy price to pay a few years hence. The Sandinistas will continue the massive military build-up in accordance with the plans they have long revealed. Today, Sandinista forces already number some 25,000 men in active and 50,000 in reserve forces, and 36 new military bases have been built in Nicaragua since July 1979. By contrast, democratic Honduras has only 14,000 men in the armed forces. And remember Costa Rica has practically no army at all. Thus, in a few years hence we would, in effect, have a "second North Korea" in the middle of Central America. At that point, we would either have to abandon allies that are genuine democracies, or we would have to back them up in a military East–West confrontation much like on the Korean peninsula. Such a bleak choice can and must be avoided.

The Cuban Challenge to the Hemisphere

In a conference on U.S. sanctions it seems desirable to step back for a moment from consideration of programs and procedures and to reflect on the broader policy aspects of our relations with the affected countries. I have been asked to do that with respect to Cuba.

It has been the policy of the United States for more than 20 years to deny to Cuba the trade and credit of its natural market. This policy has been questioned from time to time, and efforts have been made to moderate Cuban behavior through holding out the prospect of normalized relations with the United States. Yet, the policy remains in effect, and Cuban behavior remains antagonistic to our national interests.

The rationale for U.S. policy toward Cuba is not merely ideological. The United States enjoys normal relations with many other nations which declare themselves to be Marxist-Leninist. We engage in trade with the Soviet Union, Cuba's ally and benefactor, although on a limited basis and under significant controls. Why then have we tried to isolate Cuba within the Western Hemisphere—kept it at arms' length and denied it the legitimacy that would be implicit in more normal relations? And is it wise for us to maintain such a policy at a time when diplomatic efforts are being made to reduce the heightened tensions in Central America, where Cuba has played such an active role? Unfortunately, the facts of Cuban behavior demonstrate that our embargo policy has been and remains a correct and necessary instrument for containing the real challenge to the hemisphere which Cuba represents.

The Cuban challenge, far from being one of ideas, is one of unacceptable actions—the export of armed violence and military collaboration with the Soviet Union. The Cuban constitution defines a doctrine of "internationalism" that includes a right and duty to "help the peoples that struggle for their liberation" and recognizes "the legitimacy of wars of national liberation." Cuba's documented active involvement in the counseling, supplying and training of armed insurgents bent on overthrowing the governments of many countries in the Western Hemisphere amply demonstrates that Cuba's internationalism is not confined to moral or political support of revolutionary movements.

For its first 10 years in power, the Communist government in Havana attempted to replicate its revolution elsewhere in the hemisphere—in Venezuela, Colombia, Guatemala, Peru, and Bolivia. This unabashed policy of intervention led to Cuba's exclusion from active participation in the OAS and to the imposition of sanctions under the Rio Treaty.[19] Following the death of Che Guevera in 1967, Cuba's active support of hemispheric insurgencies appeared to diminish and many Latin American governments established diplomatic and trade relations with Cuba. In 1975 the OAS sanctions were lifted;[20] in 1978 Cuba resumed its program of support for subversion, concentrating on the Caribbean Basin.

Today, Cuba has 8,000 personnel in Nicaragua, 2,000 of them from its security forces. In Nicaragua we are seeing a repetition of the example set by Fidel Castro when he came to power in Cuba. Under Cuban tutelage an inner core, the Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN), is consolidating political power at the expense of the democratic forces who joined with the Sandinistas in achieving the overthrow of the Somoza regime. The Sandinistas have come to dominate the army (by far the largest in the region), the internal security apparatus, trade unions, professional organizations, the media and the ministries of government. Opponents are harassed and repressed.

With a secure foothold in Nicaragua, Cuba has been able to spread its efforts to the neighboring countries in Central America. The guerrillas in El Salvador, united in a common front at a 1979 meeting in Havana, maintain their headquarters in Managua. Terrorists and guerrillas, not only from El Salvador, but also from Guatemala, Honduras, and Costa Rica, travel to Nicaragua and from Nicaragua to Cuba for training and indoctrination. And Cuba serves as a source of arms and matériel, providing important leverage and control over insurgents throughout the region.

Cuba's support of armed violence in the Western Hemisphere has injured its standing with other American States. Colombia severed diplomatic relations in March 1981 after Cuban leaders acknowledged that they trained M–19 guerrillas who attempted the violent overthrow of the Colombian Government. Incidentally, it is in connection with the M–19 movement that Cuba utilized arms smugglers who were also active in the illicit drug trade, providing them with safe passage through Cuban waters and thereby facilitating their efforts to get their narcotics into the United States. More recently, we have seen the Government of Suriname throw off the Cuban embrace after Suriname's leaders had seen the fate of Maurice Bishop at the hands of his own Cuban-trained and Cuban-oriented party colleagues in Grenada.

Cuba's actions in dominating the power structure in Grenada are just now coming to light as we begin to analyze the numerous documents recovered by U.S. forces. We expect these documents to be a source of substantial new information about Cuban plans and actions elsewhere in the Caribbean. One facet of the Cuban role is made clear by the secret treaty between Grenada and the Soviet Union. That treaty, the text of which was made public on November 4, provided for the clandestine delivery of vast quantities of arms, far in excess of the needs of the tiny island nation of Grenada. These deliveries were to be made through Cuba. The treaty was signed in Havana.

The Cuban role in the implementation of the USSR–Grenada arms treaty exemplifies how Cuba functions as a Soviet surrogate. Cuba is, of course, politically aligned with the Soviet Union. Notwithstanding its pretensions to leadership in the Nonaligned Movement, Cuba's voting record in the United Nations is closer to that of the Soviet Union than those of several Eastern European states. This political alignment has been heightened by economic dependency. Cuba's centrally planned, nonmarket economy is stagnant. It depends on sugar for more than 80 percent of its export earnings. Cuba is the world's largest exporter of sugar, a commodity for which supply has increased faster than demand and prices are likely to remain depressed for some time. Consequently, Cuba is burdened with a debt of over $3 billion in hard currency and an estimated $7 billion in soft currencies. It depends upon enormous subsidies from the Soviet Union—more than $4 billion in economic assistance last year alone. Unemployment is growing and is only partially relieved by the dispatch of over 70,000 Cuban citizens to duty abroad (more than half of them in the Armed Forces).

A relaxation of the U.S. embargo would not bring immediate and significant relief to the ailing Cuban economy. Wide-ranging policy reforms and structural adjustments would be needed to achieve significant growth. However, access to foreign exchange would help relieve an immediate cash shortage and, over time, access to the relatively enormous U.S. market could be of substantial benefit. The trouble is that while Cuba continues in its policy of support for armed insurgencies in this hemisphere and as surrogate for the Soviet Union in military adventures around the globe it remains in our interest to avoid strengthening the Cuban economy or diminishing the cost to the Soviet Union of preventing further economic decline.

In the past, we have sought to elicit changes in Cuban behavior through the offer of liberalization in our economic relations. Both the Ford and Carter administrations sought to improve relations. But their efforts foundered on renewed Cuban manifestations of its doctrine of internationalism in support of armed revolution. Cuba was willing to see the United States relax its controls on trade and financial transactions, but it has been unwilling to modify its own actions that had caused those controls to be imposed.

While the fundamental issue of Cuban adherence to its revolutionary brand of the doctrine of internationalism is likely to remain with us for some time, I would not want to leave you with the misleading impression that U.S. policy is to reject out of hand the possibility of dialogue to resolve those bilateral issues that do not depend upon a basic change in Cuba's policies. For example, we offered to discuss the problem of Cuban interference with U.S. radio broadcasting. And we have offered to renew the issuance of visas in Cuba if Cuba would accept the return of those included in the Mariel exodus who have been found ineligible for admission to the United States under our immigration laws. Unfortunately, Cuba has not responded positively to either of these initiatives.

As to the future, there remains the possibility that in time economic constraints will contribute to changes in Cuban-Soviet military collaboration and to moderation in Cuba's export of armed violence. If so, we would have good reason to consider once again modifications in our embargo policy. Until Cuba modifies its actions, however, it remains a threat to democracy and security in the hemisphere and our policy must seek to restrain and diminish this threat.

Resolution Adopted by the OAS General Assembly, November 18, 1983 [21]

Peace Efforts in Central America

The General Assembly,

Having seen the communication presented by the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of Colombia, Mexico, Panama, and Venezuela to this Assembly on the peace efforts they are making in Central America; [22]

Noting the Declaration signed by the Presidents of Colombia, Mexico, Panama, and Venezuela at Cancún, Mexico, on July 17, 1983;

Commending the Document of Objectives adopted last September under the auspices of the Contadora Group, by Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua;

Cognizant that the Document of Objectives contains a set of principles for addressing the most serious problems of the area and achieving peace, security, and the cooperation needed for the region's economic and social development;

Considering that the Contadora Group is engaged in a worthy effort aimed at achieving peaceful relations in the region, based on the creation and strengthening of a climate of international security in keeping with the principles established in international law, of democratic and pluralistic institutions, and of sustained economic and social development activities,

Resolves:

1. To reaffirm the importance of the principles and rules of American comity contained in the Charter of the Organization of American States, and particularly the obligation to settle disputes by peaceful procedures alone, to abstain from the use of force, not to interfere either directly or indirectly or for whatever reason in the internal or external affairs of any other state, and to respect the right of each state to lead its own cultural, political, and economic life freely and spontaneously.

2. To reaffirm the right of all countries in the region to live in peace and security, free from any external interference.

3. To express its firmest support for the efforts of the Contadora Group and to urge it to persevere in its efforts.

4. To welcome with satisfaction the Declaration of Cancún on Peace in Central America issued by Presidents Belisario Betancur of Colombia, Miguel de la Madrid of Mexico, Ricardo de la Espriella of Panama, and Luis Herrera Campins of Venezuela.

5. To note with approval the adoption of the Document of Objectives approved by the Central American States at the proposal of the Contadora Group, which contains a set of basic principles and commitments to be negotiated for addressing the conflicts in the area and achieving peace, international security, democracy, and the cooperation needed for the region's economic and social development.

6. To urge the Central American states to negotiate forthwith, on the basis of the principles enunciated in the Document of Objectives, agreements that will formalize the objectives arising from those documents, and devise monitoring and verification mechanisms that will ensure their fulfillment.

7. To request all the states to abstain from any act that may heighten tensions, hamper the negotiation efforts the Contadora Group is making in mutual agreement with the Central American Governments, or impede the creation of a climate of dialogue and negotiation conducive to the restoration of peace in the region.

Address by the Ambassador to El Salvador (Pickering) Before the American Chamber of Commerce, San Salvador, November 25, 1983 [23]

"The Essential Stumbling Block to Democracy in El Salvador Remains Extremist Terror"

I am pleased to follow a Salvadoran tradition by making my first general address to the American Chamber of Commerce. I hope my remarks are as interesting and stimulating to you as those of my predecessor proved to be.

Since I have arrived, my new Salvadoran friends have frequently asked me how I like El Salvador. I like it very much. This is a beautiful country. The people are friendly, hard-working and courageous.

But I think what they really are asking is this: How do I see the current situation? How do I see the future? And, perhaps most importantly, does my presence mean American policy has changed?

A new Ambassador in a country of El Salvador's importance makes these questions obvious and natural. This speech will try to answer them.

The policy question is perhaps the easiest.

The truth is there is no change.

Last April President Reagan outlined our policy before a joint session of Congress. It is clear, straight forward and easy to remember because of the four "D's" describing the four pillars of our policy: democracy, development, diplomacy, and defense.

Permit me to begin with defense, because without an adequate defense none of the other areas of the policy can survive. But even a perfect defense, a "military victory," assures neither long range security nor the basic goals of political and economic change shared by El Salvador and the United States.

So, with the caveat that our policy cannot rest on defense alone, I would like to share my views on the military situation with you.

Your armed forces have demonstrated great valor in confronting an elusive enemy under difficult circumstances. Their real accomplishments have too often been ignored while at times they have been harder hit on the front pages of the newspapers than they have by the guerrillas.

The truth is that over the past 3 years the armed forces have greatly advanced as a fighting force. Even so, both the armed forces and the United States still recognize there is a considerable distance to go. For example, just over 20 percent have received U.S. training.

Since June the Salvadoran military has been constantly in the field, beginning first in San Vincente Department, where 3 months of steady effort have laid a solid foundation for the national plan.

The plan was designed to provide security, followed by rebuilding the infrastructure, resettling refugees, and finally be instituting and continuing the economic development of the country. The plan is working. It is working despite the fact that nothing of this magnitude has ever been attempted here and much has had to be learned. It is working despite the new guerrilla offensive.

As for the long-predicted guerrilla offensive, the capacity of the guerrillas to initiate frequent actions against small and weakly-defended or undefended villages and towns is inherent in the nature of the struggle. Warfare in El Salvador has been so in the past, and until training and equipment can turn the balance, it is likely to remain so.

The army's reaction to the offensive has been much better than commonly assumed. They have managed to relieve or retake more than 75 towns attacked by the guerrillas within 6 to 36 hours. They have stayed in the field. They have improved their capacity for patrolling, conducted several counteroffensives, and are steadily improving their communications, air support, and the use of intelligence.

While the army has gotten stronger and improved and consolidated its position, the guerrillas, too, continue to be strong. It is clear that the guerrillas have received good training and considerable foreign advice and support. They have good communications systems and a good intelligence network.

But for all that, and in spite of not having to defend fixed installations or bases, the guerrilla victories have been those of propaganda rather than of military effect. They have not significantly enlarged their control over the population, the economy or the national territory. Their offensive has cost them blood and war material. They are short on supplies in some key areas and there are signs the offensive may be winding down.

For the future, the carrying of the San Vicente operation into its next stage in Usulutan and retaking the initiative nationwide are vital. We are convinced that the government and the armed forces intend and have the capability to do so.

One unknown element in the future of the military conflict is the question of how successful we will be in persuading the Congress to provide the funds for continued assistance and training. But this is a point I will discuss in connection with human rights. First I would like to discuss economic development.

We are beginning to see some small, early signs of positive change in the economy. It is far too early to be even guardedly optimistic. But it is soon enough to begin to point out some of the favorable signals.

While all the results are not in, it appears that the disastrous decline in the real growth rate—25 percent in the past 4 years—will be arrested this year. For the future, we intend to change our approach and target our assistance programs on the positive growth we believe possible.

—Recent estimates of agricultural production indicate that earlier predictions were too low.

—There have been some imaginative suggestions made on reviving Salvadoran industry.

—The Caribbean Basin Initiative—the Reagan Plan—provides a new door which is open to large and increasing American markets. We are encouraged by the fact that in spite of the tough conditions which must be met, Salvadorans are taking a hard and energetic look at how to compete in the world's richest market. Progress in taking advantage of the initiative in the coming year would do much to restore faith and dynamism to the economy. This is a clear challenge to you in the private sector to combine support for the country with personal enterprise.

—There is animated, and I hope serious, discussion about agricultural diversification.

—The economic part of the national plan is moving ahead, albeit slowly and with growing pains.

—Other signs, however small, are also encouraging. The U.S. economy and parts of the world economy are improving. Coffee quotas and prices are up slightly. Salvador has received a larger share of the U.S. sugar quota. The housing market in San Salvador is firmer, and there are other indications of internal economic strengthening.

There are also indications that the long, bitter debate on Agrarian Reform may be coming to an end. As you know, support for Agrarian Reform remains a cornerstone of U.S. policy since we believe it essential to social and economic progress. So we are heartened when, in our discussions with each of the political parties, we find broad consensus on the fundamentals of Agrarian Reform. All of the parties seem to agree that:

—Phases I and III should be completed and perfected. They cannot and should not be reversed.

—There should be greater equity in land tenure and reasonable limits on the amount of land that any individual or family can hold. Since the Government of El Salvador does not now have the wherewithal to carry out Phase II, a market mechanism which takes into account the needs of campesinos should be implemented in order to achieve these ends by a given date.

We believe that an effective compromise on Agrarian Reform in the Constituent Assembly is well within reach. Such an action on the Agrarian Reform would further solidify U.S. support for El Salvador. It would also "unfreeze" Phase II lands. It would permit investment and productive development for the future, while providing new opportunities for landless campesinos to enjoy the benefits of holding their own farms.

Finally, we support a balanced budget, new taxes required to cover deficit, and then increase in government austerity so that essential expenditures can be covered. The government deserves congratulations and support for its steps in this direction.

For all of this, we must not forget what remains to be done.

—To rebuild what is destroyed;

—To generate new sources of employment and production;

—To expand humanitarian relief for refugees;

—To improve foreign exchange reserves;

—To rebuild the regional common market;

—And, perhaps most importantly, to renew efforts to improve the lives of the poor through nutrition, education, access to health facilities and decent housing.

Strengthening democracy here in El Salvador presents the toughest and the most important challenge. President Reagan listed this aspect before all others in his address last April.

As with headline writers, we are all too often tempted to focus only on sensational events or the bad news, while the small quiet steps that add up to progress are overlooked.

Let's look at the signs. The Assembly has become the Nations' arena for healthy and vigorous public debate. This is as it should be. The Assembly has been much maligned for taking too long to resolve issues before it. But I would counsel patience. What we are witnessing is a phenomenon that is new for El Salvador—open debate in a body where there is no permanent majority, and where the outcome is not a foregone conclusion.

Coalitions form around specific issues only to break up and coalesce in different shapes. The Assembly has shown its mettle by taking on controversial issues such as a painful but necessary tax package, the extension of Phase III of the Land Reform and the Amnesty Program. The Constituent Assembly has set Presidential elections for March 25, 1984, thereby fulfilling the goal of the Pact of Apaneca. [24] These elections are essential for establishing a constitutional democracy with a mandate to govern effectively.

The U.S. Government unreservedly supports these elections and applauds the Assembly's action. We remain firmly committed to helping the Salvadoran Government hold free and honest elections such as those of March 1982, which won the respect of democratic governments the world over. We are already providing $3.4 million in assistance to the Central Elections Council.

Democracy has registered gains in other areas:

—The executive and judicial branches of government have recognized the serious need for judicial reform and both have named commissions to deal with the problem and recommended changes.

—The Democratic Labor Movement has begun to lobby forcefully but peacefully on issues it considers of vital importance. Such activity is intrinsic to any truly democratic society. It is a tribute to the growing maturity of Salvadoran democracy that the government has allowed peaceful demonstrations of labor's growing strength to take place.

—The Peace Commission has held initial contacts with the representatives of the guerrillas. While the guerrilla's rejection of election participation has been discouraging, the democratic forces in El Salvador have made it clear that the door remains open to those who wish to resolve the nation's problems through the democratic process. There is room for moderates on both sides to come together.

[24] For text of the Pact of Apaneca, August 3, 1982, see Presidential Certification on Progress in El Salvador, pp. 53–57.

But for all these signs of progress the essential stumbling block to democracy in El Salvador remains extremist terror.

In the last few months this terror has once again surged. This terror can undo all the progress which has been made. It can destroy democracy in El Salvador.

I don't care what their ideology is, my Government and I are opposed to terrorism, be it terrorism of the left, terrorism of the right, or simple criminal terror which knows no ideology.

The important thing is that the terrorists are murderers, torturers and kidnappers. As such they deserve nothing less from society than open and honest punishment for such crimes.

There is information available to many of us about some of the personalities involved. I am keenly aware that much of that information may not at present be sufficient for a court of law. My deep concern is that no one seems to be trying to develop evidence which would stand up in court. There is now a starting point. We are certain that these individuals are as well known to the security forces as they are to those of us who have been in the country only a short time. In fact, information has been recently published in the foreign press repeating much of what is already known about death squad activities.

There has been little doubt of the commitment of the authorities to dealing with terror by the FMLN. There may be lack of means, but there is no lack of resolve. What has distressed my government is the lack of parallel action against those who murder and kidnap university professors, doctors, labor leaders, campesinos and government workers. We know by their selection of victims and other information that the Maximiliano Hernández Martínez Brigade and the secret anti-Communist Army are not guerrilla organizations. It is another case of Fascists serving the Communist cause and this is all the more reason why the investigations must take place.

None of us can afford to continue in the self-deluding belief that nothing is really known about the shadowy world of these individuals and, therefore, nothing can be done. The cost is too great for both our nations.

The costs indeed are real. The U.S. Congress has reduced this year's military aid to El Salvador by $22 million and conditioned the remainder. (Our President's request for $86 million in military aid has yielded only $64 million.) There is little doubt that the reappearance of death squad activities was the cause.

What does the loss of $22 million mean?

—It means that your homes, farms and businesses will have less protection than they otherwise would have.

—It means that the army will expand by several thousand troops less than it otherwise would have.

—It means that the troops who are fighting for your country in the hills right now will have to get along with less and that surely more officers and men will be wounded and die as a result.

But more than $22 million in bullets and helicopters and training is at stake. The future of your society is at stake. No one wants to live in a country where no efforts are made to find out who dumps bodies in gas stations and parking lots. No one wants his children to grow up in fear that almost anything his children say may be taken as "subversive."

Just over a year ago, in this very forum, my predecessor, focused his remarks on this same topic.[25] I am sorry to say that while there has been increased recognition of the problems of the judicial system here, too little has changed.

It was said by some that his remarks did not reflect Washington's views on the matter. But I say this is clearly not so. The White House, the Department of State, and Department of Defense have all spoken out condemning the actions of the death squads. The President of El Salvador, the political commission and the Minister of Defense have all condemned the death squads.

Some day, and today is not too soon, Salvadorans will have to begin to create the national consensus that such actions are not only reprehensible merely as a matter of rhetoric, but are issues on which they and their fellow citizens must be heard. What is wrong should not only be called wrong, there should be a national consensus that it is wrong.

I am surprised that the consensus has not emerged. Less than three weeks ago nine strangled bodies stuffed into sacks were found in Zaragoza. Among the dead were two obviously pregnant women. Is there anyone in this room who can find any pretext, any excuse, to justify this? Where are the condemnations? Why hasn't the private sector, which regularly issues statements on political matters, publicly condemned such outrages? Why haven't the daily papers done so? Is the condemnation of murder the business only of human rights organizations, some government leaders, the Roman Catholic Church and the U.S. Government and its Embassy? The whole world noted, how, this October 21, 1 million Spaniards in over 40 cities peacefully demonstrated their repudiation of violence.

Failure to take the necessary steps now risks turning El Salvador over to anarchy in the short run and later to the Communists who will benefit most from the anarchy.

For the moment those in a fool's paradise may cite examples of places where terror supposedly turned the tide in favor of stable, but autocratic, governments. A neighboring state comes to mind, but its condition is no less perilous today for such actions. These short range successes have almost always engendered long-range disasters and it is most often the left that enters with its own form of tyranny as a result. While the events of 1932 may have engendered some years of stability, they form part of the background for the problems of today. [28]

Several times during the last century the United States has itself had to deal with the murderous excesses of secret terror squads like the Ku Klux Klan. Even now shabby remnants of that hate-filled organization continue to exist. The struggle to break the power of the Klan organization was long and painful. Brave men and women lost their lives in that fight. The struggle was difficult for many of the same reasons that your struggle is difficult. The organizations are secret. They do not hesitate to intimidate or kill those who oppose them. And perhaps most importantly, too many "decent people" refuse to recognize that these terrorists are not espousing any social or political order worth upholding. You can be certain that my government will continue to cooperate with the Government of El Salvador to isolate and punish such criminals.

My words on these issues are no easier for me to say than they are for you to hear—especially since I count myself a friend of El Salvador. Even though I have been here only a short time, I believe the time has come for me to say, as a friend, what I believe to be true and to say what must be said.

And what I have said here has been said to me in turn by many Salvadoran friends. Out of fear or other emotion they have not said so publicly. However, I can do no better, and certainly no worse, than to repeat for you here and now, as I just have, the clear meaning of these discussions with friends.

It is clear that the perilous and depressed times in which El Salvador and Central America now find themselves, provide the leaders of the region with extraordinary challenges. We do not focus enough on the historically unprecedented opportunities which these times also provide.

The common heritage and common geographic conditions of the region have frequently offered not a cause for unity but a cause for competition, even armed competition. Likewise, there has at times been a lack of a sense of shared purpose with their great neighbor to the north, with Mexico, and with the equally dynamic nations to the south, Panama, Colombia, and Venezuela.

The coming together of the five Central American nations with their four neighbors in the Contadora process is an important development in the search for a solution to regional problems. It is unfortunate that the proximate cause of this unprecedented diplomatic event is the tension injected onto the Central American mainland by Nicaragua. Nonetheless, the reliance on diplomacy through the Contadora process is a milestone in the development of relations among the countries of the region.

The common adversity faced by the democratic countries of Central America has strengthened regional solidarity. The principles developed by the Central American Democratic Community at San Jose provide not only a formula of peace for the region but also a basis for solidarity. We support and welcome the skillful diplomacy of the leaders of the democratic nations of Central America. Particularly we salute President Alvaro Magaña and Foreign Minister Fidel Chavez Mena for their efforts toward regional solidarity.

The increasing level of political cooperation in Central America provides a framework for cooperation and future progress. First and foremost this is true in the economic arena. The free enterprise systems of the four countries have shown remarkable resilience in dealing with a series of economic blows that would have crippled many states, including those with the centrally directed economies of the communist world. We in the United States are now pledged to help through the Caribbean Basin Initiative, through support for the Common Market and through long-range development plans being studied by the Bipartisan Commission and others.

Markets are essential to this effort. We must all recognize that the small, fragmented markets of the individual Central American countries will not by themselves be able to provide sufficient economic growth in the years ahead. Maximum advantage must be taken of the 17 million person regional market. The integration of this market contributed to real growth of well over five percent a year in all Central American Common Market member countries during the 1960's. But, of even more fundamental importance, the countries of the region should increasingly reach out to the great markets of the United States, Europe and Japan. Competing in these markets, however, requires more than simple production. It requires the sort of environment toward which El Salvador is striving—one in which businessmen, laborers, and campesinos have confidence in the security of the enterprises to which they dedicate themselves. One in which there is respect for their rights under the law—both personal rights and property rights. When the rights of anyone are treated recklessly, then all have reason to fear and the very environment which is essential to future prosperity is destroyed.

To close my thoughts tonight, it may well be that in years to come historians will look back on this time of great challenge to Central America as a decisive period in the region's history. A period when the nations under challenge responded by strengthening their democratic and pluralistic institutions, developing new levels of economic dynamism, and a new sense of how best to protect their own security.

This will also be, I hope, a period when Central America enhances its cooperative relationships with its nearest neighbors. This is the hope of my country for the region and for El Salvador.

I am glad to be joining you all in this endeavor, an effort based on our respect for one another as individuals and on our Nations' respect for one another as sovereign independent states.

Statement by the Principal Deputy Press Secretary (Speakes), November 30, 1983 [27]

"Such [Certification] Requirements Distort Our Efforts To Improve Human Rights, Democracy, and Recovery in El Salvador"

The President today withheld approval of H.R. 4042, an enrolled bill that would require two Presidential certifications regarding El Salvador in 1984 or until the enactment of new legislation imposing conditions on U.S. military assistance for that country.

This administration is firmly committed to the protection of human rights, economic and political reforms, the holding of elections, and progress in prosecuting the cases of murdered American citizens in El Salvador. However, the process of certification as called for in H.R. 4042 would not serve to support these endeavors.

His decision to oppose this certification legislation reflects the administration's policy that such requirements distort our efforts to improve human rights, democracy, and recovery in El Salvador. The key certification provisions of the present bill are already addressed in this year's Continuing Resolution which requires a separate certification on progress in the area of land reform and withholds 30 percent of military assistance funds until the Government of El Salvador has completed the investigation and trial in the churchwomen's case. [28]

At the same time, the President wishes to emphasize that the Administration remains fully committed to the support of democracy, reform, and human rights in El Salvador. Those very concerns are a central component of our policy. They were clearly articulated by our Ambassador Tom Pickering as recently as last Friday. [29] The withholding of approval from H.R. 4042 in no way reflects a lessening of our interests in these critical areas. The President has also instructed the Department of State to continue to provide the Congress with periodic public reports—the next on January 16, 1984—on the political, economic, and military situation in El Salvador.

Working with the leadership of the Government of El Salvador, we will reconfirm our joint resolve to take whatever action is necessary to help the Government of El Salvador to end the reprehensible activities of the violent right as well as the violent left. The United States will also work to preserve and expand the progress that has been achieved in the area of land reform and to maintain the momentum toward holding open and democratic elections next year in accordance with the provision of the new constitution being prepared in El Salvador's Constituent Assembly.

There must exist a genuine awareness, both in the United States as well as in El Salvador, that our countries' strong and productive relationship can only be based on shared values in justice and democracy, and on concerted and sustained efforts to achieve these goals. We know that President Alvaro Magaña of El Salvador shares these views, and we will remain in touch on developing enhanced efforts that will strengthen human rights ties.

Transcript of an Interview With President Reagan, December 1, 1983 (Extracts) [30]

Grenada, El Salvador, and U.S. Policy in Central America

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. President, my name is Silvia Vilato from Our Lady of Lourdes Academy in Miami, Florida. First of all, I would like to commend you and your staff on the handling of the situation in Grenada. I feel that this event brought about a national spirit which was greatly needed in these times of crisis. And my question is: The Grenada affair saw the most direct confrontation with the Castro regime in recent years. Would you envision any further confrontation in the future or do you feel that Fidel Castro got the message? (Laughter)

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you, first of all, very much. I think, possibly, not only he, but a number of others got the message, [30] Source: White House Press Release, December 1, 1983, Office of the Press Secretary to the President; also printed in Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, December 5, 1983, pp. 1633–1638. The President was interviewed by high school students. Only those portions dealing with Central America and the Caribbean are printed. The interview, which began at 1:34 p.m. in the Old Executive Office Building, was videotaped for later broadcast on C-Span's "Close-Up" program.

all right, that the United States, we're not warlike, we want peace. But we know that we can't buy peace at any price. And when our national security is concerned, the world better know that we're going to do whatever's necessary for the safety and protection of our freedoms and the people of this country.

So, whether—we don't plan any confrontations. That will be up to them. And under the same circumstances and with the same request made by our neighbors that was made by six of the countries down there, I think we would probably react in the same way.

Q. Mr. President, my name is Kirk Kiester. I attend Fort Lauderdale Christian School in Fort Lauderdale, Florida. This week you vetoed a bill passed by Congress which linked military aid in El Salvador with human rights.[31] Why did you veto this bill, and how can we justify supporting governments being left wing or right wing which violate human rights?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, we are not supporting left wing or right wing governments who violate human rights. The situation in El Salvador, and this was the reason for the veto, the situation is, for 400 years El Salvador has been dominated by dictators of one kind or another. It is from a heritage that goes back to the very beginning of their country.

Then, a few years ago, and for the first time, a government came into power in El Salvador—wasn't elected, overthrew one of those dictatorships. But it truly was aimed at being democratic. And the result was they had an election more than a year ago. And they elected a democratic form of government. Eighty-three percent of their people went to the polls to vote; the leftist guerrillas that are fighting the government had a slogan at the time of that election. They said to the people, "Vote today; and die tonight," meaning they would kill the people if they went to vote. And the people defied them. I've told, repeatedly, of a story of one woman that some of our Congressmen, who were there as observers, saw in the line waiting to vote who had been wounded by the guerrillas, shot with a rifle. And she refused to leave the line for medical attention until she could vote. Now that's the Government of El Salvador.

Now, yes, there are holdovers. There are people left who aren't part of those leftist guerrillas, but who want the form of dictatorship and the totalitarianism—the privileged class concept that they had before this democratic government. And they are the so-called "murder squads" and doing the things they're doing to violate human rights.

The democratic government, beset by thousands of guerrillas on the left, would have a lot better chance of getting—apprehending these death squads and handling the extreme rightists if they were not beset by the guerrillas. And the Congress, by holding down the help that we can give to this El Salvador government, is simply leaving them in a position of—well, they can keep on fighting; but they don't have the means to actually win yet. They're just dragging on. And, at the same time, they can't handle these two things at once.

But the other thing we noticed was that, if we have this thing of having to certify every few months to the Congress in order to get this aid, there are people, both on the left and right, who know that, if they step up the violation of human rights—the murders and so forth so that we can't certify, they—from whichever side—are helping to win their battle against the democratic government.

So I vetoed the bill. What I want is for Congress to give us the help that should be provided. And $3 out of every $4 that we're spending down there is being spent on social reforms and economic help, not on the military. Only a fourth of the help is helping them militarily, but we need to help them more. We're doing everything we can, not only to help that government deal with these right wing squads, but I'm going to voice a suspicion now that I've never said aloud before. I wonder if all of this is right wing, or if those guerrilla forces have not realized that by infiltrating into the city of San Salvador and places like that, that they can get away with these violent acts, helping to try and bring down the government, and the right wing will be blamed for it.

Now, I'm not absolving the right wing. We know there are right wing assassins and murder squads and so forth, but we are doing everything we can to control that. I didn't think this bill would help.

Q. Mr. President, my name is Robert Pupo, from Belen Jesuit Preparatory School in Miami, Florida. First of all, I would like to commend you for giving America a strong and efficient administration for almost 3 years now.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you.

Q. My question is: If the situation in Central America worsens, would you consider sending American troops into this area?

THE PRESIDENT. Is it worsened by sending American troops into the area? Is that your question?

Q. If the situation in Central America worsens and becomes a threat to American security, will you consider sending troops—American troops—into Central America?

THE PRESIDENT. It would have to be very evident that it was a direct threat to the United States. The truth of the matter is, dating back to some days when the big colossus of the North, the United States, did lean on and practice what was called gunboat diplomacy. Our own friends and neighbors down there don't want us to send that kind of military help. They don't want our troops down there, and we respect them for that. President Magaña of El Salvador has said, "Yes, we need some help; we need weapons, ammunition; we need training." And we're providing that for them. But he said, "We will provide the manpower. We don't want yours." So, yours was a kind of a hypothetical question and mine is a hypothetical answer. It would have to be something that we saw as actually a threat to our security and our safety, and then we would be defending ourselves, not someone else.

. . . . . .

Q. Good afternoon, Mr. President. My name is Cadet Douglas from Valley Forge Military Academy in Wayne, Pennsylvania.

THE PRESIDENT. I visited there.

Q. In 1962 President Kennedy intervened in a Soviet action to attempt to stop the placement of Soviet medium-range ballistic missiles in Cuba. Recently, Soviet—MIG-23s have been placed in Cuba and Nicaragua. As I see it, there is no U.S. advance fighter aircraft stationed in the Caribbean Basin. Do you think that we should station possibly F-16s in Guantanamo Bay Naval Base or Howard Air Force Base in Panama to stop the threat of strike anywhere in the Caribbean Basin or possibly the southern United States or possibly the Panama Canal?

THE PRESIDENT. We're aware of those planes in those areas. And I call to your attention that we have carrier squadrons that are on duty in the Caribbean and over on the Pacific side off that side of Central America. We think that we have sufficient force and sufficient warning for our own bases that we can handle that.

When the Cuban missile crisis came along the situation was far different. And I don't mean to take anything away from President Kennedy, but at that time the United States had about an 8 to 1 nuclear superiority over the Soviet Union. So when we stood up and looked them in the eye, they blinked.

Yes. I am sorry, there are a lot of hands that I didn't get to.

Q. Excuse me, Mr. President. My name is John Lopez from Albuquerque, New Mexico. And on behalf of the Close-up Foundation, we would like to thank you for this great opportunity.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, that was a good easy question. (Applause) Thank you very much.

Sections 108 and 109 of Public Law 98-215, Approved December 9, 1983 [32]

Congressional Views on U.S. Policy Toward Nicaragua

SEC. 108. During fiscal year 1984, not more than $24,000,000 of the funds available to the Central Intelligence Agency, the Department of Defense, or any other agency or entity of the United States involved in intelligence activities may be obligated or expended for the purpose or which would have the effect of supporting, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua by any nation, group, organization, movement, or individual.

SEC. 109. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the Government of National Reconstruction of Nicaragua has failed to keep solemn promises, made to the Organization of American States in July 1979, to establish full respect for human rights and political liberties, hold early elections, preserve a private sector, permit political pluralism, and pursue a foreign policy of nonaggression and nonintervention; [33]

(2) by providing military support (including arms, training, and logistical, command and control, and communications facilities) to groups seeking to overthrow the Government of El Salvador and other Central American governments, the Government of National Reconstruction of Nicaragua has violated article 18 of the Charter of the Organization of American States which declares that no state has the right to intervene, directly or indirectly, for any reason whatsoever, in the internal or external affairs of any other state;

(3) the Government of Nicaragua should be held accountable before the Organization of American States for activities violative of promises made to the Organization and for violations of the Charter of that Organization; and

(4) working through the Organization of American States is the proper and most effective means of dealing with threats to the peace of Central America, of providing for common action in the event of aggression, and of providing the mechanisms for peaceful resolution of disputes among the countries of Central America.

(b) The President should seek a prompt reconvening of the Seventeenth Meeting of Consultation of Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the Organization of American States for the purpose of reevaluating the compliance by the Government of National Reconstruction of Nicaragua—

(1) with the commitments made by the leaders of that Government in July 1979 to the Organization of American States; and

(2) with the Charter of the Organization of American States.

(c) The President should vigorously seek actions by the Organization of American States that would provide for a full range of effective measures by the member states to bring about compliance by the Government of National Reconstruction of Nicaragua with those obligations, including verifiable agreements to halt the transfer of military equipment and to cease furnishing of military support facilities to groups seeking the violent overthrow of governments of countries in Central America.

(d) The President should use all diplomatic means at his disposal to encourage the Organization of American States to seek resolution of the conflicts in Central America based on the provisions of the Final Act of the San Jose Conference of October 1982, [34] especially principles (d), (e), and (g), relating to nonintervention in the internal affairs of other countries, denying support for terrorist and subversive elements in other states, and international supervision of fully verifiable arrangements.

(e) The United States should support measures at the Organization of American States, as well as efforts of the Contadora Group, which seek to end support for terrorist, subversive, or other activities aimed at the violent overthrow of the governments of countries in Central America.

(f) Not later than March 15, 1984, the President shall report to the Congress on the results of his efforts pursuant to this Act to achieve peace in Central America. Such report may include such recommendations as the President may consider appropriate for further United States actions to achieve this objective.

Remarks by Vice President Bush, San Salvador, December 11, 1983 [35]

"I Owe It to You As a Friend To Speak Frankly"

Mr. President, I have been most impressed by your warm hospitality. You have welcomed me as a friend. I hope you will permit me, in that same spirit of friendship, to use this occasion to convey to you and your fellow countrymen some thoughts from my own perspective—and that of President Reagan.

The American people have developed a great admiration for the people of El Salvador. You are on the front lines fighting for liberty against Communist aggression. The extraordinary 80 percent voter turnout in the Constituent Assembly elections of 1982 demonstrated your people's deep faith in democracy even under the most difficult of circumstances.

Mr. President, I know that you share that faith. I know that you and many other Salvadorans are personally committed to democracy, reform and human rights. But in your struggle to bring peace and justice to your people, you have more than one enemy. The brave Salvadoran patriots who are now fighting to build their new democracy are under attack not only from Communist guerrillas supported from abroad, but also from extremist right-wing terrorists, the death squads, that small group of people within your own society who operate outside the law.

A guerrilla war is a long, arduous effort, fought on many fronts: military, economic, social and political. But the crucial battle is not for territory; it is for men's minds. The guerrillas never lose sight of that objective. They know the government is responsible for protecting the people. So their goal is to cripple the government, distort its priorities and sow doubt about its legitimacy.

For a government to survive a guerrilla challenge, it must continue to protect its citizens even as it fights to defend itself from those who play by other rules—or no rules at all. As it does so, it must continue to respect the rule of law and the rights of the individual. And it must honor basic human decencies. If it does not, it will lose that crucial battle for the support and approval of the people.

Mr. President, you and many other Salvadorans have demonstrated extraordinary personal courage in the struggle against tyranny and extremism. But your cause is being undermined by the murderous violence of reactionary minorities.

Tom Pickering's remarks—which I greatly admire and which the President and I both fully endorse—were right on the mark. These right-wing fanatics are the best friends the Soviets, the Cubans, the Sandinista comandantes and the Salvadoran guerrillas have. Every murderous act they commit poisons the well of friendship between our two countries and advances the cause of those who would impose an alien dictatorship on the people of El Salvador. These cowardly death squad terrorists are just as repugnant to me, to President Reagan, to the United States Congress and to the American people as the terrorists of the left.

Mr. President, I know that these words are not those of the usual dinner toast. My intention is not to abuse your hospitality nor to offend you and your other guests. I speak as a friend, one who is committed to your success—the success of democracy in El Salvador. And I owe it to you as a friend to speak frankly.

We in the United States have never asked that others be exactly like us. We're a nation that is constantly debating its own shortcomings. But on certain fundamental principles all Americans are united.

I ask you as a friend not to make the mistake of thinking that there is any division in my country on this question. It is not just the President, it is not just me or the Congress. If these death squad murders continue, you will lose the support of the American people, and that would indeed be a tragedy.

Mr. President, your brave people and mine have so much in common. Your land reform has our full support, and your staunch resistance to communism has earned our great respect. Now is the time to move vigorously to consolidate the democratic gains you have made and to establish fully functioning democratic institutions in El Salvador.

The people of El Salvador have shown the world their courage and commitment to democracy by turning out to vote in overwhelming numbers despite Communist death threats, and they have done honor to the democratic tradition through their dynamic political debate and action in the Constituent Assembly. The Presidential elections the Assembly has scheduled for March 25 will strengthen your society and confirm the bonds between our two peoples.

Mr. President, I offer a toast to the Salvadoran people: May they soon come to enjoy the long deferred peace and prosperity they deserve.

"Our Policy in Central America Is Regional"

. . . . . .

Q. Fifth: What strategy does the administration intend to pursue in Central America? Is it to underwrite the Government of El Salvador indefinitely? And in Nicaragua, is it to settle for nothing less than the overthrow of the Sandinistas?

THE PRESIDENT. Our policy in Central America is regional. This is very much what the Contadora process is. We're supporting the efforts of the Contadora group—Mexico, Venezuela, Panama, and Colombia to assure that democratic elections are used to settle the internal political conflicts and that verified agreements assure peace among the countries.

Now as for the El Salvador Government: There has been important progress in recent years achieving democratic ideals, practices, and policy. They're beset by Cuban and Soviet-backed insurgents who don't want that kind of government. They want the old-fashioned idea that we've seen for the last few hundred years—the idea that if you have a revolution, it is only to exchange one set of rules for another set of rules. For once, we've got a government there that says: "No. This is to be revolution to change that process."

At the same time that the Government in El Salvador is fighting against this potent enemy on the left, they're being harassed from behind by small violent right-wing groups who want to go back to the old concept of government over the people, not by the people. So we shouldn't be blaming the present Government of El Salvador for not being able to deal effectively with these rightists when it is beset by this other force on the left.

I think that the thing that is dragging this out are the limitations placed on our aid by the Congress. It's almost as if they're saying, "Well, we'll give you just enough to let them bleed to death slowly." What we really need—and remember that three-fourths of our aid is for economic and social reforms and the other 25 cents out of each dollar is for military aid—is the kind of aid that will let them accomplish the job and eliminate this left-wing guerrilla force that is doing the attacking.

At the same time, wherever we can, we should help them find out these behind-the-scenes moves by the violent right that we will not accept. And where the government needs help in dealing with this, we should help. That was one of the missions that Vice President Bush performed when he was in El Salvador recently. [37] I think some progress has been made in that regard. But we shouldn't let the violent right keep us from doing what is necessary to end the war that's going on.

Q. And Nicaragua—is overthrow of the Sandinistas the U.S. policy?

THE PRESIDENT. No. We are not demanding the overthrow of that government. All they have to do is go back to the 1979 democratic commitments they made to the OAS as part of the political agreement leading to the end of the Somoza regime. Remember, the United States gave them immediate diplomatic recognition and significant financial aid until we found out that one faction of the revolutionaries was exiling or imprisoning their more democratic partners in the revolution, who discovered the Sandinistas intended to have a totalitarian form of government.

Now, the Sandinistas' promises of human rights, of democratic principles, of free elections, union rights, and so forth—all of those promises were made in writing to the Organization of American States when they persuaded the OAS, during the revolution, to persuade Somoza to resign, which he did. They have not kept that contract.

Some of the leaders of the "contras" were fighting alongside of them in the revolution and then were ousted, just as Castro ousted the same kind of people and imprisoned some of his best lieutenants because they wouldn't go along with him to a Communist, totalitarian form of government.

Nicaragua could solve its problem right now. If this Nicaraguan Government wants to go back to the promises of the revolution, we'll step in and help.

The Grenadian Runway, an Illegitimate Soviet Military Interest

. . . . . .

Q. I wanted to change the subject briefly. The President mentioned last night [2] that 10,000 foot long runway in Grenada—two questions. First, what do we think is the purpose of this and secondly, what Soviet aircraft require a runway 2 miles long?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. An illustration of the potential purpose was given by one of the Grenadian officials, I think a year ago. He said, Esprechio (phonetic) [Selwyn Strachan?] was his name, that—one way could serve strategic purposes for the Soviet Union.[3] And of course indirectly or directly—indirectly through Cuba or directly Soviet support made this airfield possible.

What aircraft would require such a runway? . . .

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. The majority of modern military aircraft require a runway longer than 8,000 feet.

Q. Aeroflot? (Laughter)

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No—

Q. No, I mean, I'm talking about—not the MIG-23s that are in Cuba, or MIG-25s but does the—I mean does the Backfire Bomber require that or do the fighter planes need a—can they use a smaller runway than that—

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. The fact of the matter is, . . . I think this answers your question is that a 10,000 foot runway is not needed for commercial applications. It is required for military aircraft—either fighters or bombers. I don't think the Backfire Bomber actually takes as much runway as a fighter does.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. — good question.

Q. What is the difference in the President showing pictures of Grenada and Cuba? I don't mean this in an offensive way, but what's the difference in the Soviet Union saying, "Well, here's Diego Garcia and here's the Gulf of Oman, here's Oman, here's where we're building this runway and here's for our Rapid Deployment Force." I mean it seems that there's a symmetry here of perspectives.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No, the difference is in the trend, the historic trend. In Southwest Asia, in the Gulf, there was the British base of Aden, now South Yemen, and the British have always been in Diego Garcia, directly or indirectly. There were U.S. bases and Whelis (phonetic) [Wheelus] Air Force in Libya. So, we had a military presence to—commensurate with our interests and commitments in the area.

The Soviets have not, in the past, had such a military presence in the Caribbean and in Central America. It is that shift that is of concern to us.

Q. But isn't it consistent with theirs—just as it is with ours?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No, it is not consistent. They are not importing the energy from the Caribbean area as we are from the Gulf. They don't have, therefore, this kind of legitimate interest that we have.

U.S. Government Monitoring of Outbreak of Violence in Grenada

. . . . . .

Q. What can you tell us about the situation in Grenada?

A. The situation in Grenada?

Q. Is it Grenada or Grenada?

A. Grenada is the way I was asked. Based upon news reports from the area and principally the official broadcasts of Radio Free Grenada, we are assuming that Grenadian Prime Minister Maurice Bishop was killed in the violence which erupted yesterday.[5] Diplomatic relations, as you know, with Grenada are conducted from our Embassy in Bridgetown, Barbados; and that presents, even under the best of circumstances, communications problems, but especially under these circumstances. The telephone communication has frequently been disrupted, and a number of regularly scheduled air flights to Grenada have been turned back.

The Radio Free Grenada's announcement of Prime Minister Bishop's death also announced a 24-hour curfew, which is in effect through 6 a.m. on Monday[6] and also announced was the warning that anybody out of their houses will be shot on sight. This obviously raises our concern about American nationals in Grenada.

The most recent Radio Free Grenada announcements have been made in the name of the armed forces, but apart from accepting the assertion that the military is currently ruling the country through a revolutionary council, we are in no position to make any comment on the current state of affairs or the likely outcome.

We are continuing to monitor developments there. The number of U.S. citizens in Grenada is somewhere between 800 and 1,000. Prior to the recent outbreak of violence, we had communicated our concerns about U.S. citizen welfare to Grenadian authorities, and as I say, we are obviously monitoring events with particular care in this regard.

I think that's really about all I have for you.

Q. Do you think that the U.S. policy which isolated the Bishop government economically and politically, or tried to do so, had anything to do with leading to his overthrow?

A. No, I don't think U.S. policy had anything to do with recent developments.

Q. John, in a more general way, how would this administration view political murder as a route to power in the Caribbean, especially by pro-Cuban forces?

A. I think we have to be careful here, Bill. We have to know what we're dealing with—it's basically radio reports from a regime that has announced it has taken over; and I think we need to have some first-hand reports of what has happened ourselves before we start making either judgments or analyses.

Q. How do we get those first-hand reports?

A. I think we'll leave it that we are trying to get better information than we presently have.

Q. John, have you talked to the missions they have here? They have an OAS mission.

A. I don't know. There is, obviously, a lot going on in connection with Grenada today on our part. There were meetings in the Department last night; there are meetings during the day. I don't know what kind of contact—

---

[4] Source: Office of Press Relations, Department of State. John Hughes, Department of State Spokesman, conducted the briefing, which began at 12:21 p.m.

[5] Bishop was placed under house arrest as a result of a coup d'état on October 13; he was freed on October 19 amidst a demonstration by thousands of supporters, and was subsequently fatally shot. The following day the Revolutionary Military Council under Army Chief General Hudson Austin announced it had assumed control.

[6] October 24, 1983.

Q. Did the Secretary participate in those meetings?

A. Yes.

Q. Is that to understand that the Bishop killing, you can confirm that or are you just quoting the radio?

A. We're quoting the radio, and so far as we know, what the radio is saying seems to be the case.

Q. Have you tried to establish diplomatic contact with the Government of Grenada—diplomatic contact?

A. I think we're just going to leave it where we are, and give you the indication of the problems we have with communications, but not get into the diplomatic back and forth that is going on.

Q. Can you say at this time whether we have received any assurances from the current authorities in Grenada about the safety of American nationals?

A. Not in the present confused situation. We have not received assurances, to my knowledge.

Q. Have we asked for them?

A. We are certainly seeking assurances about the safety of U.S. citizens.

Q. You said that prior to the outbreak of violence, there had been a communication from the U.S. Government to the Grenadian authorities about the welfare of Americans. Can you say when that was?

A. I can't say. I think that was fairly recent. Obviously, this has been developing within the past few days. I can't say when that came—

Q. Would you say within the past several days or some weeks ago?

A. No, I think it's within the past several days.

Q. What was it that brought that concern here?

A. Well, there has been some turbulence there for the past several days.

Q. The British Government has official representation there.[7] Can anything be learned from that?

A. I am sure that many channels of communication are being worked by us.

Q. Is the military government that has apparently taken over a more hard-line Marxist government than Bishop?

A. We'll have to wait and see. As I say, it's premature for that kind of analysis.

Q. Did we make a mistake, though, in retrospect in not being more open to Bishop when he was here before the OAS, and wanted to meet and wanted to talk?[8] Was that now a mistake, in retrospect?

A. You mean, we were too open?

Q. He wanted to meet with the President and he wanted to discuss relations between the two countries, and we put him off at the time.

A. I'm not sure that statement is correct. I'd like to go back over the sequence of events; but as I recall the situation, I think we set up a meeting, and the Prime Minister did not appear for that—

Q. The President wouldn't meet with him.

A. The President—I don't think there was any suggestion the President would meet with him.

There was a meeting with Middendorf, and I'm not sure Judge Clark—Let me go back over the sequence, but certainly, there was a lot of activity on our side in order to bring about contact and dialogue there. There was no—

Q. President Reagan turned down a meeting with him?

A. There was never any suggestion that the President would meet with Mr. Bishop. There was never any suggestion on our side.

Q. Yes, but wasn't it the case that Bishop himself requested a meeting with the President, and that that was turned down?

---

[7] Reference is to Grenadian Governor-General Paul Scoon.

[8] Bishop made an unofficial visit to the United States from May 31 to June 9, 1983.

A. He may have done.

Q. Then, just for the record, did he meet with Judge Clark and Under Secretary Dam?

A. My own memory plagues me I'd like to be sure whom he asked to see, and who he did see and did not see. But, certainly, there was not a reluctance on our part to have him see officials in the administration.

Q. Are you taking that question, John?

A. Yes, I will take it.

Q. Also, the Barbadian Prime Minister, Tom Adams, today said that they had fears since last week that Bishop's life could have been in danger. Did you receive any of those reports, and are you in touch with the Barbadian Government over this?

A. I don't know whether we're in—as I say, we're working many channels on this, Jim; but I'm also not aware of any reports earlier.

Q. John, in connection with President Reagan's expressed concern about the 10,000 foot runway in Grenada, is the United States any more or less concerned now about the presence of that runway or the use to which it might be put?

A. Why don't we wait and see what kind of regime emerges?

. . . . . .

[MR. HUGHES.] . . . I can clear up the question of Mr. Bishop's earlier meeting. He did meet with Acting Secretary Dam, which we said at the time, and he did meet with the National Security Adviser Judge Clark.*

Q. Do you have a date on that, perhaps?

A. The date of the guidance was June 8. The meeting was requested by Prime Minister Bishop, with a duration of about an hour. The guidance does not say—

MR. ROMBERG. It was the day before.

A. The day before, is it? O.K., then it would be June 8th.

Q. June 7th?

A. June 7th. June 8th was the guidance, and June 7th apparently would be the meeting.

Q. Could I just follow with one other question on—

A. Yes, O.K. He's talking about yesterday, so it would be June 7th.

Q. There's a regional—

A. So I think that responds to your question about any reluctance on the part of the United States to meet with him.

Q. The United States helped establish a regional kind of defense grouping of the eastern Caribbean states, the smaller ones, headquartered in Bridgetown, in Barbados. There were reports yesterday that they were meeting. Now, has the United States been in consultation in the last 24–48 hours, say, with respect to any role it might play insofar as the regional defense group is concerned?

A. I don't know. I can't answer that, Jim. I honestly don't know.

. . . . . .

Q. John, have we alerted any naval vessels in the vicinity of Grenada to be prepared possibly to evacuate, anything of that nature?

A. Not to my knowledge, but why don't you talk to the Pentagon about our capability in that area?

Q. Can you give us a precise number, John, of how many Americans there are in Grenada?

A. The figures are a little vague, between 800 and 1,000.

Q. Most of them—

A. About 500 of those, I understand, are at the medical school. I think at St.

Organization of Eastern Caribbean States Request For U.S. Assistance in Grenada

YOUR EXCELLENCY: The Chairman of the Organisation of Eastern Caribbean States presents her compliments to His Excellency the Ambassador of the United States to the Eastern Caribbean and has the honour to transmit herewith a request for assistance under Article 8 [11] of the Treaty establishing the Organisation of Eastern Caribbean States. TEXT OF OECS REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

The authority of the Organisation of Eastern Caribbean States (OECS) met at Bridgetown, Barbados on Friday 21st October 1983, to consider and evaluate the situation in Grenada arising out of the overthrow of the Government led by Prime Minister Maurice Bishop and the subsequent killing of the Prime Minister together with some of his colleagues and a number of other citizens. [13]

The authority is aware that the overthrow of the Bishop administration took place with the knowledge and connivance of forces unfriendly to the OECS, leading to the establishment of the present military regime.

The meeting took note of the current anarchic conditions, the serious violations of human rights and bloodshed that have occurred and the consequent unprecedented threat to the peace and security of the region created by the vacuum of authority in Grenada.

The authority was deeply concerned that military forces and supplies are likely to be shortly introduced to consolidate the position of the regime and that the country can be used as a staging post for acts of aggression against its members.

The authority further noted that the capability of the Grenada armed forces is already at a level of sophistication and size far beyond the internal needs of that country. Furthermore the member states of the OECS have no means of defence against such forces.

The member governments of the organisation hold the strong view that such a situation would further undermine political, social and economic stability and would have extremely dangerous consequences for the preservation of peace and security in the OECS sub-region as a whole.

The authority noted that the present regime in Grenada has demonstrated by its brutality and ruthlessness that it will stop at nothing to achieve its ends and to secure its power.

[12] The Organization of Eastern Caribbean States is comprised of the following nations: Antigua, Dominica, Grenada, Montserrat, St. Christopher-Nevis, Saint Lucia, and Saint Vincent and the Grenadines.

[13] Prime Minister Bishop, and several Cabinet ministers and union leaders were executed on October 19, 1983.

Under the authority of Article 8 of the Treaty establishing the Organisation of Eastern Caribbean States, the authority proposes therefore to take action for collective defence and the preservation of peace and security against external aggression by requesting assistance from friendly countries [14] to provide transport, logistics support and additional military personnel to assist the efforts of the OECS to stabilize this most grave situation within the Eastern Caribbean.

The authority of the OECS wishes to establish a peace keeping force with the assistance of friendly neighbouring states to restore on Grenada conditions of tranquility and order so as to prevent further loss of life and abuses of human rights pending the restoration of constitutional government.

Statements and Remarks by President Reagan and Dominican Prime Minister Charles, October 25, 1983 [15]

Announcement of the Sending of U.S. Troops Into Grenada

THE PRESIDENT. Ladies and gentlemen, on Sunday, October 23d, the United States received an urgent, formal request from the five member nations of the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States to assist in a joint effort to restore order and democracy on the island of Grenada. [16] We acceded to the request to become part of a multinational effort with contingents from Antigua, Barbados, Dominica, Jamaica, St. Lucia, St. Vincent and the United States. I might add that two of those, Barbados and Jamaica, are not members of the organization but were first approached, as we later were, by the OECS and asked to join in that undertaking. And then all of them joined unanimously in asking us to participate.

Early this morning, forces from six Caribbean democracies and the United States began a landing or landings on the island of Grenada in the eastern Caribbean.

We have taken this decisive action for three reasons. First, and of overriding importance, to protect innocent lives, including up to 1,000 Americans whose personal safety is, of course, my paramount concern. Second, to forestall further chaos. And third, to assist in the restoration of conditions of law and order and of governmental institutions to the island of Grenada, where a brutal group of leftist thugs violently seized power, killing the Prime Minister, three Cabinet members, two labor leaders and other civilians, including children.

Let there be no misunderstanding, this collective action has been forced on us by events that have no precedent in the eastern Caribbean and no place in any civilized society.

American lives are at stake. We've been following the situation as closely as possible. Between 800 and 1,000 Americans, including many medical students [17] and senior citizens, make up the largest single group of foreign residents in Grenada.

From the start we have consciously sought to calm fears. We were determined not to make an already bad situation worse and increase the risks our citizens faced. But when I received reports that a large number of our citizens were seeking to escape the island, thereby exposing themselves to great danger, [18] and after receiving a formal request for help, a unanimous request from our neighboring states, I concluded the United States had no choice but to act strongly and decisively.

Let me repeat, the United States objectives are clear, to protect our own citizens, to facilitate the evacuation of those who want to leave and to help in the restoration of democratic institutions in Grenada.

I understand that several Caribbean states are asking that the Organization of American States consider the situation in Grenada.

Our diplomatic efforts will be in close cooperation with the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States and the other countries participating in this multinational effort.

And now I'm very proud to present to you the Chairman of the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States and the Prime Minister of Dominica, Prime Minister Charles.

PRIME MINISTER CHARLES. I think we were all very horrified at the events which took place recently in Grenada.

We, as part of the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States, realizing that we are, of course, one region, we belong to each, are kith and kin. We all have members of our state living in Grenada. We're very concerned that this event should take place again.

It is true that we have managed to live with the regime since March '79.[19] And we felt quite clearly and we had good reason to believe that the Bishop regime was seeing it our way and was on the way to have elections. And we think this is the reason why [he] himself and his Cabinet were destroyed. Because he realized that the pressure we put on him to have elections was worthwhile, was right. And he began to see that the democratic institutions must be put in place in any of these small countries.

It is even more important in a small island state, poor island state, to have the democratic institutions. And this we've had for a long time and we've continued it and we wish to continue it. Grenada was an aberration in this respect.

But that these men, who had for all these years accepted the Bishop regime should then on—for their own reasons, and I think the power-hungry reasons—decide to destroy the persons whom they had accepted as their leaders for so long, made us realize that this sort of assassination must not be allowed to continue in our country. It means that our people there are not safe. It means that Grenadians had never been given the chance to choose for themselves the country that they want. And, therefore, it is necessary for us to see to it that they have the opportunity to do so.

To do this, we have to isolate the persons who have committed the acts that they did last week, in killing off most of the Cabinet. And we have to insure that, in fact, an interim government of persons of—not political greed, but persons who are good administrators and who are Grenadians who can run the country for a few months for the pure purpose of putting the country back on the democratic status, so that elections can take place as soon as possible. This is what you want to do so that Grenadians can choose for themselves the government they want and not have, every few years, have governments imposed on them by persons who will otherwise—

Q. —are all the Americans safe?

Q. Did you have information that the Soviets and the Cubans were behind this takeover of Grenada? Did the Joint Chiefs tell you that yesterday afternoon?

PRIME MINISTER CHARLES. Want me to answer this? Yes, we do have this information. I can't give you all the details because of the safety of people concerned. But we noted with great—in the two weeks before the assassination took place the movements between the Soviet Embassies and known activists and the activists' return to Grenada, obviously a conduit between some of these Russians and some of these—

Q. Mr. President, can you tell us are all the Americans safe, sir? Can you tell us that? And how long will the American forces be on the ground there? What is their role?

[19] On March 13, 1979, the New JEWEL Movement led by Bishop overthrew the government of Prime Minister Eric Gairy. The new regime was recognized by the United States on March 22, 1979.

THE PRESIDENT. I could—well, we don't know how long that will be. We want to be out as quickly as possible, because this—our purpose in being there is only for them to enable—to take over their own affairs. As far as we know, the citizens are safe. We have been monitoring that very closely. And one of our prime objectives in the actual invasion that was almost instantly done was the securing of that St. George's Medical College where several hundred of the students were.

Q. The military situation, sir?

Q. Mr. President, as late as yesterday, your own spokesman said that Americans on Grenada were in no danger.[20] Did you have information that things had changed?

THE PRESIDENT. They were in no danger in the sense of that, right now, anything was being done to them. But we know that there was concern on the part of those, because already we'd been informed of several hundred who wanted to leave. But the airports were closed. There was no way of leaving. This was a case of not waiting until something actually happened to them. But we did manage to get some intelligence out of the island, intelligence information on this. And the tenuous situation was, as I said, the only authority that you could say of a governmental nature on that island was a 24-hour curfew with orders to "shoot on sight" anyone found moving in those 24 hours.

Q. What is the military situation now, sir, in Grenada? Can you tell us?

THE PRESIDENT. I can only tell you that we've secured both the airports. And the landings have been completed. But we are yielding to the influence of General Vessey in that we don't think in these early hours of that landing that we should be on the horn asking the Commanders to stop and give us detailed reports.

Q. Mr. President, do you think that the United States has the right to invade another country to change its government?

PRIME MINISTER CHARLES. But I don't think it's an invasion if I may answer that question.

Q. What is it?

PRIME MINISTER CHARLES. This is a question of our asking for support. We are one region. Grenada is part and parcel of us—an organization.

Q. But you're sovereign nations, are you not?

PRIME MINISTER CHARLES. And we don't have the capacity, ourselves, to see to it that Grenadians get the freedom that they're required to have to choose their own government.

Q. With what's happening in Lebanon, are we spread too thin, Mr. President?

THE PRESIDENT. Wait one second here. No; we're not spread too thin. And let me augment what the Prime Minister just said. Once these nations which were once British colonies were freed, they—themselves—had a treaty.[21] And their treaty was one of mutual support. And Grenada is one of the countries, signatories to that treaty—and observe that treaty at one time when they had a democratic government and a constitution—a constitutional government, the constitution that was left to them by the British. So this action that is being taken is being taken under the umbrella of an existing treaty.

Q. Mr. Reagan, there are reports that a helicopter has been shot down, that a U.S. helicopter has been shot down on Grenada. Do you have any information of any U.S. casualties on the island, sir?

MR. SPEAKES. This is the last question. And we'll cut off after this last question.

Q. Do we have any information of any U.S. casualties on the island, sir?

THE PRESIDENT. No. I have been in meetings. And we both have been busy since we arrived here. And I've only had the first report of our landings and so forth. So I don't know whether that's true or not.

THE PRESS. Thank you, sir.

THE PRESIDENT. What? It has—

Q. What reports have you received, sir—

MR. SPEAKES. No, sir.

Q. —on the success of our operation—of the U.S. Caribbean operation?

THE PRESIDENT. What's that?

Q. What reports have you received of the success of the operation?

THE PRESIDENT. Of the initial operation, of landings, securing the immediate targets, taking control of the airports: completely successful.

Now, the Prime Minister and I are going to depart, but I know there are going to be a lot more technical questions of that kind and Ambassador Motley is here, and I'm going to put him before you to ask all of the technical questions you may have.

Q. What's the situation in Lebanon now?

MR. SPEAKES. I'm sorry. That's the last question.

Q. Could you answer the question, are the Soviets behind this? Were the Soviets behind the Grenada takeover?

MR. SPEAKES. I'm sorry. The President said that's the last question.

THE PRESS. Thank you.

Events Leading to Presidential Decision To Commit U.S. Forces in Grenada

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Good afternoon.

I'd like, first, to cover four points:

—First, the reasons for the President's decision to commit U.S. forces in Grenada;

—Second, our objectives as we undertake this effort;

—Third, the chain of events as they led up to the President's decision in the immediate days preceding it;

—And, fourth, the situation on the ground, very generally, as it was as of about half an hour ago.

There are two basic reasons that determined the President's decision.

First was his concern for the welfare of American citizens living on Grenada. There are roughly a thousand of them. And what we saw was an atmosphere of violent uncertainty: of the Prime Minister of the country first put under house arrest, freed from house arrest by a large number of demonstrators estimated in the thousands, with that demonstration in one way or another becoming attacked, and with the Prime Minister and some of his cabinet members being executed.

We see no responsible government in the country. We see arrests of leading figures. We see a shoot-on-sight curfew in effect.

Reports—their validity uncertain—but reports are rife about arrests, deaths, and so forth, and certainly random sporadic firing that one could hear.

All of these things are part of an atmosphere of violent uncertainty that certainly caused anxiety among U.S. citizens and caused the President to be very concerned about their safety and welfare. He felt that it is better under the circumstances to act before they might be hurt or be hostage than to take any chance, given the great uncertainty clearly present in the situation.

So that is the first reason why the President acted as he did.

Second, the President received an urgent request from the countries closest to the area, the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States, who of course followed these developments very closely over a long period of time, and intensively in recent days, and who determined for themselves that there were developments of grave concern to their safety and peace taking place. They brought in Jamaica and Barbados, and along with those two countries, made a request to the United States to help them in their desire to insure peace and stability in their area. So their analysis of the situation, in terms of the atmosphere of violent uncertainty, paralleled our own.

And so in response to the request of this Organization and in line with a request that they made pursuant to Article VIII of their treaty, [23] bringing them—the states—together, the President decided to respond to their request and to look after the welfare of American citizens in this atmosphere of uncertainty and violence.

Second, insofar as our objectives are concerned, there are basically two, and very simple:

—First of all, to secure the safety of American citizens—and, for that matter, the citizens of other countries—and to assure that any who wish to leave may do so;

—And, second, to help the OECS States establish law and order in the country and establish again governmental institutions responsive to the will of the people of Grenada.

Now third, let me just review very briefly the chain of events here.

I think you undoubtedly know that on October 13, Prime Minister Bishop was placed under house arrest and subsequently on October 19 the demonstration and the freeing of him from house arrest took place, and then his death—our information is by execution—taking place on that date.

On Thursday, October 20, as information about these developments was coming in to us here in the United States, of course the President was receiving them, and he had the Vice President chair a meeting in the Situation Room reviewing these events. That meeting took place in the late afternoon. I was not present at the beginning of the meeting since I was testifying before a Senate committee in closed-door session, but I came in with Ambassador Motley about halfway through the meeting; and essentially it was a meeting to review the grave turn of events and to consider their implications for the American citizens on the island.

Subsequent to that meeting and on the recommendation of that group, the President decided to divert some naval ships in the area, among them the task force that was carrying the group that would be the normal routine replacement of the Marines who are in Lebanon, and diverted them in the direction of Grenada. Other ships were also included. That was essentially precautionary so that if the situation became worse, we would have a capability nearby.

There were various discussions during the course of Friday, but on Saturday, October 22, a message came in from Bridgetown in Barbados. It reached me at 2:45 a.m. in Augusta, and I discussed it with Bud McFarlane. About a half or three-quarters of an hour later, the Vice President convening the key National Security advisers, in Washington, in their discussion, we joined with him through a secure conference call to again evaluate the situation and the information in the cable.

The information in the cable basically gave the OECS states' analysis of the situation, and stated their very strong feeling that they must do something about it on Grenada and their feeling that they were not able to do it on their own, and so they asked if we would help them. I think you should note that by this time they had not only gathered themselves together, but they had brought Barbados and Jamaica in their counsels.

We shortly got the President up and we went through this material with him, and went over the views of various people that were taking part in the Vice President's meeting. The President talked to the Vice President, talked to the Secretary of Defense, heard their views, gave his own reactions.

The meeting chaired by the Vice President reconvened at 9 on Saturday morning. The President spoke to them by telephone. I might say we considered whether or not to return, and we felt that if we were going to respond to this request, then the element of secrecy should be maintained; and if there was a sudden change in the President's plans, it would obviously call great attention to that possibility, so we stayed there.

On Sunday, October 23, of course, that night we received the tragic news from Lebanon of the attack on the Marines, and that stunning news caused the President to decide in the early morning hours that we should return right away to Washington, and we did so.

During the day on Sunday, we met first from 9 to 11, and then again later in the afternoon from 4 to 7.

However, tracking back to the decision on October 22, it was felt that we should explore carefully with the leaders of the OECS and Jamaica and Barbados their information, their analysis, and their intentions. So, Ambassador McNeil and Major General Crist [24] were sent to Bridgetown. They left early Sunday. They met in the afternoon and evening in Barbados with leaders there, and they were on the telephone to us through this period, giving us more information about the evaluation being made in the area and the options that were before us.

It was in the meeting on Sunday, that last meeting on Sunday, that the President made what I think one would call a tentative decision that we should respond to this urgent request, and that particularly so since their analysis and ours was of a very uncertain and violent situation threatening to our citizens.

On Monday, October 24, of course, the plans were being made, the forces organized, and so forth. The President met in the afternoon from roughly 2:15 to 3:30, something like that, with the Secretary of Defense and the Chiefs, and at the conclusion of that meeting, made a sort of semifinal military decision, he having had the advice of all his advisers the previous day that on general grounds we should proceed. I think the directive of the President to proceed was signed at about 6 p.m. yesterday.

That's kind of the chronology.

Finally, where do we stand on the ground? Both airports at Pearls and Port Salinas have been secured. The elements of the Caribbean Task Force, that is, of the countries from the Caribbean, are at Port Salinas. They landed approximately 10:45 this morning. I think there are about 150 there now. The southern campus at the medical college near Port Salinas airport has been secured. There are no reports of injuries to any American civilians.

There are pockets of resistance in the St. Georges area. I don't want to identify further precisely where, because this is an ongoing operation, and the military people need to be able to conduct their operation secure from any such disclosure. So that is the situation on the ground very generally at this point.

Now for your questions.

Q. Mr. Secretary, the Charter of the Organization of American States, of which the United States is a member, provides that, "No state or group of states has the right to intervene directly or indirectly, for any reason whatever, in the internal or external affairs of any other state. This prohibits not only armed force, but also any other form of interference." [25]

Aren't we in violation of that Charter, sir? And if not, why not?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The Organization of Eastern Caribbean States provides for their collective security. Those states are not members of the Rio Treaty, under which the clause that you've mentioned would operate. [26] So they have asserted themselves under their treaty, and asked us to help them.

As they view it, and perhaps you heard Prime Minister Charles today express her views most eloquently, [27] the developments on Grenada pose definite security and peace risks to them, and that is the basis for their desire to act. Some are members of the OAS, but they are not members of the Rio Treaty; and their equivalent of the Rio Treaty is their own treaty.

[24] Francis J. McNeil was the U.S. Ambassador to Costa Rica to July 1983; in August 1983, he became Ambassador in Residence and Research Associate in Public Diplomacy at Tufts University, Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy. In October the Under Secretary for Political Affairs, Lawrence S. Eagleburger, recalled Ambassador McNeil to evaluate the situation in Grenada. Major General George B. Crist was Vice Director of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

[27] Supra.

Q. Mr. Secretary, yesterday, in testifying to the Senate, you said, "At stake is the right of a small country to decide for itself how to achieve its sovereign objectives, free of outside pressure, threat, or blackmail." You were talking about Lebanon there. But why should not that same standard apply to Grenada?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, it does; and in Grenada what you have at the present time is a set of events like this: In 1979, a constitutional government being in power, it was displaced by a bloodless coup, and Prime Minister Bishop has been in charge since that time.

In the events that I described to you, Prime Minister Bishop was placed under house arrest, and then executed. For all intents and purpose, there is no semblance of a genuine government present. There is a vacuum of governmental responsibility—the only genuine evidence of governmental authority being a shoot-on-sight curfew. So in the light of that and in the light of the affinity that the other states feel together, they felt that they had to protect their peace and their security by taking this action and that doing so would help reconstitute legitimate government in Grenada.

Q. Mr. Secretary, do you believe that the Cubans and the Soviets were in any way responsible for the execution of Prime Minister Bishop? And to what extent was the action taken, at least in general terms, as a signal to Havana and Moscow that the United States was prepared to act to protect its own security?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I've tried to give very carefully what the considerations of the President were, and those are the reasons and the considerations for this action. This was not taken as a signal about anything else. It was taken in the light of the threat to the lives and welfare of American citizens and in the light of a request from the local states who are close to the situation and whose analysis of the situation was parallel, and in fact, went a lot further than our own.

Q. About the first part of the question, sir, do you have any reason to believe that the Soviets or the Cubans were in any way responsible for the overthrow of the Bishop government?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. We don't have any direct information on that point. However, the OECS states feel that such is the case. But that is not the basis of this action on our part.

Q. Mr. Secretary, you have said that one of our two objectives there was to help the OECS states establish law and order and governmental institutions. Does that mean that our troops will remain in Grenada until that is done? And what is your time estimate for how long that will take?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Our troops will leave as soon as they possibly can. The forces of the other countries in the Caribbean who have initiated this action will be in the lead and working with Grenadians in trying to establish law and order and some form of provisional government. It will be their decisions to make in seeing how this situation unfolds, and we will leave as soon as we possibly can, leaving the island to those who are closest to it.

Q. Does that mean that our troops will stay there until they are satisfied that law and order has been established—they, the other countries?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I think they will be leaving very, very promptly, and we will have to decide for ourselves what the proper conditions are. We will work with the people from the other governments involved, and they will have a leading role in making these decisions.

I might say that the situation is one in which, in many of these countries, there really is no armed force at all. Prime Minister Charles expressed herself—I might say to the amusement, I guess, of Secretary Weinberger—she said, "When I took office, I decided the worst thing in the world you could have is an army, so I abolished it. I saved myself a lot of money, and I saved conflict between the military and the police force on the Island."

So, that's what they have. And their belief is that the way to have law and order is not to have military establishment, but just a police force. And I imagine that they will work somewhat along those lines, although Grenada has a population of 100,000, so you have to take measures.

I think you have the next question.

Q. Mr. Secretary, the United States has now invaded this island with help from some other area democracies in the Caribbean to save and protect the lives of a thousand people, none of whom so far as we know, I guess, have been injured or killed. Why did it take the deaths of 200 Marines in Beirut to send Commander Kelley there to start thinking about additional preventive, precautionary measures to save those lives?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Of course, we have been concerned about the safety of our Marines all along as they have been there. It didn't take this terrible tragedy to create that concern. I think it is certainly the right thing to do, to have the Commandant of the Marine Corps go promptly to the area and evaluate the security situation in a fresh way. And I think, also, that when you are establishing a presence in an operating, commercial, international airport, naturally, you make decisions that involve some sort of balance between security risks on the one hand, and what it takes for an airport to operate on the other.

I think that, certainly, in the light of the terrible tragedy, that balance needs to be shifted, and the emphasis on security will have to be heightened very significantly. But, of course, we look for General Kelley's report.

I think there is a certain pertinence to your question, because, it seems to me, and the President had to weigh this, with the violent and uncertain atmosphere that certainly was present on Grenada, the question is: Should he act to prevent Americans from being hurt or taken hostage? I think that if he waited and they were taken hostage, or many were killed, then you would be asking me that same question: "Why didn't you in the light of this clear violent situation, take some action to protect American citizens there?"

I don't want to get in the position of second-guessing myself, or the President, but rather to say, one has to weigh these considerations and be willing to take a decision in the light of all of the circumstances, and that is what the President did.

Q. Mr. Secretary, as you know, Grenada is a former British colony, and the Governor-General there was appointed by the British, the person you spoke of a while ago. Mrs. Thatcher has said in Parliament over there that their government advised against this and that the British did not wish to go along with it. [28]

I would like to ask you two things flowing from that. First of all, does the fact that the British do not go along with it cause some cloud over the Governor-General, the British-appointed person now being the one we look to? And, secondly, in view of their experience on the island, why did the United States disregard their recommendation?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. We responded to the urgent request of the states in the area, which are now independent states. They're no longer British colonies. Although obviously the British have had great experience there, so have we. The Caribbean is in our neighborhood, too, so we have a very legitimate affinity for those people.

We responded to their request just as Barbados and Jamaica did. British or other states that may or may not have been asked—I don't have the list of who the OECS asked to help them. But each state has to take its own decision, and the President took ours.

As far as the establishment of authority on the island is concerned, we believe that the Governor-General is the logical person, given the fact that there is a vacuum of government there, and we expect that it will occur that way. We are, of course, always impressed with the views of the British Government and Mrs. Thatcher, but that doesn't mean that we always have to agree with them. Of course, we also have to make decisions in the light of the security situation of our citizens as we see it.

Q. Mr. Secretary, can you give us a report on casualties, including whether there have been Cuban casualties in combat with Americans, and the status of the Cubans and the Soviets on the island?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I can't give you an account of casualties. I don't have that information at hand, but it will be made available as soon as we have it. I think probably the appropriate place, since they have it, is at the Pentagon.

READEX FICHE

As far as the Soviet Union and Cuba are concerned, as the operation got underway, we notified both the Soviet Union and Cuba of the fact of the operation, of our intentions, and of our readiness to look to the safety of their people on the island. It's my understanding that the Soviets that are there have been identified; they are safe, and their safety is being looked to. On the other hand, in the case of the Cubans, there are many more there. I think there are some 600 Cubans there. Presumably, construction workers. But it is the case that some number—I don't know how many, and perhaps the military don't know at this point how many—are resisting and firing at our forces and, of course, that would cause us to fire back.

Q. I would like to ask two questions. One factual and one more philosophical. Who is in charge of Grenada tonight? I mean, at this minute? Where is Mr. Austin? Are we running the country, or are they still running the country? And, secondly, even though your intention may not have been to send a message, do you think anybody in the Caribbean or anywhere else in the world gets a message from this action?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I don't. I can't identify the whereabouts of Mr. Austin who was not genuinely in charge insofar as we could see, in any case.

As far as who is running the country is concerned, the country has been in a state since the house arrest of Prime Minister Bishop, essentially, of a kind of vacuum of governmental authority. And that still exists although as the forces of the Caribbean task force are able to develop their contacts there, presumably a governmental structure will emerge.

As far as your philosophic question is concerned, of course, those who want to receive a message will have to receive it. That was not the purpose of this operation. The purpose was as I have stated it.

Q. Traditionally, in this part of the world, there's been a great concern about Yankee force, Yankee imperialism, Yankee aggression, et cetera.

How do you plan—how do you intend to counter the impression that the United States is once again using its overwhelming military superiority in this part of the world to achieve a specific, political objective?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I think the principal point here is that the concerns and the requests for help came from the states in the region, and they have put their own forces into this picture. The fact that their forces are small in comparison with ours is only a reflection of the fact that they don't invest very much in the way of resources into military capability; and, of course, they don't have much to invest in the first place. It's in the nature of these countries that they're essentially peaceful. But they have put what they can of their own forces forward, and they have taken the lead in suggesting this, and they are there now in the early stages of this effort. And as law and order returns, they will basically be in charge; not us. So it is no effort on our part to gain control of any other country.

Q. Mr. Secretary, if I can just follow up. The British, who have been critical of this action, took an independent action against the Falklands last year when they thought it was necessary.

If they cannot accept the American justification, how do you think, or how many countries in Latin America do you feel will accept the American explanation now?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Certainly, Jamaica, Barbados, and the Caribbean states are involved. They have asked us very explicitly, not only in the first instances I brought out, but on further probing from Ambassador McNeil, to really be sure that they had analyzed the situation carefully and they were making a thoughtful and thoroughly thought-through request, which they were and are.

I think that's the thing you have to rest on, and it seems to me people ought to recognize where this request came from; and, also, the fact that we will leave promptly. We have no intention of staying there, and the government that will be produced by the people of Grenada is entirely up to them as far as we're concerned.

Q. Just to clear up one thing, Mr. Secretary, you said that there were contacts with the Cubans and with the Soviet Union to inform them of what we were about to do, or had just done. Had there been any contacts at any level since then, and what have you heard from the Soviet Union about this?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I don't want to go into detail about diplomatic exchanges. But, of course, in general, their response has been that they expect us to look to the safety of their citizens. And certainly, as one might expect, they object strenuously to this action. [29]

The boss says I have to go. I have to go up to the House and talk to them and then the Senate. So I'm on my way to the Congress.

Letter From President Reagan to the Speaker of the House of Representatives (O'Neill), October 25, 1983 [30]

President's Report to Congress on Deployment of U.S. Troops in Grenada

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: On October 12, a violent series of events in Grenada was set in motion, which led to the murder of Prime Minister Maurice Bishop and a number of his Cabinet colleagues, as well as the deaths of a number of civilians. Over 40 killings were reported. There was no government ensuring the protection of life and property and restoring law and order. The only indication of authority was an announcement that a barbaric shoot-to-kill curfew was in effect. Under these circumstances, we were necessarily concerned about the safety of innocent lives on the island, including those of up to 1,000 United States citizens.

The Organization of Eastern Caribbean States (OECS) became seriously concerned by the deteriorating conditions in the member State of Grenada. The other members of the OECS are Antigua, Dominica, Montserrat, St. Kitts/Nevis, Saint Lucia, and Saint Vincent and the Grenadines. We were formally advised that the Authority of Heads of Government of Member States of the OECS, acting pursuant to the Treaty establishing the OECS, met in emergency session on October 21. The meeting took note of the anarchic conditions and the serious violations of human rights and bloodshed that had occurred, and the consequent unprecedented threat to the peace and security of the region created by the vacuum of authority in Grenada. The OECS determined to take immediate, necessary steps to restore order in Grenada so as to protect against further loss of life, pending the restoration of effective governmental institutions. To this end, the OECS formed a collective security force comprising elements from member States to restore order in Grenada and requested the immediate cooperation of a number of friendly countries, including the governments of Barbados, Jamaica and the United States, in these efforts. In response to this call for assistance and in view of the overriding importance of protecting the lives of the United States citizens in Grenada, I have authorized the Armed Forces of the United States to participate along with these other nations in this collective security force.

In accordance with my desire that the Congress be informed on this matter, and consistent with the War Powers Resolution, [31] I am providing this report on this deployment of the United States Armed Forces.

Today at about 5 a.m. eastern daylight time, approximately 1,900 United States Army and United States Marine Corps personnel began landing in Grenada. They were supported by elements of the United States Navy and the United States Air Force. Member States of the OECS along with Jamaica and Barbados are providing approximately 300 personnel. This deployment of United States Armed Forces is being undertaken pursuant to my constitutional authority with respect to the conduct of foreign relations and as Commander in Chief of the United States Armed Forces. Although it is not possible at this time to predict the duration of the temporary presence of United States Armed Forces in Grenada, our objectives in providing this support are clear. They are to join the OECS collective security forces in assisting the restoration of conditions of law and order and of governmental institutions to the island of Grenada, and to facilitate the protection and evacuation of United States citizens. Our forces will remain only so long as their presence is required.

Statement by the Representative at the Organization of American States (Middendorf) Before a Special Meeting of the Permanent Council of the Organization of American States, October 26, 1983 [33]

U.S. Explanation of Its Actions and Objectives in Grenada

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The U.S. Delegation would like to thank the distinguished Prime Minister of Dominica [34] for her initiative in requesting a protocolary meeting of the Permanent Council this morning. Her remarks clearly detail the grave concerns which motivated the actions of her government and other Caribbean states.

As our colleague from Saint Lucia pointed out just now, the decision to undertake this initiative was made jointly by the OECS acting pursuant to the Treaty establishing that organization. The appeal to other countries, including ourselves, the United States, for assistance was made on October 23. [35] Barbados and Jamaica, to whom a similar request for assistance was made, also responded favorably.

Pursuant to this decision, a collective security force made up of contingents from four member states of the OECS—Antigua, Dominica, Saint Lucia, and Saint Vincent—supplemented by units from Barbados, Jamaica, and the United States, disembarked on Grenada yesterday at dawn. Fortunately, there has been little loss of life, and internal order is being restored to the island. Earlier today—to correct a statement made earlier—about 140 citizens, many of whom had been studying in Grenada, were flown to the United States. Consular officers of the Department of State are in Grenada now to facilitate the orderly evacuation of others who desire to leave.

Let me review the extraordinary events in Grenada leading to this unprecedented situation. The slide toward anarchy in Grenada appears to have begun the evening of October 12 with an attempt by Deputy Prime Minister Coard to force out Prime Minister Maurice Bishop. Bishop, who had seized power in 1979 and established close relations with Cuba and the Soviet Union, was reportedly thought to be too "moderate" by the Coard faction.

The power struggle became increasingly violent. On October 19, Prime Minister Bishop, several Cabinet members, and an undetermined number of political and civic leaders were killed under still unexplained circumstances. At least 18 deaths have been confirmed and many more reported, some of them when troops opened fire on peaceful demonstrators.

After Bishop's death—and we recall his visit here in a protocolary meeting on proved, by a vote of 33 to 2, House Joint Resolution 402. It passed the House of Representatives on November 1, 1983, by a vote of 403 to 23. This resolution reads:

"Declaring that the requirements of section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution became operative on October 25, 1983, when United States Armed Forces were introduced into Grenada.

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for purposes of section 5(b) of the War Powers Resolution, the Congress hereby determines that the requirements of section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution became operative on October 25, 1983, when United States Armed Forces were introduced into Grenada."

The Senate had not taken action on the resolution by the end of the year.

[34] Eugenia Charles. Prime Minister Charles was also chairperson of the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States.

[35] See document 656.

June 1—the People's Revolutionary Army (PRA) announced the dissolution of the existing Government and the formation of a 16-member Revolutionary Military Council of which PRA Commander General Hudson Austin was the nominal head. I say "nominal" because it was not at all clear that Austin or any coherent group was in fact in charge. There were numerous reports of continued jockeying for power, and the potential for further violence was obvious, especially with the imposition of a 24-hour shoot-on-sight curfew. The Revolutionary Military Council itself stated that it did not purport to be a government.

I think it is this quality of menacing uncertainty—the violence, the violations of human rights, the disintegration of civilized governmental authority, the creation of a dynamic that held out the distinct prospect of further violence—that most alarmed the Eastern Caribbean states and led to their October 23 decision to assist the people of Grenada and request our help in doing so.

My government shared these concerns of the OECS countries but also had a particularly humanitarian concern. The deteriorating conditions on the island posed a threat to the continued safety of U.S. citizens living there, who number 800 to 1,000, largely medical school students and faculty. While there had been no specific threats against U.S. citizens, a number had already sought to flee, in the absence of organized evacuation efforts at great risk. The Military Council on the island had promised to reopen the airport on October 24 but did not do so, thus heightening concern over the continued welfare of these citizens. The lack of respect for human rights and the degenerating conditions, of course, also posed a threat to other foreign nationals and, indeed, to the people of Grenada.

After carefully considering these facts and all aspects of the OECS request, concluding that the peace and security of the Eastern Caribbean was threatened and that our assistance was necessary, President Reagan decided to cooperate with the regional initiative. Such humanitarian action has long been recognized as consistent with international law.

The objectives of the collective security force organized by the OECS are clear: to restore law and order, to help the people of Grenada restore functioning institutions of government, and to facilitate the departure of those who wish to leave. The presence of the collective security force will be continued for only so long as it is necessary to ensure these objectives.

This action is a reasonable and proportionate reaction to the deterioration of authority in Grenada and to the threat that this poses to the peace and security of the Eastern Caribbean. It is consistent with the purposes and principles of the Charters of the United Nations and the OAS, since it aims at the restoration of conditions of law and order fundamental to the enjoyment of basic human rights, so clearly in jeopardy in Grenada.

Regional collective security measures of the kind taken here are expressly contemplated by Article 52 of the UN Charter. Paragraph 1 of that article provides for "regional arrangements or agencies dealing with such matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security as are appropriate for regional action, provided that such arrangements or agencies and their activities are consistent with the purposes and principles of the United Nations." The actions and objectives of the collective security force, in the circumstances described above, are consistent with these purposes and principles.

Articles 22 and 28 of the OAS Charter allow member states to take collective measures to maintain peace and security pursuant to certain collective security agreements. Article 22 of the OAS Charter expressly provides that measures taken pursuant to such agreements are not violations of the provisions of Articles 18 and 20 prohibiting intervention or the use of force. [36]

The OECS Treaty is a regional agreement which concerns itself in part with matters of collective security. The OECS countries are not party to the Rio Treaty; the OECS Treaty serves as their regional security arrangement. The OECS action was pursuant to Article 8 of the OECS Treaty, [37] which authorizes the OECS to coordinate "the efforts of member states for collective defence and the preservation of peace and security." The OECS decision was, thus, a measure "adopted for the maintenance of peace and security in accordance with existing treaties," as contemplated by Article 22 of the OAS Charter.

In addition, the OECS members were confronted by a "situation that might endanger the peace of America." In response, the OECS members took action consistent with Article 28's provision for "collective self-defense" in accordance with "measures and procedures established in the special treaties on the subject."

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I would like to point to a disturbing lesson which we can all draw from the tragic events in Grenada. We have seen how Cuban construction workers on that island suddenly transformed themselves into armed soldiers to resist the collective action forces. Plowshares were quickly transformed into swords. This development must be a source of concern to all states and cast doubt on the bona fides of Cuban "civilian" advisers and contingents elsewhere. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Address by President Reagan, October 27, 1983 (Extract) [38]

"[Grenada] Was a Soviet-Cuban Colony Being Readied . . . To Export Terrorism and Undermine Democracy. We Got There Just in Time"

. . . . . .

Now I know another part of the world is very much on our minds, a place much closer to our shores: Grenada. The island is only twice the size of the District of Columbia with a total population of about 110,000 people.

Grenada and a half dozen other Caribbean islands here were, until recently, British colonies. They are now independent states and members of the British Commonwealth. While they respect each other's independence, they also feel a kinship with each other and think of themselves as one people.

In 1979 trouble came to Grenada. Maurice Bishop, a protege of Fidel Castro, staged a military coup and overthrew the government which had been elected under the Constitution left to the people by the British. He sought the help of Cuba in building an airport, which he claimed was for tourist trade, but which looked suspiciously suitable for military aircraft, including Soviet-built long-range bombers.

The six sovereign countries and one remaining colony are joined together in what they call the "Organization of Eastern Caribbean States." The six became increasingly alarmed as Bishop built an army greater than all of theirs combined. Obviously, it was not purely for defense.

In this last year or so, Prime Minister Bishop gave indications that he might like better relations with the United States. He even made a trip to our country and met with senior officials of the White House and the State Department. Whether he was serious or not, we'll never know. On October 12th, a small group in his militia seized him and put him under arrest. They were, if anything, more radical and more devoted to Castro's Cuba than he had been.

Several days later, a crowd of citizens appeared before Bishop's home, freed him, and escorted him toward the headquarters of the military council. They were fired upon. A number, including some children, were killed and Bishop was seized. He and several members of his Cabinet were subsequently executed, and a 24-hour shoot-to-kill curfew was put in effect. Grenada was without a government, its only authority exercised by a self-proclaimed band of military men.

The address began at 8 p.m. and was broadcast live nationwide on television and radio from the Oval Office of the White House.

There were then about 1,000 of our citizens on Grenada, 800 of them students in St. Georges University Medical School. Concerned that they would be harmed or held as hostages, I ordered a flotilla of ships, then on its way to Lebanon with Marines—part of our regular rotation program, to circle south on a course that would put them somewhere in the vicinity of Grenada in case there should be a need to evacuate our people.

Last weekend, I was awakened in the early morning hours and told that six members of the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States, joined by Jamaica and Barbados, had sent an urgent request that we join them in a military operation to restore order and democracy to Grenada.

They were proposing this action under the terms of a treaty, a mutual assistance pact that existed among them. These small, peaceful nations needed our help. Three of them don't have armies at all, and the others have very limited forces. The legitimacy of their request, plus my own concern for our citizens, dictated my decision. I believe our government has a responsibility to go to the aid of its citizens, if their right to life and liberty is threatened. The nightmare of our hostages in Iran must never be repeated.

We knew we had little time and that complete secrecy was vital to ensure both the safety of the young men who would undertake this mission, and the Americans they were about to rescue. The Joint Chiefs worked around the clock to come up with a plan. They had little intelligence information about conditions on the island. We had to assume that several hundred Cubans working on the airport could be military reserves. As it turned out, the number was much larger and they were a military force. Six hundred of them have been taken prisoner, and we have discovered a complete base with weapons and communications equipment which makes it clear a Cuban occupation of the island had been planned.

Two hours ago we released the first photos from Grenada. They included pictures of a warehouse of military equipment—one of three we've uncovered so far. This warehouse contained weapons and ammunition stacked almost to the ceiling, enough to supply thousands of terrorists. Grenada, we were told, was a friendly island paradise for tourism. Well, it wasn't. It was a Soviet-Cuban colony, being readied as a major military bastion to export terror and undermine democracy. We got there just in time.

I can't say enough in praise of our military—Army rangers and paratroopers, Navy, Marine, and Air Force personnel—those who planned a brilliant campaign, and those who carried it out. Almost instantly, our military seized the two airports, secured the campus where most of our students were, and are now in the mopping-up phase. It should be noted that in all the planning, a top priority was to minimize risk, to avoid casualties to our own men and also the Grenadian forces as much as humanly possible. But there were casualties, and we all owe a debt to those who lost their lives or were wounded. They were few in number, but even one is a tragic price to pay.

It's our intention to get our men out as soon as possible. Prime Minister Eugenia Charles of Dominica—I called that wrong, she pronounces it Dominica—she is chairman of OECS. She's calling for help from Commonwealth nations in giving the people their right to establish a constitutional government on Grenada. We anticipate that the Governor General, a Grenadian, will participate in setting up a provisional government in the interim.

The events in Lebanon and Grenada, though oceans apart, are closely related. Not only has Moscow assisted and encouraged the violence in both countries, but it provides direct support through a network of surrogates and terrorists. It is no coincidence that when the thugs tried to wrest control over Grenada, there were 30 Soviet advisors and hundreds of Cuban military and paramilitary forces on the island. At the moment of our landing, we communicated with the governments of Cuba and the Soviet Union and told them we would offer shelter and security to their people on Grenada. Regrettably, Castro ordered his men to fight to the death and some did. The others will be sent to their homelands.

You know, there was a time when our national security was based on the standing army here within our own borders and shore batteries of artillery along our coasts. And, of course, a Navy to keep the sea lanes open for the shipping of things necessary to our well-being.

The world has changed. Today, our national security can be threatened in far away places. It is up to all of us to be aware of the strategic importance of such places and to be able to identify them. Sam Rayburn [39] once said that freedom is not something a nation can work for once and win forever. He said it's like an insurance policy; it's premiums must be kept up to date. In order to keep it, we have to keep working for it and sacrificing for it just as long as we live. If we do not, our children may not know the pleasure of working to keep it, for it may not be theirs to keep.

In these last few days, I have been more sure than I've ever been that we Americans of today will keep freedom and maintain peace. I've been made to feel that by the magnificent spirit of our young men and women in uniform and by something here in our nation's capital. In this city, where political strife is so much a part of our lives, I've seen Democratic leaders in the Congress join their Republican colleagues, send a message to the world that we're all Americans before we're anything else, and when our country is threatened, we stand shoulder to shoulder in support of our men and women in the Armed Forces.

U.N. Security Council Draft Resolution, October 27, 1983 [40]

Condemnation of "Armed Intervention in Grenada"

The Security Council,

Having heard the statements made in connection with the situation in Grenada,

Recalling the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States, [41]

Recalling also the principles concerning the inadmissibility of intervention and interference in the internal affairs of States, [42]

Reaffirming the sovereign and inalienable right of Grenada freely to determine its own political, economic and social system, and to develop its international relations without outside intervention, interference, subversion, coercion or threat in any form whatsoever,

Deeply deploring the events in Grenada which led to the killing of the Prime Minister, Mr. Maurice Bishop, and other prominent Grenadians,

Bearing in mind that, in accordance with Article 2, paragraph 4, of the Charter of the United Nations, all Member States are obliged to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State or to act in any other manner inconsistent with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations,

Gravely concerned at the military intervention taking place and determined to ensure a speedy return to normalcy in Grenada,

Conscious of the need for States to show consistent respect for the principles of the Charter of the United Nations,

1. Deeply deplores the armed intervention in Grenada, which constitutes a flagrant violation of international law and of the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of that State;

Transcript of an Interview With the Representative at the United Nations (Kirkpatrick), October 30, 1983 [43]

International Reaction to Grenada Mission

MR. KALB. Our guest today on "Meet the Press" is Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick, head of the U.S. Delegation to the United Nations. A political scientist and specialist in Latin American politics, Ambassador Kirkpatrick has played a key role in shaping administration policies in that region. She holds Cabinet rank and is a member of the National Security Council.

Our reporters today are Henry Trewhitt, of the Baltimore Sun; Robert Novak, of the Chicago Sun-Times; Hedrick Smith, of the New York Times; and to open the questioning, our regular panelist, Bill Monroe of NBC News.

MR. MONROE. Madam Ambassador, the New York Times says this morning that the U.S. will pay a heavy cost for the invasion of Grenada. Quoting the Times editorial, ". . . the cost is loss of the moral high ground: a . . . demonstration to the world that America has no more respect for laws and borders, for the codes of civilization, than the Soviet Union." What is your feeling about the cost?

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. I think the New York Times—With all due respect, I think the New York Times is simply wrong. I think, in fact, that the—those nations who may seriously feel that it was an immoral act already thought we were an immoral power. I expect that most of the nations in the region will breathe a sigh of relief, as a matter of fact, at the success of the operation and at the removal of what a good many of them recognize was a clear and present danger to their own security.

I think that, furthermore, the feeling of enhanced security and the certain knowledge that the legal grounds of our operation were sound will prove to be much stronger than any kind of reflexive Latin disapproval of U.S. intervention any place in the region.

It's interesting to note that the countries of Central America, with the single exception of Nicaragua, and several of the most key countries in Latin America have been very mild and ambiguous and ambivalent in their comments on the action, because they understand the extent to which their security depends on a confident, strong American presence.

MR. MONROE. Well, Mrs. Kirkpatrick, not a single nation except those allied with us in the action against Grenada have spoken up in our defense. The French and the Dutch voted against us in the Security Council; [44] the Mexicans and other members of the OAS have criticized us. Can you cite a single provision of international law, the United Nations, the Organization of American States, under which we have the right to invade a nation like Grenada if we feel there's chaos there or we worry that some of our people may be in danger?

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. Oh, certainly. And let me just say that I did that in my speech before the U.N., in which I presented the U.S. case. [45] I said that the U.N. Charter does not simply forbid the use of force under all circumstances as an absolute. The U.N. Charter leaves very ample grounds for the use of force against force in protection of the other rights and values in the Charter. Those other values include security and peace and democracy, in fact, even in the U.N. Charter. We acted, of course, at the request of the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States. We acted—You say "not a single nation." If I may say so, that's also mistaken. We acted with the full approval of other key nations in the Caribbean. Jamaica and Barbados, for example, also participated in the action.

MR. MONROE. Those six.

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. Those six, yes, but those are the key states in the region.

(Announcements)

MR. SMITH. Madam Ambassador, you say the legal argument for our going into Grenada is sound. If that's the case, why hasn't it been more persuasive with old allies, like the British, the French, the West Germans, the Italians, all of whom have either criticized us or voted against us in the U.N.?

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. Let me say that the—our European allies are principally, I believe, allied with us on matters that concern the defense of Europe. NATO was one of the collective security agreements which President Harry Truman negotiated and the Congress ratified after World War II, but it was only one of those. They do not necessarily show very much sensitivity to U.S. security in other regions, and we don't necessarily approve of their policies all the time. The fact is that we Americans have a somewhat sentimental picture about our relations with our European allies in international affairs. That alliance has always been focused on the defense of Europe, and they have repeatedly undertaken actions without consulting with us, for example, in other parts of the world. Sometimes we don't approve of those actions either. And we undertake actions independently of them, and sometimes they don't approve of those.

This is an action which above all concerned our region, our region geographically. It's only—It was not at all involved in NATO. It's importantly related, I think, to our ability to fulfill our NATO obligations in the long run, but in an indirect kind of way.

I think what's important is that the states of the region who were concerned approved the action and, indeed, requested it, and wouldn't necessarily approve what we did in—to help in the defense of Europe.

MR. SMITH. You say that they're mainly focused on Europe, but we backed the British when they were involved in the battle of the Falklands Islands, very much involving Latin America. The British didn't back us on this one. How do you explain that, and how do you react to that?

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. Well, frankly, I find that rather difficult to explain.

MR. SMITH. What message are the Nicaraguans and others in Central America supposed to get from this action? Does Nicaragua now have to worry about American intervention down there? Should they? Is that the intended message?

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. If I may say so, Nicaragua worries all the time about U.S. intervention in Nicaragua. From the perspective in the U.N., I'm very sensitive to that, because every few months they come to the U.N. and say that we are about to launch a massive U.S. military invasion of Nicaragua. They did that first about a year-and-a-half ago. I think that Nicaragua feels continuously threatened, and what they feel threatened by is the growing competence and confidence of their own neighbors—of Honduras, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala—and by the Contadora process, which has now worked out some points, many of which are not very acceptable to Nicaragua. [46]

MR. NOVAK. Ambassador Kirkpatrick, if there had not been one American student on the island of Grenada, or no substantial number of them, do you think this administration would have launched the operation at the request of the Eastern Caribbean states?

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. I don't know. I argued in the United Nations that I believed there was a combination of factors, each of which played a significant role in our decision, legal factors, and—each of which figure in the legal case for our action.

First was indeed, as the President has emphasized, Secretary Shultz has emphasized, the protection of innocent American nationals, some—nearly a thousand of them on that island and in a highly vulnerable condition. Second was the request of the Organization of East Caribbean States. Third was the virtual vacuum of power on the island and—which was accompanied by very great violence.

MR. NOVAK. Let me re-phrase it, Madam Ambassador. If there were no American nationals in substantial numbers, was there ample justification on these other reasons for launching the operation?

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. That's one of what my husband calls what-would-you-do-if-your - grandmother - died - next - Thursday questions. You know, I don't know. I haven't addressed that question very specifically. I know that the importance—that the defense of American nationals on the island figured very importantly in the President's decision.

MR. NOVAK. I wonder if I could quickly switch to Lebanon. As Ambassador to the United Nations, would you favor the replacement of the American Marines by a United Nations peacekeeping force?

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. Oh, under the right circumstances, with the right mandate, of course. I'm sure you know that the United States and the other members of the multinational force have explored at the U.N. ways of introducing UNIFIL troops in, the United Nations troops, into the region of the Chouf, and the Bekka, and other highly controverted areas of Beirut—of Lebanon, in and around Beirut.

The Soviet Union is a member of the United Nations Security Council with a veto power. They have not been enthusiastic about permitting U.N. troops into any area in which it looks like one of their client states, or close associates at least, which Syria is, might move. And so they've been very, very negative about any such move. I personally think that U.N. peacekeeping forces could do a very valuable job there.

MR. TREWHITT. Mrs. Kirkpatrick, you mentioned earlier that the allies in Europe were concerned first of all about issues that were related to NATO European defense. How does the Grenada invasion play in that regard, do you think? Is it going to change the attitude of allied governments regarding the deployment of INF weapons in Europe, that sort of thing?

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. No, I don't think so, I think that those questions are going to be settled on the basis of European considerations.

MR. TREWHITT. What about European publics, which have been very vocal against INF deployments? How much ammunition does an event such as this give them?

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. I think that the question of deployments, missile deployments in Europe will be settled on the basis of European considerations, European security, finally. I really, truly do. I think that the Soviet and related—domestic Communist Party propaganda apparatuses in those governments, in those countries—excuse me—in those countries is sufficiently effective that they find grounds for attacking us and casting doubts and aspersions on our motives and on our behavior virtually regardless of what we do, frankly.

MR. TREWHITT. I'm going to do a quick 180 degree turn here, because I may not have another chance to ask you about your personal plans. I've heard you nominated for everything from immediate retirement to Secretary of State. Are you preparing to leave the United Nations?

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. I'm not preparing anything.

MR. TREWHITT. Do you plan to stay in office till the end of this term?

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. I'm not pre—I'm not given to long-range planning.

MR. KALB. Madam Ambassador, I'd like to go back to Grenada and try to rephrase a question asked earlier. Most people, I think, have praised the President in terms of trying to protect American lives on Grenada. The issue that comes up is whether the United States can arrogate to itself the right, because of its military power in Latin America, to change a government there, to overthrow a government there. How do you respond to that?

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. I think that, like all questions of politics and international affairs and law, one has to look at the concrete circumstances and not at the abstract question. I think that given the concrete circumstances in Grenada, that the legal, as well as the moral and political case for our action, was very strong. I think that we would have to look at other concrete cases to make decisions about what would be justified in other concrete cases.

MR. KALB. But you're a specialist in this area. You know the long shadow likely to be cast by another use of massive American military power to accomplish a political aim. Does this bother you? Are you concerned about this?

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. Quite frankly, as a specialist in the area, I am not, and I will tell you why. I was in Venezuela two years ago, and a very high level official in that government, who shall go nameless, looked at a map of the region. It showed Grenada and Venezuela. They were 90 miles apart, and he drew a circle from Grenada, which circle was—reflected the range of a MIG leaving Grenada to show what kind of control of air—how far that MIG could attain, how far over Venezuela that MIG could get from Grenada. I have had other Latin officials show me, in very concrete terms, where the sea lanes—what it meant to the sea lanes, through which all shipping that passes through the Panama Canal into the Atlantic pass, with regard to Grenada.

I have been just recently in Central America, and I have listened to very high level officials and influential private sector journalists, publishers, writers, teachers, businessmen, all kinds of people—labor leaders—in those countries worry desperately about the vulnerability of their governments and their countries to the growing superior and aggressive force of Nicaragua in the region. I do not, quite frankly, believe that this use—limited, specific, purposeful—of force by the United States, in conjunction with the other states in the region, is going to produce the sort of backlash that you're describing in the area, and I do say that most earnestly, as someone with a longstanding interest in this area.

MR. MONROE. Many Americans support the administration action in Grenada, but I wonder if you're saying that that action, that military success, had no moral cost, no public opinion cost, in view of the unanimity shown by nations at the United Nations, at the Organization of American States, against the action we took, with the exception of the U.S. and the six Caribbean islands?

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. Now wait a minute. Let's not say that there was unanimity, because there wasn't unanimity. There wasn't unanimity at all, and what there was was a Security Council vote, which was heavily against us.

MR. MONROE. Eleven to one.

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. But let me remind you—with three abstentions—let me remind you that there are—the United States regularly loses in the United Nations, in the General Assembly and in the Security Council. No nation is more regularly both a loser and a victim at the United Nations than the United States except Israel, who is even more totally a loser and a victim.

The United Nations is a political system, and it's a political system which is largely controlled by our adversaries. I've been talking about this ever since I've been there. It is not news when the United States is outvoted at the United Nations. It only becomes news when, for some reason or another, we're able to eke out a victory in some U.N.—

MR. MONROE. In view of the international reaction to this situation in Grenada, with nations such as the French, the Dutch, the Pakistanis, the Mexicans, and others obviously condemnatory of what we have done, are you telling us that there was no moral cost and no public opinion cost to that action?

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. Mr. Monroe, I'm telling you that I don't think there's any moral cost to that action. I'll go beyond that and say that I don't think there's any moral cost in France with the French government. I would say that there are at least as many Frenchmen, attentive Frenchmen who are shocked by the decision of their government to vote for that resolution as who support it. If you follow the French press, which I do all the time, let me say, I think that's quite clear. Many Frenchmen see our action in Grenada as at least as defensible, and perhaps even more understandable, morally, politically, legally, as France's action, for example, in Chad to help protect that country against terror.

MR. SMITH. Madam Ambassador, you've made a major point, and so has the President, about protecting American citizens on Grenada, and certainly Americans here want to see that done. But there are some who contend that not all was done before the invasion to get them out peacefully, that the airport in Grenada was open on the Monday before the invasion. Wasn't there more that the United States could have done peacefully to evacuate Americans without an invasion?

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. All I can say is that, one, I don't think it was an invasion; I think it was a rescue. And I think that we ought to stop calling it an invasion, if I may say so. It was a rescue operation, and it was felt and recognized to be such by most of the Americans involved. I don't doubt that you can find one or two or three who think the contrary. It was, I believe, well-handled. We had to behave very prudently, because it was also very clear that those—that there was proximate, real danger already posed to those—particularly to those students, as well as to the Governor-General, I think, in Grenada.

MR. SMITH. What do you say to the 30 or 40 people who came out by air on Monday from Grenada peacefully, some of them Americans, one of them director of the President's Commission on Social Security?

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. They were fortunate.

MR. NOVAK. Ambassador Kirkpatrick, a week ago today the Washington Post had a front page story which described you as embittered, and referred to what they said you believed to be the "weak and rudderless leadership of Secretary of State George Shultz." Is that a correct characterization of your attitude toward the Secretary of State?

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. I'm glad you raised that question. I would like to say that about 90 percent of what's been published about me and the Secretary of State or any other figure in our government or any other post in our government in the last two weeks has been really hopelessly distorted.

MR. NOVAK. What about this—

MR. KALB. Two minutes to go.

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. That one is one of those. That is—I mean it is just simply not an accurate characterization of my views at all.

MR. NOVAK. Do you consider yourself embittered because—

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. No, not at all, not at all. I mean—you know, this was, Bob, a media event, which I still don't understand quite, either. I don't understand who scripted it, and I don't understand who pushed it. I just know that it was largely not so. I consider it behind me.

MR. TREWHITT. Mrs. Kirkpatrick, you just, a few minutes ago, made a fairly strong case for the position that the United States is consistently belabored and in the minority in the United Nations. Is there any plan to grade down U.S. participation in the United Nations? And if not, why not, in those circumstances, if that is a correct characterization of our role?

AMB. KIRKPATRICK. I've said it many times since I've been there, Mr. Trewhitt, I think what we have to do is be more effective in the United Nations. We let our influence in that body and our effectiveness in that body decline through a period of probably 20 years. We failed to understand what kind of a political system it is, and we have failed above all to adequately link our relations with nations inside the U.N. to our relations with nations outside the U.N.

The fact is a good many of the nations with whom we have very good relations outside the U.N. behave very badly toward us regularly, on a wide range of issues, inside the U.N. I think we need to let nations know that if they want to be friends of ours outside the U.N., they need to behave like friends inside U.N. bodies as well. That, I think, is the answer.

MR. KALB. Thank you, Ambassador Kirkpatrick, for being with us today on "Meet the Press."

Resolution 38/7, Adopted by the U.N. General Assembly, November 2, 1983 [47]

Call For "Immediate Cessation of the Armed Intervention and the Immediate Withdrawal of the Foreign Troops From Grenada"

The General Assembly,

Considering the statements made before the Security Council in connection with the situation in Grenada,

Recalling the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, [48]

Recalling also the Declaration on the Inadmissibility of Intervention and Interference in the Internal Affairs of States, [49]

Reaffirming the sovereign and inalienable right of Grenada freely to determine its own political, economic and social system, and to develop its international relations without outside intervention, interference, subversion, coercion or threat in any form whatsoever,

Deeply deploring the events in Grenada which led to the killing of the Prime Minister, Mr. Maurice Bishop, and other prominent Grenadians,

Bearing in mind that, in accordance with Article 2, paragraph 4, of the Charter of the United Nations, all Member States are obliged to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State or to act in any other manner inconsistent with the principles of the Charter,

Gravely concerned at the military intervention taking place and determined to ensure a speedy return to normalcy in Grenada,

Conscious of the need for States to show consistent respect for the principles of the Charter,

1. Deeply deplores the armed intervention in Grenada, which constitutes a flagrant violation of international law and of the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of that State;

2. Deplores the death of innocent civilians resulting from the armed intervention;

3. Calls upon all States to show the strictest respect for the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of Grenada;

4. Calls for an immediate cessation of the armed intervention and the immediate withdrawal of the foreign troops from Grenada;

5. Requests that free elections be organized as rapidly as possible to enable the people of Grenada to choose its government democratically;

6. Requests the Secretary-General as a matter of urgency to assess the situation and to report back to the General Assembly within seventy-two hours.

Transcript of a Press Conference by President Reagan, November 3, 1983 (Extracts) [50]

"This Was a Rescue Mission"

THE PRESIDENT. Before this morning's announcement, I'd like to share some information with you that I received on the phone last night.

Secretary of Defense Cap Weinberger called to inform me that hostilities in Grenada have ended and that he has instructed our military commanders to begin withdrawing their forces within a few days.

What this means is that the situation is stable, no sniper fire or other form of military resistance is evident on the island. Our objectives have been achieved and as soon as the logistics permit, American personnel will be leaving.

I'd like to add that the members of the Armed Forces have conducted themselves in the finest tradition of the military. We can be proud of the courage and professionalism that we've seen from the people down there. The American students called them rescuers. The citizens of Grenada have hailed them as liberators. I think the whole lot of them deserve the respect and admiration of our country.

The operation was not without cost. Those who were killed, wounded or injured in this operation I believe are heroes of freedom. They not only rescued our own citizens, but they saved the people of Grenada from repression and laid aside a potential threat to all the people of the Caribbean.

After viewing the massive horde of Soviet weapons found on that island, who knows what evil the liberation of Grenada achieved for us, or averted in the years ahead.

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. President, Nicaragua says you intend to invade that country. Do you, sir?

THE PRESIDENT. Who says?

Q. Nicaraguan leaders, sir.

THE PRESIDENT. I haven't believed anything they've been saying since they got in charge and you shouldn't either.

Q. Mr. President, does the success of Grenada, as you view it, does that operation mean that you might be able to apply the military in similar situations elsewhere?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I can't foresee any situation that has exactly the same things that this one had. It had exactly what we announced in the beginning, the need to protect the lives and the safety and freedom of about 1,000 Americans, most of them students down there in medical school, and in answer to a request on the part of the other nations bound by treaty together in the east Caribbean that we lend our support to them in freeing this up because they lacked the strength and capability of doing it.

Q. If somebody else asks, would you be willing to do it again?

THE PRESIDENT. As I say, if all the conditions were the same, I don't see why our reason would be any different. But I don't foresee any similar situation on the horizon.

Q. Why did 100 nations in the United Nations not agree with you that this was a worthwhile venture?

THE PRESIDENT. . . . 100 nations in the United Nations have not agreed with us on just about everything that's come before them where we're involved and it didn't upset my breakfast, at all.

Q. Mr. President, some people say that the United States has now lost a moral high ground, that there's no difference between what we did in Grenada and what the Soviets did in Afghanistan. What's your response to that?

The press conference, which principally dealt with the appointment of Donald Rumsfeld as special representative for the Middle East, began at 9:55 a.m. in the Briefing Room of the White House.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, for heaven sakes, anyone who would link Afghanistan to this operation, and incidentally, I know your frequent use of the word, invasion, this was a rescue mission. But in Afghanistan, if you will recall, when the Soviets installed their choice of Head of State for Afghanistan and in the process in changing the forces there, an American ambassador was murdered in Afghanistan, and then, against all the opposition of the Afghanistan people, they have used every vicious form of warfare including chemical warfare, the killing of women and children that has caused even some of their own men to desert because they will not carry out the orders to kill women and children, and they're still there after a long period of time, longer than I've been in this Office. As compared to what we did in answer, actually, to an appeal that first came from the Governor General of the island, who was in house arrest, to his fellow states there in the Caribbean who were appealing for rescue, and we helped in the rescue.

Granted that we contributed the bulk of the power, but because—only because the others were limited in their ability to do that. And this was a rescue mission. It was a successful rescue mission, and the people that have been rescued, and the Grenadians that have been liberated, are down there delighted with and giving every evidence of appreciation and gratitude to our men down there.

Address by the Deputy Secretary of State (Dam) Before the Associated Press Managing Editors' Conference, Louisville, Kentucky, November 4, 1983 [51]

The Origins, Development, and Impact of U.S. Participation in the Grenada Mission

This is the 11th day since the combined U.S.-Caribbean peace force landed in Grenada to protect lives and restore order. That may not be enough time to make definitive historical judgments, but it is not too early to begin to reflect on the meaning of what happened. So I would like today to talk both about the collective action itself and about its larger significance for U.S. foreign policy.

Two basic objectives motivated the President's decision last week to act jointly with Barbados and Jamaica in response to the urgent and formal request from the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States (OECS). [52] These objectives were:

To protect the lives of U.S. citizens; and

To help Grenada reestablish order so that governmental institutions and human rights can be restored, thereby contributing also to the maintenance of regional peace and stability.

The Setting

Prime Minister Charles of Dominica recently described the countries of the eastern Caribbean as "kith and kin." Reuben Harris, the Education Minister of Antigua and Barbuda, was more specific last week at a UNESCO [UN Education, Scientific and Cultural Organization] conference in Paris. He noted that these nations "enjoy an economic community, a common currency, joint diplomatic representation and responsibility for . . . common defence and security."

This unique institutional setting helps explain why 10 days, days of brutality and instability, ultimately brought about collective action to restore peace in Grenada. Order began to disintegrate in Grenada the evening of October 12 with an attempt by Deputy Prime Minister Bernard Coard to force out Prime Minister Maurice Bishop. According to minutes of the party Central Committee, although Bishop had established close relations with Cuba and the Soviet Union, the Coard faction considered him a "bourgeois deviationist" for moving too slowly to consolidate a "Leninist" restructuring of Grenadian society.

Bishop was put under house arrest in the middle of the night October 14, then freed by his supporters on October 19. Troops opened fire on the crowd. Bishop and several Cabinet ministers and union leaders were taken away, then executed. Education Minister Jacqueline Creft was apparently beaten to death.

In the wake of these murders, the People's Revolutionary Army announced the government was dissolved and a 24-hour curfew imposed: anyone found outside would be shot on sight. Army General Hudson Austin was head of a 16-member Revolutionary Military Council (RMC). But it was never clear that Austin or any coherent group was in fact in charge. No one knew when—or how—a new government would be formed.

Caribbean Reaction

The murders and breakdown of governmental order shocked, repelled, and alarmed leaders throughout the Caribbean. Without exception, the leaders of the eastern Caribbean condemned the murders and expressed their sympathy for the people of Grenada.

Other Caribbean leaders were equally outraged. Prime Minister Tom Adams of Barbados said Bishop and his fellow ministers had been killed by "disgusting murderers" who had committed the "most vicious act to disfigure the West Indies since the days of slavery."

Prime Minister Edward Seaga of Jamaica expressed revulsion at "the intensity of the barbarity" and broke diplomatic relations with Grenada. Even the Jamaican opposition party (People's National Party, the PNP), headed by former Prime Minister Michael Manley, severed all relations with the New JEWEL Movement, recommended its expulsion from the Socialist International, and declared that the RMC had no right to speak for the Grenadian people.

The Decision to Act

Sometimes action is necessary to keep a bad situation from getting worse. This was such a time. The disintegration of political authority in Grenada had created a dynamic that spread uncertainty and fear and that made further violence likely. The actions of Bishop's murderers made clear that they would have either driven the island into further chaos or turned it into an armed fortress. In either event, the threat to U.S. citizens and to the peace of the eastern Caribbean would have increased. Inaction would have made a hostage situation more likely and increased the costs in lives of any subsequent rescue operation.

The OECS decided to help its member state of Grenada and to ask Barbados, Jamaica, and the United States for assistance. In its formal request for U.S. assistance, the OECS cited:

". . . the current anarchic conditions, the serious violations of human rights and bloodshed that have occurred and the consequent unprecedented threat to the peace and security of the region created by the vacuum of authority in Grenada."

The OECS request also noted:

". . . that military forces and supplies are likely to be shortly introduced to consolidate the position of the regime and that the country can be used as a staging post for acts of aggression against its members; and

". . . that the capability of the Grenada armed forces is already at a level of sophistication and size far beyond the internal needs of that country."

We had, of course, also been following events with increasing concern. As is well known, Grenada's ties to Cuba and the Soviet Union and its abandonment of democracy and poor human rights record had led the United States to have serious disagreements with the Bishop regime. Nonetheless, Bishop's visit to the United States in June 1983 (when Judge Clark [William Clark, then National Security Adviser to the President] and I met with him in my office) had led us to hope that Grenada might adopt a more moderate course.[53]

What became our overriding concern as events unfolded, however, was not Grenada's political system. Rather, it was the safety of U.S. citizens in the midst of a growing anarchy which the countries of the Caribbean also saw as a direct threat.

Some 1,000 U.S. citizens, mainly students, retirees, and missionaries, made up the largest community of foreigners on Grenada. Our concern for their welfare was heightened by the murders, the shoot-on-sight curfew, and the difficulty of getting accurate information. And in the absence of a functioning government there could be no credible assurances of their well-being and future prospects. I don't think that I need remind you that today is the fourth anniversary of the seizure of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran.

After carefully considering these developments, and reviewing all aspects of the OECS request, President Reagan concluded that to wait passively would entail great and increasing risks. Before acting, however, the President sent a special emissary, Ambassador Frank McNeil, to consult with OECS representatives and with Prime Minister Adams of Barbados and Prime Minister Seaga of Jamaica.

Ambassador McNeil found these leaders unanimous in their conviction that the deteriorating conditions on Grenada were a threat to the entire region and that the situation required immediate action.

Legal Authority for Action

U.S. actions have been based on three legal grounds.

First, as these events were taking place, we were informed, on October 24, by Prime Minister Adams of Barbados that Grenada's Governor General, Sir Paul Scoon, had used a confidential channel to transmit an appeal to the OECS and other regional states to restore order on the island. The Governor General has since confirmed this appeal. We were unable to make this request public until the Governor General's safety had been assured, but it was an important element—legally as well as politically—in our respective decisions to help Grenada. The legal authorities of the Governor General were the sole remaining source of governmental legitimacy on the island in the wake of the tragic events I have described. We and the OECS countries accorded his appeal exceptional moral and legal weight. The invitation of lawful governmental authority constitutes a recognized basis under international law for foreign states to provide requested assistance.

Second, the OECS determined to take action under the 1981 treaty establishing that organization. That treaty contains a number of provisions—in articles 3, 4, and 8—which deal with local as well as external threats to peace and security.[54] Both the OAS [Organization of American States] Charter, in articles 22 and 28,[55] and the UN Charter, in article 52, recognize the competence of regional security bodies in ensuring regional peace and stability. Article 22 of the OAS Charter, in particular, makes clear that action pursuant to a special security treaty in force does not constitute intervention or use of force otherwise prohibited by articles 18 or 20 of that charter. In taking lawful collective action, the OECS countries were entitled to call upon friendly states for appropriate assistance, and it was lawful for the United States, Jamaica, and Barbados to respond to this request.

Third, U.S. action to secure and evacuate endangered U.S. citizens on the island was undertaken in accordance with well-established principles of international law regarding the protection of one's nationals. That the circumstances warranted this action has been amply documented by the returning students themselves. There is absolutely no requirement of international law that compelled the United States to await further deterioration of the situation that would have jeopardized a successful [54] Article 3 of the Treaty Establishing the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States is entitled "Purposes and Functions of the Organization." Article 4 is entitled "General Undertaking as to Implementation." Article 8 is entitled "Composition and Functions of the Defence and Security Committee." operation. Nor was the United States required to await actual violence against U.S. citizens before rescuing them from the anarchic and threatening conditions the students themselves have described.

Some are asking how this U.S. action can be distinguished from acts of intervention by the Soviet Union. Let me say that the distinctions are clear. The United States participated in a genuine collective effort—the record makes clear the initiative of the Caribbean countries in proposing and defending this action. This action was based on an existing regional treaty and at the express invitation of the Governor General of Grenada. Our concern for the safety of our citizens was genuine. The factual circumstances on Grenada were exceptional and unprecedented in the Caribbean region—a collapse of law, order, and governmental institutions. Our objectives are precise and limited—to evacuate foreign nationals and to cooperate in the restoration of order. Our objectives do not involve the imposition on the Grenadians of any particular form of government. Grenadians are free to determine their institutions for themselves. Finally, our troops have already begun to leave; we will complete our withdrawal as soon as other forces are ready to take over from us.

Those who do not see—or do not choose to see—these clear-cut distinctions have failed to analyze the facts. We have not made, and do not seek to make, any broad new precedent for international action. Our actions themselves are well within accepted concepts of international law.

The Rescue Operation

To minimize the potential loss of lives and maximize the chances of success, both the preparations for the multi-national peace force and our final decision to participate had to be protected by keeping them secret.

When our forces arrived in Grenada, they immediately came under fire. And the main resistance came from Cubans, not Grenadians. The Cubans were very well armed. They were deployed at the airport, at the medical school where a large number of U.S. citizens were studying, at the Governor General's house, at a Cuban military encampment at Calivigny, and at several other forts and strategic points.

Despite the Cuban-led resistance, hostilities have now ended. U.S. forces are withdrawing. The Rangers left Sunday; the Marines yesterday.

The Governor General has thanked us for our assistance as a "positive and decisive step forward in the restoration not only of peace and order but also of full sovereignty."

The OECS is assisting the Governor General and prominent Grenadians to establish a provisional government capable of restoring functioning institutions and permitting early elections.

Seventeen flights have safely evacuated, at their request, 599 Americans and 121 foreigners. Their accounts of conditions in Grenada and praise for their rescuers speak for themselves. The respected Grenadian journalist Alister Hughes evidently spoke for the vast majority of people in Grenada, Grenadians and foreigners alike, when he said of the Caribbean peace force: "Thank God they came. If someone had not come in and done something, I hesitate to say what the situation in Grenada would be now."

Cuban and Soviet Penetration in Grenada

While we are still assembling and evaluating the evidence, what we have found suggests that Grenada would have become a fortified Cuban/Soviet military outpost. I mentioned earlier that we had been concerned—well before the events which brought about our collective action—that Grenada could be used as a staging area for subversion of nearby countries, for interdiction of shipping lanes, and for transit of troops and supplies from Cuba to Africa and from Eastern Europe and Libya to Central America.

What we found in Grenada may be summed up as the military underpinnings for just such uses. We found five secret treaties—three with the Soviet Union, one with North Korea, and one with Cuba—under which these communist countries were to donate military equipment in amounts without precedent for a population of 110,000.[58] We found artillery, [58] For texts of these and other documents relating to Grenada, see Grenada Documents: An Overview and Selection, released by the Department of State and the Department of Defense, September 1984 (Washington, 1984).

antiaircraft weapons, armored personnel carriers, and rocket launchers. We found thousands of rifles, thousands of fuses, tons of TNT, and millions of rounds of ammunition. We found communications gear and cryptographic devices. We found agreements authorizing the secret presence of Cuban military advisers, some of them on a "permanent" basis.

All of the agreements stipulated that arms would be delivered to Grenada only by Cuban ships through Cuban ports. And although the Soviet Union was providing the arms and training free of charge, the Soviet Union required the Grenadians to keep all military arrangements secret and delayed the opening of a Soviet Embassy in Grenada until 18 months after entering into such arrangements.

Broader Lessons

Perhaps the first and most basic lesson of events on Grenada is that Cuban activities are not as benign as Fidel Castro would have us believe.

We have been regularly accused of exaggerating the dangers of Cuban/Soviet activities in countries like Grenada. However, what we found in Grenada suggests that, if anything, we were guilty of understating the dangers. We now know that we had underestimated Soviet use of Cuba as a surrogate for the projection of military power in the Caribbean. Examine again what we found—well-armed Cubans called construction workers; fortifications; stockpiled weapons; secret military treaties; personnel from Eastern Europe, Africa, and East Asia, all innocently enjoying a tourist paradise no doubt.

Think again about the facilities that all this would have secured—the Point Salines Airport, which would have enabled a MiG-23 carrying four 1,000-pound bombs to strike and return from Puerto Rico in the north to Venezuela in the south; the Calivigny military training area; a 75,000-watt radio transmitter capable of blanketing the entire Caribbean Basin; the potential for a deep-water harbor.

In light of this evidence, many Americans—and not a few Europeans—might productively reassess their estimate of the security concerns of the American Government and of the non-communist countries of the Caribbean Basin.

A second, related point worth thinking about is what happened to Maurice Bishop. His experience graphically shows what could happen to those who put their faith in military assistance and advisers from Cuba and the Soviet Union, but then try to remain non-aligned. The threat to their freedom and survival may well come from the very system their friends have helped them put in place.

In the wake of Bishop's murder, Suriname expelled the Cuban Ambassador and 100 Cuban "technicians." The nine commandantes of Nicaragua might also wish to ponder their relationship with their Soviet and Cuban mentors.

A third lesson, and again one of particular importance for the Sandinistas, is that in the absence of democratic institutions and legal safeguards, policy differences tend to degenerate into violence. The way to end such violence is to fulfill their original promises of democracy and free elections.

A final lesson of the events in Grenada is that neighbors have a clear, ongoing responsibility to act in ways consistent with each other's legitimate security concerns. In Nicaragua, for example, Sandinista willingness to negotiate seriously, to reduce reliance on military power, and, most importantly, to stop belligerent behavior toward their neighbors would represent the high road to peace in Central America.

U.S. Policy in Central America

Taken as a whole, what these lessons imply for Central America is that we must focus our resources on finding more creative ways to foster democratic development and regional cohesion. It is for this reason that we are firmly committed to a comprehensive approach to that region's conflicts.

As President Reagan told a special joint session of Congress on April 27, our policy in Central America is based on four interlocking elements—democracy, development, dialogue, and defense.

Our policy is to actively support democracy, reform, and human freedom in Central America—as much for El Salvador and Guatemala as for Nicaragua.

The United States supports economic development and is devoting three times the funds to such development than to military assistance. The Caribbean Basin Initiative, I should note, is as open to Nicaragua as to Costa Rica and Honduras.

We support dialogue and negotiations—the internal dialogue of democracy in each country and the multilateral negotiations of nations honestly trying to live peacefully with each other.

And we have and will continue to provide what the President has called a security shield against those who oppose democratization, economic development, and diplomacy.

In the interests of settling the conflicts in Central America before they reach a crisis stage, the United States is quietly but firmly supporting the regional Contadora process. It is no coincidence that the consensus of the nine countries involved about what is required for peace in Central America is parallel to our own. We support—as do Nicaragua's neighbors, especially the "Core Four" countries of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras—an end to terrorism, destabilization, and guerrilla warfare; a reduction of military forces and armaments; political reconciliation through free elections and respect for human rights; the removal of foreign troops and military advisers; and the commitment of resources more for economic development and reform than for military buildup and destruction.

What this all adds up to is that the United States is pursuing a responsive and responsible role in this entire region. I believe that we have the confidence to do so, even in the face of violence and uncertainty, because we had already learned what may be the underlying lesson of the collective response to the Grenada crisis: the best source of knowledge about an area is the people of that area—those most directly concerned with what is happening in their own neighborhood.

What Prime Minister Charles and the others told us while the Grenada crisis was building proved to be accurate. The Caribbean leaders faithfully reflected the feelings, the concerns, and hopes of the Grenadian people—and, may I add, of the U.S. citizens there as well. We listened to Grenada's neighbors, and we are doing the same thing in Central America. Our policy is responsive to Central American opinion polls, the statements of respected democratic leaders, and the Contadora "Document of Objectives." And we are responding in the Caribbean Basin Initiative: we listened when Latin and Caribbean economists told us that they wanted "trade not aid."

Leadership means listening and acting intelligently on what is heard. That is what we did in Grenada. That is what we are doing in Central America. And I believe the American people are coming to understand what their government is doing and why.

Letter From President Reagan to the Speaker of the House of Representatives (O'Neill), December 8, 1983 [57]

"U.S. Marines and U.S. Army Rangers Have Now Been Withdrawn From Grenada"

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: In accordance with my desire that you be kept informed concerning the situation in Grenada, about which I reported to you on October 25, [58] I am providing this further report on the presence of United States Armed Forces in Grenada.

Since then, the circumstances which occasioned the introduction of United States Armed Forces into Grenada have substantially changed. On November 2, the armed conflict in Grenada came to an end, and our task now, together with neighboring countries, is to assist the Grenadians in their effort to restore and revitalize their political institutions in a stable security environment.

Although it is still not possible to predict the precise duration of the temporary presence of United States Armed Forces in Grenada, our forces are continuing to work closely with other components of the collective security force in assisting the Grenadian authorities in the maintenance of conditions of law and order and the restoration of functioning governmental institutions to the island of Grenada.

All elements of the U.S. Marines and U.S. Army Rangers have now been withdrawn from Grenada; at this time, less than 2,700 U.S. Armed Forces personnel remain on the island. U.S. Armed Forces will continue to withdraw from the island as a part of a process whereby a peacekeeping force, composed of units contributed by friendly countries, takes over these responsibilities. I anticipate that this will be accomplished in the near future and that any members of the U.S. Armed Forces remaining in Grenada thereafter will have normal peacetime assignments, such as training, local security and the furnishing of technical services.

I am satisfied that the objectives of our operation in Grenada, including the protection of U.S. citizens, are being met successfully because of the valor and effectiveness of our forces. I ask for your continuing support as we strive to assist the people of Grenada in their efforts to restore peace, order, and human rights to their island.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN

Testimony by the Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs (Abrams) and the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Michel) Before Two Subcommittees of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, October 21, 1983 [1]

"Our Human Rights Policy Has Been a Force for Good Throughout the Southern Cone"

MR. ABRAMS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. [2]

I am pleased to be here today to discuss with you the human rights situation in the Southern Cone of Latin America, a region which has always been of particular interest to Americans. I shall be as brief as possible in my opening remarks, so as to provide more time for questions.

Let me begin with Paraguay, about which I think I will have a little bit more to say in the opening remarks than Mr. Michel. We will try not to be too repetitive.

As you know, Paraguay has been ruled under the state of siege provisions of the constitution almost continuously since 1929. President Alfredo Stroessner, an army general, has governed Paraguay since 1954 under these provisions. His rule is based on the military, and is exercised through the Colorado Party. President Stroessner is widely believed to be genuinely popular among large sections of the population, though his popularity has never been put to the test in free elections. The opposition parties are kept under control and given little opportunity to conduct a real election campaign. Only members in good standing of the Colorado Party can participate fully in the political process, such as it is.

The human rights safeguards in the Paraguayan Constitution frequently are not upheld. The judiciary, while formally independent, does not serve as an effective check on the actions of the executive. Constitutional guarantees such as protection of the integrity of the individual, the need for judicial warrants, freedom of assembly and association, the right of habeas corpus, and a prompt and fair trial for the accused often are ignored by Government officials. While the state of siege is legally in force only in the capital, security officials operate as though it existed throughout the country.

Major violations of the integrity of the individual in Paraguay have decreased since the mid 1970's. However, there were increased detentions and no improvement in the areas of political rights and individual liberties in the last year or so. The major current human rights issue is the continued detention of 3 remaining members out of about 20 persons arrested in May and June for violation of Paraguay's elastic antisubversive law 209, in connection with the Banco Paraguayo de Datos, a research organization.

Over the past 3 months the Government has released most of the detainees, but three still remain in detention. Two of those detained are believed to have been tortured by the police during their initial interrogation.

Other human rights problems of current concern are occasional instances of Government censorship of the press and radio, such as the closing down of Radio Nanduti on July 9 for 30 days, and the arrest of a columnist for the newspaper ABC Color. We are also concerned about the issue of forced exiles. On the positive side, however, we were pleased that last year's County Report for Paraguay was published in the Paraguayan press. [3] It must also be acknowledged that President Stroessner's rule has brought relative stability and economic growth to Paraguay, though at considerable cost to individual rights and political liberties. Freedom House, in its 1983 report covering 1981, classified Paraguay as partly free. [4]

The United States has used its influence in Paraguay to encourage as great a degree of liberalization as possible. We have worked quietly but steadily on specific human rights cases. And we have made it clear that we favor steps now toward a more open and democratic society.

Let me turn now to Uruguay. Mr. Michel will go into more detail. I just want to say a word about U.S. policy. United States human rights policy toward Uruguay is clear. As President Reagan stated on August 25, 1982, "As a staunch proponent of democracy, the United States warmly applauds Uruguay's decision to restore full constitutional government through national elections." Both the Department of State and our Embassy are in close touch with leaders of the political parties in Uruguay. These leaders know, and the Government of Uruguay also knows, that we strongly support the return to democracy, and that our bilateral relations will improve as the democratization process continues.

Let me move on, now, to the human rights situation in Argentina. The Argentine Armed Forces have held power since 1976. In the wake of severe and growing economic problems and Argentina's defeat in the Falklands conflict, the military government instituted major changes in 1982. The Government of President Reynaldo Bignone, installed on July 1, 1982, announced that it was a government of transition whose main task was to oversee the return to democracy. The Government has scheduled municipal, provincial, and national elections for October 30, just 9 days from now.

In addition to the election of 600 electors who will choose Argentina's President, some 254 deputies and 46 senators are to be elected, the deputies directly and the senators indirectly by the provincial legislatures. The electors will then meet on November 30 to elect the President and Vice President who are due to be inaugurated on January 30, 1984—although that date may be moved closer. [5]

Since late 1982, there has been a significant upsurge in political activity in Argentina. Political parties, including the Communist Party, have staged large rallies and human rights groups have held demonstrations. The political debate has been free and open, and all sides have had full access to the media. Press restraints are practically nonexistent, and controls of the largely government-owned electronic media are less onerous than at any time since the 1976 coup. The judicial branch displays independence and its strictures on the executive are observed. Trade union freedom is greater than at any time in the recent past, and strikes, including national strikes, occur although they are technically illegal.

The situation regarding individual rights in Argentina has also shown dramatic improvement. There were no reported disappearances for the last 2 years and only three politically motivated killings occurred this year. Detentions for national security of political prisoners have virtually ceased. National security or political prisoners held under PEN, or executive authorization, were reduced sharply, with 425 freed in 1982, and about 100 freed so far in 1983.

I would like to point out that the situation in Argentina, where elections will be held in 9 days, is still evolving and improving. Since I submitted my written statement to the committee, it has been reported that the Government of Argentina has announced that it will release or charge the remaining 243 PEN detainees, those persons held without charges under the National Executive Power.

Of the 243, 67 persons now in prison will be released; 63 will be turned over to the Ministry of Justice because their cases in court are pending or they have already been sentenced by a court; and 113 who are already out of prison, but under a status similar to our parole, will be given complete freedom.

If these reports are accurate, once these steps have been taken, there will be no more PEN prisoners in Argentina.

Human rights groups and some political parties in Argentina have concentrated their activities on efforts to force an accounting for past disappearances—estimates of which range from 6,000 to 30,000—and to punish those responsible. In April 1983, the Government of Argentina issued a report stating that all the remaining disappeared are either dead, abroad, or in hiding. The report was widely criticized both in Argentina and by European governments. We expressed our disappointment that an opportunity had been lost to resolve this problem. [6]

This issue of the disappeared is the most controversial and sensitive human rights issue remaining, and is central to the future of Argentina's politics. Most human rights groups say that recorded disappearances are between 6,000–7,000. Some 6,600 families have petitioned the Government for information concerning the fate of their relatives. Especially poignant are the cases involving several hundred young children who have disappeared. I recognize that the unresolved issue of disappearances has come to symbolize the horrible brutality of the dirty war in Argentina. The mothers of the Plaza de Mayo remind us, each time they appear, of how many innocent people were tortured, or jailed, or killed, how many families torn asunder or destroyed forever by violence and inhumanity. At the same time, I believe this issue, agonizing though it surely is, is one which the Argentine people themselves will have to come to grips with. It is not an issue for foreigners to decide.

[5] Dr. Raúl Alfonsín of the Radical Civic Union was elected President on October 30, 1983, with 52 percent of the vote and was inaugurated on December 10, 1983. A U.S. delegation headed by Vice President George Bush attended the inauguration ceremonies.

[6] At the Department of State Daily Press Briefing, May 17, 1983, Department of State Spokesman John Hughes stated, in regard to the April 1983 Argentine report on the "disappeared": "We share the sense of disappointment others have expressed that an occasion has been lost to begin the resolution of this question. It is an issue which the Argentines themselves must resolve. We have consistently encouraged the authorities to provide as complete a report as is possible on the fate of the disappeared."

Finally, let me turn to Chile. Again, Mr. Michel will have more to say in describing developments there. As to positive developments, some 3,591 Chilean exiles have been permitted to return. Some lessening of censorship has occurred. Of major importance is the Government of Chile's initiative in undertaking a dialog with the moderate political opposition to define the transition to democracy.

On September 16 of this year, the Government of Chile re-established the right of citizens to assemble, and to hold peaceful marches without Government authorization. The courts have become somewhat more independent, and the Government of Chile has increasingly resorted to them. On August 26, the state of emergency, which gave the Government extraordinary authority to deal with what it considered an extremist threat, and which has been extended every 3 months, was lifted.

On the negative side, however, we continue to receive credible reports of violence and torture by the police and security forces. While the state of emergency was lifted on August 26, the less restrictive "State of Danger of the Disturbance of Internal Peace," as it is called, remains in force. Trade union rights are still restricted. Many of the Chileans living in imposed or voluntary exile—total figures range from 10,000 to 30,000—have either not yet been permitted to return, or have not received adequate guarantees of their safety.

Some censorship still clearly exists. Political parties remain formally illegal, although some political activity and considerable criticism and press discussion are tolerated. The practice of internal exile for opponents of the regime continues. While the possibility of advancing the date for congressional elections has been publicly mentioned, no timetable for a return to democratic government has yet been established other than the 1989 plebiscite provided for in the 1980 constitution. Finally, demonstrations protesting economic and political conditions have continued, resulting in numerous arrests and credible reports of police violence.

Our own policy is clear, to encourage greater respect for human rights, and a return to democracy in Chile.

Let me conclude my remarks by observing that we believe that our human rights policy has been a force for good throughout the Southern Cone. Throughout the region, the United States has made clear our commitment of human rights and a return to democracy.

Thank you.

MR. YATRON. Thank you very much, Secretary Abrams.

MR. YATRON. Our next witness is the Honorable James Michel, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs.

Mr. Michel, will you please proceed?

MR. MICHEL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and Chairman Barnes. I have submitted a prepared statement and would ask that that be included in the record.

MR. YATRON. Without objection.

MR. MICHEL. With your permission, I would like just to summarize that and not repeat the description of the individual country situation in each of the four countries.

MR. YATRON. Without objection.

MR. MICHEL. I am pleased to appear before your two subcommittees, in response to your request, to discuss the human rights situations in Chile, Argentina, Paraguay and Uruguay.

As you know, a vigorous election campaign is underway in Argentina with elections scheduled for October 30. These national elections are the first that country has seen in about 10 years. And I would urge upon you the need for assuring that these public hearings do not become an election issue in Argentina.

American policy flows from our national interests, including the furtherance of our ideals. It makes sense, therefore, to reflect on what our interests are in South America, and how they interact. In a region such as the Southern Cone, it is not surprising that the United States has a number of interests—political, economic, and strategic. Some are immediate while others are longer term. Obviously, they vary in importance and will shift somewhat over time, in response to evolving U.S. priorities and to changing circumstances. Our policy must seek to take account of all of our interests, immediate, long term, political, economic, and strategic.

In the Southern Cone, as elsewhere, promotion of human rights and democratic government represents an integrating dimension in our relations, reflecting both the policy of the executive branch and, Mr. Chairman, as you indicated in your initial remarks, the will of the Congress as reflected in our law.

As President Reagan said on April 27 in a joint address before the Congress, and I quote:

> "We will support democracy, reform and human freedom. This means using our assistance, our powers of persuasion, and our legitimate "leverage" to bolster humane democratic systems where they already exist and to help countries on their way to that goal as quickly as human institutions can be changed. . . . We will work at human rights problems, not walk away from them." [7]

That is the end of the quote.

The President was speaking of Central America. But his statement expresses precisely the intent of U.S. policy throughout the Hemisphere, including South America.

In all four countries under discussion, the issues of promotion of democratic institutions and protection of human rights are matters of great sensitivity. These issues have been at the crux of our relationships with these countries for a number of years. And they will remain so.

One of the basic tenets of U.S. foreign policy is that democracy is fundamental to the advancement of human rights. Democratic institutions, such as regular elections, a free press, an independent judiciary and the right of individuals to organize themselves to promote their well-being and individual interests, provide the best guarantees that Governments will not abuse the freedoms and rights of the individual. Under democratic systems, a watchful press and the right of the individual to redress wrongs through impartial courts and fair elections are powerful weapons to insure that human rights are respected. Progress toward democracy and an improved human rights environment varies widely in the four countries of the Southern Cone.

[7] See document 623.

In Argentina, a new democratic government is on the verge of being elected and installed. In Chile and in Uruguay, a transition is clearly underway. In Paraguay, no progress toward democracy is evident. Our policy toward the countries of the region must take into account their different circumstances, but it is fundamentally consistent for all of them. We encourage change in the direction of an improved human rights environment and support the development of democratic institutions as the best guarantee that individual rights and freedoms will be protected for the long run.

In our view democratic institutions are also our best bet for assuring stability and peace in the region.

Thank you, sir.

MR. YATRON. Thank you very much, Secretary Michel.

Secretary Michel, going to Chile, Chairmen Bonker, Barnes, and I, on September 28, wrote to Secretary Shultz expressing our concern that the United States concluded a new OPIC agreement with Chile despite that country's despicable record on human rights. Yesterday we received a reply to that letter, which we will include in the record at this point without objection. [8]

MR. YATRON. The letter says, that there is no commitment, to issue new insurance in Chile but that applications are pending. State must advise OPIC on human rights implications of proposed insurance. In view of Chile's record, which has worsened recently, I would hope you would recommend against issuance of any insurance. Would you comment?

MR. MICHEL. Well, I can't give you, Mr. Chairman, an assurance that we would have a blanket rule of recommending against any and all cases. Your views will certainly be given serious consideration. We will look at these applications as they arise. As the letter to you indicated, the agreement does not indicate an approval of any individual insurance project and we will look at those on an individual basis.

[8] For text of the Bonker, Barnes, and Yatron letters, Secretary Shultz's reply, and the new OPIC agreement with Chile, see Human Rights in Argentina, Chile, Paraguay, and Uruguay, pp. 171–178.

MR. YATRON. Can you tell me what specific actions the Reagan administration has taken in response to recent events in Chile?

MR. MICHEL. Are you referring to the political dialog?

MR. YATRON. Yes.

MR. MICHEL. Well, we have sought through both public and private statements to encourage this dialog. We think that it is a very promising event in the evolution of Chilean Government that the present government has initiated with the Democratic Alliance, a group of some 11 opposition groups, a dialog that is looking toward the return of democracy to Chile. As a part of this I think it is an important factor that the Government of Chile has allowed the return to that country of a number of exiled persons who were political leaders in the past and who have leadership skills, and will be in a position to carry on this dialog in a manner most conducive to its achieving some progress, and moving Chile closer to democratic government.

We sought to support that progress. We have said we encourage it in our public statements. We have privately made statements of encouragement to the Government of Chile.

MR. YATRON. Would you care to comment on the recent disappearances, and also some of the recent demonstrations against the Government?

MR. MICHEL. Well, the demonstrations I think are something that we have a mixed reaction to. The expressions of dissatisfaction on the part of the Chilean population have no doubt contributed to the willingness of the Government to engage in the dialog in which it—which it has initiated. At the same time, there have been indications of extremists' efforts within these demonstrations to turn them to violence. And I am sure in some cases with the intention of provoking a reaction on the part of the Government that can undercut the efforts of moderate forces on both sides of this dialog, and erode it.

So public demonstrations, peaceful demonstrations that encourage and further a process of dialog and peaceful transition we think are a good thing. And extremist efforts to turn these demonstrations into violence and to polarize the Chilean body politic obviously are something that we view with concern.

MR. YATRON. I would like to ask Secretary Abrams, we have had reports of increased torture. I would like to know what the Department has done about that.

MR. ABRAMS. I don't think, Mr. Chairman, we have seen reports of increased torture. This has been a constant thread throughout Chilean life for years now. We have made it clear as we can not only in public statements but a very large number of times in private conversations with officials of the Government of Chile, how we feel about that. That is, the revulsion that we feel about that. And we have often commented that it seems to us that one of the first steps a civilized government should take is to insure that that stops. But the Government of Chile has not done that.

I certainly think that there can be no doubt in their mind as to the way we view that practice. They have heard it over and over again, and they have heard it from high levels in the U.S. Government.

MR. YATRON. Is the opposition movement larger now in Chile than at any other time under Pinochet, and if so, why? And how close is Chile to a major civil war?

MR. ABRAMS. I think the opposition is certainly more public now than it has been. Of course, it has been difficult to gage. As in any dictatorship, it is difficult to gage exactly how strong the opposition is because there is no way to express it through elections. I think it is clear that the faltering economy of Chile has had an impact on the political situation there. This is true of a number of other countries as well.

It has decreased the popularity of the Government, and has increased the amount of opposition, and is the willingness of people to express their opposition. Certainly, there is more vocal and public opposition to the Government than has been the case since it came to power. I don't think Chile is on the verge of civil war at all, because there is I think a consensus among, what shall we say, Democrats in Chile that that is not the route to go; that is to say, violence. Rather, that negotiations, that the dialog that is underway should be continued so that peaceful change toward democracy can take place.

MR. YATRON. Thank you. Chairman Barnes.

MR. BARNES. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Gentlemen, there was a report the other day in the paper about renewed incidence of anti-Semitism in Argentina. Can you give the subcommittees any information you may have about that situation?

MR. ABRAMS. There has been an increase, I believe, in incidence of anti-Semitism. As far as we can make out, these incidents are not Government sponsored. They seem, rather, to be something that shows its face publicly at a time when the authority of the Government is reduced. In past years the government has actually prevented a number of outbreaks of anti-Semitism, as any civilized government should. And there were in the period, for example, shortly before the Falklands war a number of gestures by General Galtieri, in fact, toward the Jewish community before and during that war. So it was crystal clear that the Government; for example, under him was not only not encouraging but was discouraging anti-Semitic activity.

Now, they are really late in a transition period, 9 days from election, uncertain when the transition will be but within a couple months and authority of the government is much reduced. And apparently, people who want to engage in anti-Semitic violence feel now that they can do so without fear of much Government action. And that is what they are doing.

MR. MICHEL. I might add that there are, within the Jewish community in Argentina, hundreds of thousands of individuals who maintain synagogues, schools, social organizations, and so forth, free from any government restraints or interference. And that the recent incidents that have been reported in the press have been publicly condemned by the Presidential candidates. So I think everything that I know supports the judgment that there is no Argentinian Government policy of anti-Semitism, and racial and religious hatreds are things that crop up unfortunately just about everywhere, and for our part, let us take the opportunity of this hearing to say we abhor such incidents, wherever they occur.

MR. BARNES. Well, I think it is useful that you do take this opportunity and every opportunity possible. I had the chance earlier this year with some colleagues from the House to meet with Jewish leaders in Buenos Aires, and your description of the situation there I think is basically correct. But it is important for people all over the world when incidents such as this take place to make it clear that it is unacceptable.

As you say, we deplore it. You have both made eloquent statements about the commitment of the United States to democratic institutions and the democratization of the Southern Cone. We have got a difficult situation right now that is underway in Chile. What specifically has the Embassy in Santiago been doing over the past couple months to demonstrate that commitment of the United States toward democracy?

For example, is our Ambassador and are our key people in the Embassy meeting with opposition leaders? Are we taking specific steps to demonstrate openly in Chile that the United States stands for democracy and political progress for the people of that country? What are we actually doing?

MR. MICHEL. Well, the kinds of activity that you mention as examples in your question are the kinds of activity that have been undertaken in fact. The American Ambassador in Chile has met with labor leaders and with opposition members, including, I believe, labor leaders who had been accused of actions that violated, I believe, the censorship laws, and have been released by the courts. I think this is a clear indication of our support for furtherance of the trend toward democracy in that country.

Our own public statements in Washington have commented favorably on the steps that the Government of Chile has taken in authorizing the return of exiles and terminating the censorship of books and in engaging in a dialog with the Democratic Alliance. The transition toward democracy is something that we have emphasized in both public and in private statements.

MR. ABRAMS. Let me add that these kinds of activities at the level I think you would want are going on. Ambassador Theberge, for example, meets with, has dinner with, talks to people like Gabriel Valdez. The director of the Office of Human Rights in my bureau, seated right behind me, has just come back from a trip to the four countries which we are discussing today. One of the purposes of his trip was information gathering but another was his symbolic presence there.

I think we are making it clear, and it is clear both to the Government of Chile and the opposition groups, I think, that we strongly support the dialog and transition to democracy.

MR. BARNES. What about the labor leaders who have been subjected to harassment, arrest, persecution? What actions has the Embassy taken to demonstrate, if I may use the term, our solidarity with people who are trying to exercise their rights to form free labor movement?

MR. ABRAMS. Well, both publicly and privately we have made statements about our views of the right to organization and bargain collectively. The incident which Mr. Michel mentioned I think is an important one because there was a moment, it is a couple months ago now, when three labor leaders were essentially attacked by the Government, and almost simultaneously were invited to the Embassy to meet the Ambassador, which is a real gesture of solidarity which shows that we essentially discredit the charges against them.

But as with the opposition leaders, we have been in good communication with them. And also I might say with the AFL–CIO and AIFLD about their activities in Chile as well.

MR. BARNES. Well, I think it is terribly important that our Government in every possible responsible way makes clear that we stand for democracy, and that we are not supporting the kind of repression that the people of Chile have been subjected to. If there is a lesson that we can learn from other comparable situations, it is that when it is over—and I frankly hope it will be over a lot sooner than the Constitution of Chile calls for it to be over—that we don't want it to be perceived that we were part of the problem.

We have been through that too many times. In addition, I hope that as soon as the civilian government is elected in Argentina and during the transition period and particularly as soon as they have taken office, that the administration will take some very tangible steps and move quickly to demonstrate that we are prepared to support that new fledgling civilian government, new democracy in Argentina, and that we can develop a new working relationship with the people of that country.

One specific thing that I know the Argentinians would like to see from the United States is increased emphasis with our friends the British, on a willingness to sit down and try to work out a future for the Malvinas/Falkland Islands. That might be something that we could be working on in advance of the new government taking office.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

MR. YATRON. Thank you, Chairman Barnes. Mr. Lagomarsino?

MR. LAGOMARSINO. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I think the latter comments of Mr. Barnes are very appropriate, and I am sure that that is something that you and we will all be looking into. And I especially appreciate your opening comment about Argentina. I think, with the situation such as it is there, it is very important that we not contribute in any way to things that could make for last minute campaign charges or anything like that that might affect the election, and would go exactly the opposite from what we want to do there.

Mr. Michel, are you optimistic or pessimistic about the future in Chile?

MR. MICHEL. That is a very tough one. I am, on balance, optimistic for about three reasons. One is, we see going on in Chile, although it has its stops and its starts and its interruptions, but there is going on now a process in which the Government and responsible opposition groups are engaged in a dialog that is for the purpose of facilitating the transition to democracy. So the facts are moving in that direction.

Second, Chile has a history of democracy that is remembered by many of those who are engaged in this process, and I think that helps to give it another, a little bit of a catalyst that helps to move that process.

Third, I think that, and this is more philosophical than it is evidentiary, but I think that history is moving in the direction within this Hemisphere toward democracy. I think that the policy that we have enunciated here, that the President has enunciated in the past of support for democracy is on the right track, and I think that events in the Hemisphere with elections in the Dominican Republic and Brazil, in El Salvador, and Honduras, with elected governments present in Venezuela, Colombia, Bolivia, Ecuador, Peru, all of the Andean countries and so forth, suggest that this is what the people want. They want a participatory role in their government, and that combination of factors make me more of an optimist about the situation.

MR. LAGOMARSINO. Thank you.

MR. YATRON. Thank you, Mr. Lagomarsino.

Gentlemen, because of a series of votes on the floor, I think we will recess shortly. I would like to ask two questions dealing with Argentina. If you can provide the answers, we would appreciate it. We only have a few moments here but whoever wants to comment, with respect to a possible certification of Argentina, I think that many observers would agree that certain of the requirements generally be fulfilled. [9]

However, there is serious doubt about the adequacy of the efforts thus far made by that Government to provide information on the disappeared. Now, what are the criteria that you have established that would characterize an adequate Argentine response in this area?

MR. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, the statute on certification requires that the President determine that there has been significant improvement in the human rights situation in Argentina, and in making that determination, that he take into account the situation of the political prisoners and the disappeared. It then requires that he make a judgment that it is in the national interest. The question of certification is a matter under consideration within the executive branch, and there really are no criteria, rather, these are facts which the President must take into account at the time that he considers the issue of a certification.

MR. YATRON. With further respect to a possible certification of Argentina, I am concerned about the factors that will go into your decision. Obviously, you don't have to certify, but assuming that you are in a position to certify, then what are the criteria involved? Certainly one is timing. Another is how certification relates to decisions to actually permit assistance. A third and important criteria is how certification might impact on the delicate balance between a new civilian government and the military.

Now, I would assume we want any impact in Argentina of a certification to strengthen the new democratic government and its relation to the military and not the other way around. Could you briefly comment on that question?

MR. MICHEL. I don't think there is any more to say about that question. Our policy as we have said is very much to support democracy. And how that general policy relates to the particular timing or question of certification is one that has to be looked at, as I suggested at the outset of my testimony, against the context of, or totality of interests in the region, assuming that, once it is decided that the legal statutory criteria are met. And that policy will be an important factor, certainly.

MR. YATRON. Do you have any other questions?

MR. BARNES. No, thank you.

MR. YATRON. We want to thank you, gentlemen, for being here today.

The subcommittee stands adjourned until further call of the Chair. Thank you.

eration Act of 1981,[2] I hereby determine and certify:

(1) that the Government of Argentina has made significant progress in complying with internationally recognized principles of human rights, and

(2) that the eligibility of Argentina for the provision of security assistance and the transfer of defense articles and defense services, and the provision and transfer thereof, in accordance with the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and the Arms Export Control Act, are in the national interests of the United States.

This determination, together with the justification therefor, shall be reported to the Congress. This determination shall be published in the Federal Register.

MEMORANDUM OF JUSTIFICATION

Introduction—Section 725 (b) of the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1981 (Public Law 97-113) permits provision of security assistance to Argentina under certain circumstances. This provision replaces the prohibitions contained in former Section 620B of the Foreign Assistance Act, on provision to Argentina of assistance under Chapter 2 (Military Assistance Program), Chapter 4 (Economic Support Fund), Chapter 5 (International Military Education and Training) or Chapter 6 (Peacekeeping Operations) of Part II of the Foreign Assistance Act, as well as the extension of credits, sales or export licenses to Argentina under the Arms Export Control Act.

The activities otherwise prohibited by Section 725 may be carried out only if the President has submitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate a detailed report certifying that:

(1) The Government of Argentina has made significant progress in complying with internationally recognized principles of human rights, and

(2) The provision of such assistance, credits, loan guarantees, defense articles, defense services, or export licenses is in the national interests of the United States.

In the process of making this certification, among other things, the President is to consider efforts by the Government of Argentina to provide information on citizens identified as "disappeared" and to release or bring to justice those prisoners held at the disposition of the National Executive Power (PEN).

In the attached determination and this report, the President makes this certification, thus removing the prohibitions contained in Section 725.

Human Rights—Argentina has made dramatic progress in improving its human rights environment in recent months and in overcoming the problems of the last decade. In the 1970s, Argentina was beset by rampant terrorism from both extremes of the political spectrum.

On March 24, 1976, an elected civilian government in Argentina was overthrown by the Argentine Armed Forces. This action was justified by the military as necessary because the existing government appeared to the military to be incapable of dealing with the problems of terrorism and inflation.

In the years immediately following the military takeover, the government greatly expanded efforts to crush extremist groups. While this campaign was largely successful in reducing leftist terrorist activities, major violations of human rights and individual liberties took place. Freedom of the press was severely restricted. Political party and trade union activities were suspended and freedom of assembly denied. Many people were arrested and held by the security forces without due process; thousands simply disappeared and are presumed to be dead. Torture was widely practiced.

Following a government announcement in early 1978 that the so-called "dirty war" against terrorism had been won, the number of human rights violations began to decline sharply, but the human rights situation remained serious.

In July of 1982, in the wake of the South Atlantic conflict, a new military government was installed, headed by President Reynaldo Bignone. The new government announced it was a government of transition whose main task was to oversee the return to democratically elected government in Argentina. Under President Bignone, the new government:

—lifted the ban on political activity;

—promulgated a new political parties law;

—announced that national elections would be held in late 1983, with inauguration of a democratically elected Congress and President to take place early in 1984;

—gradually removed restrictions on the press and other media;

—relaxed constraints on trade union activity;

—lifted the state of seige and released or remanded for trial by civilian courts all those held without charges under the National Executive Power (PEN prisoners); and —took measures which reduced sharply the number of reports of human rights violations by the security forces.

As a result of these measures the situation, with respect to human rights and individual freedoms, improved dramatically in Argentina. The stage was also set for a return to democratic government, a move that would help institutionalize the political and human freedoms of individual Argentines. In addition, there have been no permanent disappearances in the last three years.

On October 30, the Argentine people went to the polls and elected a President, Vice President, Congress and some 14,000 other officials in open, honest and fair elections. The new government is being installed on December 10. The campaign leading up to the actual elections was orderly and hotly contested.

The most controversial human rights issue with which the Argentines themselves must deal is the question of accounting for the thousands of people who were arrested by government security forces and who subsequently disappeared, mostly during the late 1970s. Estimates on the number of people involved range from 6,000 to 30,000. The military governments that ruled Argentina have never rendered a satisfactory accounting.

The United States has deplored the violations of basic human rights that occurred during the 1970s in Argentina, including the thousands of disappearances. The United States has also continuously encouraged the Argentine Government to provide as full an accounting as possible on the disappeared to the Argentine people. When the Argentine Government's report on the disappeared, released in April, did not provide a satisfactory accounting, the United States expressed its disappointment that an occasion had been lost to begin the resolution of this question.

Another controversial internal political issue is the Argentine Government's decision to issue an amnesty decree on September 23, granting immunity to all those who may be liable to legal prosecution for acts committed during the "dirty war." This decree has been widely criticized, and has been declared unconstitutional by a number of Argentine judges. Both of these issues are the subject of much discussion within Argentina. The Alfonsin government has indicated that these issues will be addressed.

The process of improvement in the observance and protection of internationally-recognized principles of human rights accelerated as Argentina successfully made its transition to democracy. The inauguration of President-elect Alfonsin on December 10 represents a major step in this process. A democratically-elected government is one of the best guarantees of respect for human rights.

U'S National Interests —Restoration of Argentina's eligibility for security assistance and defense transfers removes an impediment to improved relations with the new, democratically elected government of one of the major countries in Latin America, thus setting the stage for cooperation on multi-lateral issues, peaceful efforts to resolve regional disputes, economic problems and nuclear non-proliferation. Conversely, to continue to "blacklist" Argentina when there has been significant human rights improvement would be to create an issue with the new government where one should not and need not exist.

Certification is consistent with our global support for democracy. Argentina has just held free and democratic elections with impressive popular participation. Certification would be a gesture of support for Argentina's return to democracy, and our support for strong democratic institutions in Argentina will have an important impact in strengthening the regional trend toward democracy.

Certification is consistent with our global policy of support for human rights and individual liberties. To deny certification would be to deny human rights progress where such progress is clearly evident, reducing the credibility of US human rights policies worldwide.

Certification strengthens our ties with the Argentine military, enhancing our ability both to encourage cooperation on security and policies of mutual interest and to reinforce support for democracy and human rights policies.

In sum, certification supports important US interests and objectives in terms of our bilateral relationship with Argentina, our interests in the region of the Southern Cone, and global political and security interests.

Testimony by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs (Motley) Before a Subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, September 28, 1983 [1]

The Situation in Brazil

MR. MOTLEY. Mr. Chairman, [2] I want to thank you for the opportunity to discuss one of my favorite subjects with you, Brazil. And one of the beauties of following somebody like Marc Leland and your distinguished panel is, if you want to avoid repeating what is said the best thing to do is to say nothing.

I think from reviewing Marc's testimony [3] and hearing the other ones, they have covered it very well. What I would like to do is, as you can see, make a few handwritten observations, filling in maybe some of the gaps, and concentrate more on the sociopolitical dimension of the problems and challenges that we all face.

I will just briefly recap for you. In 1964 the Government of Brazil faced economic and political chaos which it solved by letting the technocrats, who were very able, solve the economic problems while the government—that is, the military government—was able to maintain public order in a very difficult period of time. So first they cleaned up and then they built the economy, which led to what is sometimes described as an economic miracle.

The economy took a few hits, as they say, as it went along, especially the oil shocks that started a trend toward debt and other things that later exacerbated the problem. Later, the government also started on the political front a process toward a political opening, that is a redemocratization. And so you had the two going on parallel paths, but at different paces.

In 1981 the economic problems as outlined here came home to roost, many of them caused by external factors, but some of the internal factors or practices also started to appear. Then in 1982 you had an interesting thing happen: you had an election take place in Brazil in which over 53 to 54 million Brazilians went to the polls. This was a major step in the Abertura process.

As a result of this election what you had was, not only the opposition parties taking control of the Congress, but you had several states with governors that were in the opposition party. So from a political framework, right in the middle of this economic challenge that they face, they now had a whole different political arena on how to deal with this.

There were some 40 members elected who had been—the word in Portuguese is "cassado"; that means that their political rights had been taken away and their civil rights had been taken away in the 1964 to 1975 timeframe. And I think that in itself manifested the distance which this political opening up of the Abertura process had gone toward redemocratization.

So you have then a belt-tightening going on, because they were aware of the problems that they were facing. At the same time you had a change in the political system in which the executive branch could not pull all of the strings, as it did in 1964 when it allowed the technocrats to get out there and get the fiscal steps done.

You faced another element that was a byproduct of the economic miracle. I think it was Fred Bergsten who talked about the heavy public sector involvement in the development of Brazil during that period.[4] What you have to a certain degree is what I would call in noneconomic terms a beachmaster syndrome during that period. As you know, Mr. Chairman, the purpose of a beachmaster is to get things on the beach. How many barges he loses in the process does not really matter. It is where effectiveness, not efficiency, becomes the driving force.

So when they started the belt-tightening, they found that quite a few measures had to be taken to make the public sector parastatal enterprises more efficient. And also, as Secretary Leland mentioned, the subsidy programs that were included, not only in agriculture, which were the biggest ones, but there were other areas, to push exports—those were areas where everybody agreed needed to be areas for belt-tightening.

Now what you had was a Congress that was taking a very heavy speaking part, one from a partisan point of view that was opposed to the executive branch. And so you had all of the dimensions of a democratic ebb and flow that we find in this country at different times.

Also, there was another element with regard to the concept with which the Brazilians view international lending institutions, and specifically the IMF. In the late fifties it was felt that Brazil might have to go to the IMF, and at that time a program was laid out. But when then-President Kubitschek found out the new moneys that he envisaged coming from the IMF could not be put forward to the building of the capital, which was his dream, discussions with the IMF ceased and the loan was not consummated. The agreement was not consummated.

As a net result of that, what built up in Brazil, I think it is a fair assessment to say, was kind of an antipathy toward the IMF. And in 1981 when they faced a crisis, or in 1980, they were able to take the required steps which might have been a condition that the IMF might have imposed—I think Marc would agree with me—but they did it themselves, mainly because of this public perception that going to the IMF was kind of a national humiliation that a country like Brazil did not have to do.

So you have to keep that in mind. When in 1982 they had to seriously consider going to the IMF, the government had to override this public perception that going to the IMF was a national humiliation that a country like Brazil should never have to do.

I think what we face now, briefly, is that there are several players on the scene, and Brazil, obviously, from an internal point of view has not only an executive branch and a Congress, but has people also. We have also the international banking community, who have been burdened more and more with the increasing debts of other countries; and the public institutions like the IMF, who have had a tremendous load placed on their backs lately.

I think that their challenge is to consider some of the political and social conditions that exist, and not just a pure numbers crunching. I am not chastising them for it. I think they are aware of it. But I think it is an aspect that they have to keep in mind that within many of these countries, and I think maybe also Brazil, they are going onto a third year of recession and there is a sense of austerity that is not new, as one might find in other countries.

Of course, then the central banks are there, the Federal Reserve and the other central banks. These are all of the players, and I think what it is going to take is—and it is moving in that direction. I think what it takes is where they all recognize and give a little as they put the program together.

Let me just say a word, and then I will stop and take your questions, Mr. Chairman, about the role that the United States played during this period of time, because one hears that it may not have done enough, it needs to do more. I can tell you, because I was intimately involved in it, that since early September 1982 when the Brazilians became aware that they were facing a major problem, of the discussions that took place between the appropriate people in the Brazilian Government and the Treasury people, including Secretary Leland and Tim McNamar and myself—we learned to live with each other for long days and nights throughout that whole period of time—and also with the Brazilian Government and with Paul Volcker and the Fed.

So there has been since that period of time an intense interest and I think some creativity and I think also some courage shown by the U.S. Treasury and other governmental entities.

Let me make one last point, Mr. Chairman, and this is in a sense a prognostication of the future ahead. Brazil learns very well from its lessons. It learned a lesson in the early sixties that, for one reason or another, they do not have a reliable arms supply. So they built an arms industry. They knew that they could not build an industry that would be sufficient enough just to supply their modest needs, so the net result is they are now the sixth largest exporter of arms in the world.

They learned after the oil shocks in the sixties and seventies that their dependence on foreign oil was something that was not good for the country. The point where they went from some 90 percent dependency on foreign oil down to something over just 50 percent—it was a very incredible program that they undertook.

And I think they are going to learn from this situation also, or so I feel from a variety of conversations that I have had with different government people and economists. And that is, once they come out from the challenge that they face now, I think the dependency on foreign capital from a lending point of view, as opposed to an investment point of view, is something they do not want to get themselves way out on a limb again.

Based on their ability to learn from past lessons, I would suggest to you that that may be the direction eventually that they will go in.

Thank you.

SENATOR MATHIAS. Mr. Secretary, I share your enthusiasm for Brazil and Brazilians. Let me say that. And I appreciate your statement here today.

In your written statement you refer to Brazil's temporary liquidity crisis. I was interested that in Fred Bergsten's testimony this morning he came armed with a new publication of the Institute for International Economics—

MR. MOTLEY. He must be giving them away, because he gave me one, too. [Laughter.] [5]

MR. LELAND. I have several in my office if you need an extra.

SENATOR MATHIAS. He referred to statistics, which I think have the effect of confirming your judgment, regarding a temporary liquidity crisis.

You also referred to the fact that there are several players on this scene, and some of them are players over which Brazil has very little control, very little national control. One of them is recovery in the industrial West at large. Another is what we do within the next day or two as far as IMF is concerned. Another is commercial bank financing.

Are these factors sufficiently appreciated, do you think, both in Brazil and here? There is such a tendency to say that Brazil was profligate, that the banks were too imprudent.

MR. MOTLEY. Having spent a lot of time, as Marc has, with all of the players, usually in groups of two or three, I think to answer your specific question, there is an appreciation of some segments by the players in all places. Now, having been through what is now the third IMF negotiation from the sidelines, as happens when you have something for all players, there's a chemistry of having to have give and take and a little sweat and the rest of it, and that something has to come about for each one of these programs.

I think that each player can analyze correctly what other players should do, and I think in their heart of hearts they probably understand what they as a player have to do. The eventual solution and the long-range solution to this thing, rather than just a rolling over, will come when all players understand not only the other guy's role, which is very easy to outline, but their own role.

MR. LELAND. I might add that for me, of course, Tony is the expert on Brazil and is particularly qualified for having been down there for a long time. So it is with trepidation that anybody makes any comment either before him or after him on the subject.

I might say, since he managed to handle Brazil so well, he was given the rest of Latin America handed to him as well. Sometimes I do not know how he can keep up on each of the numbers, but he does.

But I would basically agree with that observation. It is right now a liquidity situation. Something that gets forgotten in this, Mr. Chairman, not just in the Brazilian situation, is the developing countries are expected to run current account deficits. We did for 50 years after the war the Germans and the Japanese did.

So there is a certain period during which it is expected that there will be an inflow of capital, and as long as the proper things are being done with that capital that can continue. There is not some magic date all of a sudden that they are expected to repay it.

And obviously, as Tony said, they recognize that there could be an excess of this. They also recognize that it has to be put to productive uses, and that is basically what is being done.

But when you look—and I think you made this point earlier when the other panel was up here, Mr. Chairman—at Brazil, it is quite an extraordinary economy. You are talking about 125 million people and you are looking at a tremendously successful economy. When you think of what it took to adjust to the oil shocks at all—as you noted earlier, Brazil is an oil importer. They have reduced their dependence to some degree and they will continue doing so.

But considering it all, they have done a lot and I think they recognize that a lot more has to be done. They are working on it right now, to make it clear that it is just a liquidity process and that they can make these changes and get their economy back in order.

SENATOR MATHIAS. Of course, it is up to the Brazilians to decide the profile of their economy. The Brazilians have to decide whether they want to have a high level of nationalized industry or a high level of free market industry. That ought to put the two of you into the position of criticizing domestic decisions of a great friend.

But speaking from a technical point of view, is the degree of nationalization, the number of state-owned industries, going to be a help or a hindrance in climbing out of this trough?

MR. MOTLEY. I would say right now it is obviously a hindrance, because the deficit has to come out of the public trough on those companies, the parastatals. I think they recognize that. President Figueiredo made an effort about 2 years ago to sell off some of the parastatal industries.

Unfortunately, some of the ones offered up for sale were not some of the more healthy ones, so there were not too many takers. The attempt was there to try to relieve the government of the burden of carrying these on. They felt that the maturity of the economic base had gotten to the point where they would be attractive from an investment point of view. Unfortunately, because of the choice of those put up for sale or because investment was just going down overseas everywhere at the time it was put up, well, the timing was unfortunate and they did not get many takers.

But I think there is an awareness there that they need to relieve themselves of these basically deficit-producing enterprises. Would you not say so?

MR. LELAND. I guess so. They realize the problem, and the question of course is when can you do it? It is a question of timing.

MR. MOTLEY. Yes, it was really unfortunate. They made the decision just when we saw the drop in investments overseas.

SENATOR MATHIAS. I was very much interested in your description of the history of the approaches of the IMF and the fact that it was considered not a socially acceptable thing.

MR. MOTLEY. It still is causing a problem in acceptance today.

SENATOR MATHIAS. That is interesting, when you consider that one of the biggest customers in the IMF is the United States. We have applied to the IMF, of course.

MR. LELAND. Only topped by the United Kingdom.

SENATOR MATHIAS. That is right, the United States and the United Kingdom being the two best customers.

MR. LELAND. That is right, the United Kingdom is the biggest.

SENATOR MATHIAS. So as we said earlier this morning, the perception of the facts is often more important than the facts.

Let me ask Secretary Leland if he thinks the 1982 application has come too late. Would it have been helpful if it had come earlier?

MR. LELAND. I think it is our desire that countries come earlier rather than later. That is just a fact. With 20–20 hindsight, one would have thought that it would have been better if it came earlier. But I think, to give the Brazilians credit, they really came at a point when it was obvious that they should come.

But they did a lot of things earlier. I mean, there are a lot of other countries that did not. In Brazil's case, in 1981 the financial team recognized that a lot of these changes had to be made and they tried to do it on their own to a degree.

It was not totally successful, but they did not wait until 1982, really, to start their efforts.

MR. MOTLEY. I think one of the biggest problems is on timing, Mr. Chairman. Maybe they could have come earlier, but they came with their act together. But they came on the heels of Mexico and came just prior to Argentina. So instead of being ahead of the flow to the IMF, they were really kind of right in the first wave, and that compounded the problem.

SENATOR MATHIAS. Were you in Brazil during the discussion of deindexation?

MR. MOTLEY. Yes.

SENATOR MATHIAS. How did they approach that? It is a political and economic question.

MR. MOTLEY. It is a subject that has been discussed at different times there, because I think a lot of people understand the problem, I mean the basic economic fact that you are on a treadmill of indexation. The Brazilians I think invented, from my layman's point of view, indexation long before we were kicking it around 10 years ago.

But once you had the elected Congress, it became a much more difficult subject to discuss, as opposed to a Congress that was indirectly elected. That is what I meant about the political scene. It all changed. It became much more difficult to discuss.

SENATOR MATHIAS. There is not that much difference between Brasilia and Washington.

MR. MOTLEY. That is right. I can see parallels between the trials, tribulations and challenges we go through here and the ones they are going through there.

MR. LELAND. The IMF program requires them to cut their budget deficit during the first year and a half and then again in the following year, which they have agreed to do with their own negotiations.

SENATOR MATHIAS. The Congress of the United States would be rather hard pressed when faced with that kind of a challenge. [Laughter.]

What about the pressure for a debt moratorium? Is there much pressure for a debt moratorium now?

MR. LELAND. Well, either Tony or I could take that.

If you are speaking of Brazil specifically, I do not think so, and in general I do not. I think again a debt moratorium becomes a political issue that sometimes looks appealing. But I think in all of these countries what has impressed me is a very responsible, an amazingly responsible economic leadership, and there is a recognition that a debt moratorium would just exacerbate the problem, it would not help it.

What they need is continued financing. They are countries that are very much involved in foreign trade with the rest of the world, and they cannot cut themselves off from it. They need banks to finance that trade. They cannot have their trade all tied up.

So I think, while it is stated as a political issue, those who understand it economically realize it is not viable. It is much better off to do the economic adjustment that will enable them to continue to get the external financing they need, and a debt moratorium would kill that.

MR. MOTLEY. I would agree with that assessment. In Brazil's case, from the beginning there was a very low, low decibel level of calls for a moratorium. There was an odd economist here or there or somebody else. In the last 4 or 5 months that decibel level has been raised a bit, but it is more, I think, a manifestation of a frustration with the austerity program that they are in rather than clear thinking.

Just like Marc said, when you say, all right, let us think this thing through with regards to the legal ramifications of a moratorium and the problems it raises and the rest of it, they just start backing off.

SENATOR MATHIAS. Let me ask one final question to each of you. What in your judgment would be the consequence of a failure of the U.S. Congress to pass the IMF funding legislation? You might want to comment on it generally and specifically as regards Brazil.

MR. LELAND. I can only reiterate what the President said yesterday, Mr. Chairman. I think it would be disastrous. We have testified before several committees and Secretary Regan has, and it was in the President's speech, that at the center of all of this adjustment process is the IMF.

The IMF cannot do its work without sufficient resources, and given growth in world trade, in general the increase we are asking for is a very reasonable one. It is essential that they have those funds. Without it, there is no particular strategy for handling it.

We have a President, quite candidly, that believes in a minimum of government involvement if you can have it in areas. But you still have to recognize that internationally, on problems such as balance of payments difficulties between governments and between countries, this is a traditional role of governments. This is what you cannot expect any other sector to provide.

And the IMF is the way that we do it. It is a problem for the governments, and therefore the quota increase has to go through. People say, well, what will we do without it? There really is no replacement for it. There just is not.

As Fred Bergsten mentioned, they may consider borrowing on the market, but that would be an additional matter. They really need the resources from the member governments. It is absolutely essential that they have them.

MR. MOTLEY. I would agree with Marc. I think, in a word, "disaster" is not too strong a word, not only from the purely financial ramifications that roll from that, but on top of that, let us just focus on the other aspect. I think what it does is send a signal to these countries that are facing these challenges that the United States is not going to be one of the players, so to speak. Not just regarding a contribution to the IMF, but it sends a signal as to our thinking on other aspects related to that.

In Brazil's case, Brazil is not that dependent upon the IMF percentage-wise, as many other countries are. In other words, it is not that important in the overall $11 billion funding as it would be to other countries. But it sends a signal that the U.S. Government maybe does not really care about it, and that leads into all kinds of political ramifications and gives rise to those who say: See, we have to find another way, and the other way is a different style of government.

I am not trying to draw a doomsday scenario, and the one thing you must keep in mind is this: The Portuguese stock from which Brazilians are born, their blood temperature is a lot lower than say Spanish stock or some of the others, and they have suffered from an austerity program that maybe other countries might not have maintained keeping the civil order that they have maintained. And I am not questioning for a moment that if IMF fails there will be tremendous problems in Brazil.

But it sends a signal as to the intent of the U.S. Government.

MR. LELAND. I should add, Mr. Chairman, because I think Tony could deal better, as he did with the political ramifications, that even economically, again as the President said yesterday, it is money you are putting in, you are getting interest on it, and you are getting it back. The question is, in my view you are saving by doing this. It is not as if we do not have it; somebody else will take care of the problem.

It has been our view that if you do not have it you will end up spending a lot more money in other ways in order to put bandaids here and there in less efficient ways to deal with the problem.

SENATOR MATHIAS. Well, that certainly would be my personal view.

Insofar as Brazil is concerned, its program does incorporate the IMF as an essential part of its recovery plan, and that plan would be dislocated to a major degree if the funding is not achieved.

MR. MOTLEY. Absolutely, from two points of view: One, from the fiscal resources; and also from the effect where to a certain degree when you are dealing with 2,000 banks you have to look to somebody for a good housekeeping seal of approval, and it becomes kind of like a funneling.

SENATOR MATHIAS. So it dislocates both the private sector and the public sector.

MR. MOTLEY. I think so. When he talked about the gap that they are facing, even now with what you are expecting from the IMF you still have not filled the whole gap. So if you remove that you are in even worse shape.

SENATOR MATHIAS. I thank you both very much for being here today. We appreciate your testimony.

MR. LELAND. Thank you, sir. We appreciate the opportunity to do so.

SENATOR MATHIAS. This committee stands in recess subject to call of the Chair.

U.S. Support For a Peaceful Transition to Democratic Government in Chile

. . . . . .

Q. And, also, if I could follow, I understand that the United States wants to say something about the dialog in Chile? It wants to say something to Pinochet?

A. I don't know that we want to say something about it, but always attempting to anticipate your questions, we may well have something on that.

Q. I'm surprised.

A. We have on repeated occasions expressed our full support for a peaceful transition to a democratic government in Chile. In this context we welcome the three earlier rounds of talks between the Chilean Government and democratic opposition.

While it by no means is the only avenue for exchanging views on how to accelerate the transition to democracy, the dialog offers a useful framework for discussing possible solutions, and for giving urgency and direction to the transition process.

We regret to note that the formal dialog which was interrupted in late September remains suspended. In the absence of such a dialog or exchange of views on a democratic transition, it is a matter of concern since this situation can only favor those opposed to a peaceful return to civilian government in Chile.

"The United States Respects Chile and We Want To Keep a Longstanding Friendship"

Q. What conclusion have you drawn as a result of your visit? [3]

A. Well, the world doesn't stop turning after a short visit like mine so that one should not expect anything after such a short visit. But I had an excellent opportunity to speak to people of all different points of view. Everybody was frank. I was very impressed with Mr. Jarpa as a pragmatic political official [4] and my responsibility is to go back home and report to my government my overall observations and, in turn, while here to reemphasize the fact that even when there are differences of opinion the United States respects Chile and we want to keep a longstanding friendship.

Q. What do you think about the Chilean political process?

A. I am not the expert but the process toward democracy everybody tells me is inevitable it is a matter of when and how all the pieces fall into place. There is no doubt that the process is there.

Q. Is there a significant difference between your previous knowledge of Chilean reality and what you have learned on this trip?

A. I think the reality of every country lies in the internal politics and an outsider cannot completely grasp the reality of any country. But you have a long history of democracy and you have an obviously energetic group of people interested in politics.

Q. What difficulties do you see in relations between the United States and Chile?

A. I think the obvious difficulty, I would not so much call it a difficulty, as an honest difference of opinion, is that in the United States our democracy has never failed us. It is hard for us to appreciate how the system goes awry elsewhere.

Q. Could the last declaration of the Department of State signify that silent diplomacy of President Reagan has been discarded?

A. No, silent diplomacy is something we prefer. I think what happened, is that you are referring to an official statement made by our spokesman in answer to a question from the press—and you all know how the press can ask difficult questions. [5]

Q. What do you think about retaining the Presidential period until 1989?

A. That is an internal decision for Chile.

Visit of Ecuadoran President Hurtado

MR. ALLIN. Okay. I apologize for the delay. The briefing will be on background, attributable to a senior administration official. This briefing is on the visit of President Reagan and President Hurtado. And it will deal, exclusively, with that meeting. So other questions on other subjects that you may feel our briefer has some insight into can be addressed at some other point. This briefing is on the meeting that was held today and on U.S.-Ecuadoran relations.

Thank you.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Thank you, Mort.

The discussions that the two Presidents had—and that George Shultz and Don Regan and other administration officials had with President Hurtado—covered the following points.

First, support for democracy—this is an elected, democratic, constitutional government in Ecuador, coming in after a period of military rule. It is headed toward Presidential and parliamentary elections next year, with the first round in January of 1984. It has been a very difficult transition. The President expressed his strong support for democracy in this country and, indeed, for the spreading trend toward democratic institutions throughout the hemisphere. And President Hurtado, in addition to reiterating his strong belief in democracy in the hemisphere, thanked the President for the support that we have given.

The second topic that was treated in several conversations is the economic one. As you heard President Hurtado point out, Latin America is in a serious debt crisis. [2] And most of the countries on the continent are facing deep recessions with an uncertain future. The President, President Hurtado, described what Ecuador had done to deal with this issue. It has, on the one hand, asked for the rescheduling of a portion—$1.3 billion—of its $6 billion foreign debt. That is under discussion with New York and other bankers. And the discussions are proceeding quite positively. They will be taken up again this week. And the expectation is that they will be successful.

On the other hand, though, the Government of Ecuador has taken a series of very difficult stabilization measures, have caused a good deal of popular reaction. It has acted with courage and some considerable firmness and with success—such things as sharp devaluations of the currency, removal of subsidies on petroleum and other products, sharp cuts in state programs in a number of areas, and a compression of the budget deficit. All of this latter has been taken in conjunction with a negotiation with the IMF, which has progressed quite well.

The United States, on its side, has—in addition to its, roughly, $10 million program of economic assistance for this country—provided this year—and we are just about to announce the second part of this—$81 million worth of CCC agricultural credits. [3]

Now, in discussions on the economic side, both the Ecuadorans and our officials agreed that not only do individual countries have to put their houses in order, but there has to be some general expansion in the international system. It is one thing if only a few countries have to cut back. But if every country has to cut back, this becomes inconsistent. And an environment is created in which the effects tend to reinforce each other and make matters worse for individual countries.

The President, Mr. Regan, Mr. Shultz pointed out to the developing expansion in the U.S. economy, said that it is not a question of having a single locomotive for the Western World, but of a large number of countries moving together and all would affect each other and pointed to the Williamsburg summit as the next occasion on which to discuss a common strategy in depth.

We also covered—third subject—a number of hemispheric questions; in particular, the question of how to develop diplomacy moving towards peaceful soludent. The briefing was conducted on background by a senior administration official in the White House Briefing Room beginning at 2:14 p.m.

tions in Central America. It was pointed out in the course of these discussions that a proposal had emerged in Central America, led by Honduras but responding to an initiative by a number of regional powers, such as Mexico, Venezuela and Colombia, to have an all Latin regional meeting on peace in Central America.[4] Have [There has] been a lot of consultation with the United States, and we had agreed that we should not take a direct part in this in order to maximize the possibility that Nicaragua would join it.

However, at the present moment, Nicaragua appears to be resisting this meeting with other Central American countries. The debate is occurring in the OAS over what is the right forum of such a meeting. The United States representatives expressed support for this five-plus-five initiative, five Central American countries, five other Latin American witnesses, as they are called. And there was a larger discussion about the role of peaceful discussions in the hemisphere, including the experience the United States has had in attempting to negotiate with Cuba, and attitudes that the Cuban Government adopts towards its neighbors.

Our relations with Ecuador are very good; a very cordial exchange, mutually supportive exchange. The President of Ecuador thanked us for the support that we had given during recent severe flooding in his country, particularly in the coastal town of Guayaquil.

Okay. That, I think, summarizes about where we were. Yes, sir.

Q. As you know, the President of Ecuador and his Foreign Minister[5] have made statements in the last 6 weeks in which both have declared their view that in order for there to be peace in Central America, all foreign interventionists should leave the region. How does the United States view that suggestion since we, of course, have uniformed military advisers in El Salvador—trainers, pardon me—and we have covert activities going on which the administration says is within—are within the law. So how do those things fit within President Hurtado and his Foreign Minister's view that all interventionists in the region should leave?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Well, you may recall that a number of democratic countries, including this one, got together in October in San Jose and tried to outline an end game, if you will, for Central America, sort of what we were aiming at.[6] And one of the things that we were—we said must happen, all of us—the United States has affirmed that in a number of ways since that time, including by President Reagan repeatedly during his trip to Latin America and Central America in December[7]—one of the things that we suggested was that there should be mutual, reciprocal, verified accords on removal of all foreign advisers, limitation of the import of heavy offensive weapons, an end to insurgencies run from one country on another on the same mutual and verifiable basis, and a number of other points. But all of those points were included in that statement of policy and supported subsequently by the President.

We don't have to have a lot of foreign military trainers in El Salvador or elsewhere. We have a few. We don't have nearly as many, of course, as the Cubans have in Nicaragua.

Q. That wasn't my question, sir. President Hurtado and his Foreign Minister have both said all foreign military interventionists in the region should be withdrawn. What is our government's view of that call—

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Our government's view of that is that, and I'm giving you the specifics, because we've already supported and indeed proposed the specifics that on the same reciprocal and verified basis that we should remove the trainers, part of the intervention, if you will. I think that's what is meant by that word and the heavy offensive weapons and so forth. That is all on a basis of reciprocity and verification. That is an American proposal and that of other democracies in the area.

---

[4] The Honduran proposal was discussed in the record of proceedings of the protocolary session of the Permanent Council of the Organization of American States, March 29, 1983 (OAS document CP/ACTA 520/83), and the Special Sessions, April 5 and 11, 1983 (OAS document CP/ACTA 521/83).

[7] President Reagan traveled to Latin America, November 30 to December 4, 1982.

Q. May I follow up, sir. Did he raise this issue in the talks today?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No.

Q. Has it been raised at the embassy level or at the level of foreign minister talking to foreign minister?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No.

Q. Thank you.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. On an economic question with Ecuador, he said while he was in New York that he was interested in a debt solution that would involve debtor countries paying on their ability to pay perhaps with respect to their foreign exchange earnings rather than fixed interest rates and over and over again rescheduling.

Q. Did he bring this up in the meeting today and—

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No, sir.

Q. Didn't come up at all?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No, sir. He, indeed, spoke of the relatively good job he thought Ecuador was doing in reaching agreement with its creditors and the successful handling of its debt. He pointed out that this is a very major issue. You heard him speak out in front of the White House. It's a very major issue for a lot of countries that we all must be concerned with, but he did not propose such a solution.

Q. And anything about a collection of countries similarly situated with respect to that—getting together and devising some overall debt relief?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No.

Q. Didn't even bring it up?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No.

Q. In the five-plus-five plan, did he voice support for it?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. He voiced support for solutions that would get the maximum amount of agreement. He said that Ecuador is not proposing its own plan, does not plan to put forward specific ideas but is vitally interested in peace in Central America and would support and join other proposals.

Q. But he did not specifically support five-plus-five?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No, he did not specifically support five-plus-five although he did express interest in it.

Q. Did he ask the President—President Reagan for any information on what exactly the United States is doing in Nicaragua? And was any explanation offered?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No, the subject did not come up as I think I just mentioned.

Q. Sir, on the economic front, you say that he had not asked for any economic aid, he have no [had not] discussed the Nicaraguan issue, and he have no [had not] expressed himself on the five-and-five proposal. What is the substance of the visit then?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. It was mainly on the three points that I mentioned before which resulted in some very far-ranging conversations on this. We said on our side that we thought that, indeed, they had done extremely well with their stabilization program and that we were telling our banks that we thought it was a serious and constructive program that is worthy of support.

I don't think that either the President of Ecuador or our President thought of this as a meeting in which—to request economic assistance. We had, as I mentioned, just granted a substantial amount in the CCC credits.

Q. Sir—

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I'm sorry, that—excuse me, you're first.

Q. I just wanted to ask you about the CCC credits. You say we've already granted them or we are about to make the announcement?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. The second tranche of them is about to be announced. The total will be $81 million.

Q. And forgive my ignorance, but what does CCC credits mean?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. They mean short-term credits for the purchase of agricultural goods, generally 3 years in length. It would be particularly helpful at this time of a payments crunch in Ecuador.

Q. How much of it's already been made public then?

Q. Is that for all—

Q. How much of the $81 million has already been announced?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. How much are the—have we got an expert here on—

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I don't know, sir.

Q. This is for Ecuador to buy American agricultural products?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Yes, I don't know how it's broken down into the two tranches, I'm sorry.

Q. And this is all $81 million—all the credits are for Ecuador and not for—

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Ecuador.

Q. —agriculture—beets, corn—

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I can't tell you that either. I'm sorry.

Q. You're going to have to provide specialized—take numbers and provide specialized information, please.

MR. ALLIN. You ought to give Jeff Biggs [8] a call at the Department, 632-4726. I'm sure he will be glad to provide that. Right, Jeff?

Q. What's the number again?

MR. ALLIN. Jeff?

Q. Yes.

Q. In his speech before the OAS yesterday, President Hurtado said, and I quote, "The violence that has left a trail of blood in Central America has historical causes that are linked to oppression, social injustice, and economic problems." [9] In his departure declaration, President Reagan thanked President Hurtado for sharing with him the benefit of his perceptive views. Was that perceptive view shared with President Reagan and did he try to stress that the President should take that into his analysis of what's been going on in Central America?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No, he did not make that point. However, many administration spokesmen have, as you know, said that there are two things going on in Central America. One is the legacy of past injustices, and the other is outside interference.

Q. Just a clarification on the five-plus-five.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Yes.

Q. Is the five-plus-five identical—is the Honduran resolution at the OAS identical to the five-plus-five, or is there a difference? [10]

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No, it simply says—calls on all countries to meet under this formula in order to discuss the resolution of their problems, all countries in Central America.

Q. Under five-plus-five—I thought it didn't—

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. It has the five, and it is less certain about how many others should come in, but it suggests other Latin American countries coming in and being witnesses without—

Q. And would we oppose—if Cuba were invited as a Latin American country, would we oppose that?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. It refers to members of the OAS, I believe. We would not support that, no.

Q. At any time during the meeting, was the issue of—

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. And—excuse me—I think I should say that no one is proposing it.

Q. All right.

Q. Sorry. At any time during the meeting, was the issue of tuna fishing raised by either side?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Yes, it was in a congratulatory tone because this is a very difficult issue—an issue brought about, on the one hand, by seizures, by Ecuador of U.S. tuna fishing boats and, on the other hand, by the imposition of a U.S. embargo on tuna and tuna products, has been satisfactorily resolved. It was a month ago. [11]

MR. ALLIN. Last question.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. You may have heard President Reagan referring to this in his remarks.

MR. ALLIN. . . . ?

Q. Yes. The question is: Did the President of Ecuador urge President Reagan to seek a peaceful solution to problems in Central America? Did he use those words?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No. It was the American side that raised the ideas that we have and see—possibilities we see for peaceful solutions. And it was President Hurtado who commented and reacted on some of his quite general ideas without putting forward specific ones.

Q. So he didn't have to bring up Central America, then, on his own? It was the—

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. We did.

Q. He didn't?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. We did.

Q. What about the CBI?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. He did not bring it up. Ecuador is not a beneficiary.

Q. It was not discussed in the context of the hemisphere?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No.

THE PRESS. Thank you.
